

THIS BOOK
MUST NOT BE REMOVED FROM THE LIBRARY

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON LIBRARY

346 Mx North Gallery

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON LIBRARY

6 JUN 1991

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2026

THE
ALL ENGLAND
LAW REPORTS

(INCORPORATING THE
LAW TIMES REPORTS
AND THE
LAW JOURNAL REPORTS) OF CASES DECIDED IN

THE HOUSE OF LORDS

THE PRIVY COUNCIL

ALL DIVISIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT

AND

COURTS OF SPECIAL JURISDICTION

1950

VOLUME 1

Consulting Editor :

Sir ROLAND BURROWS, K.C.

Recorder of Cambridge.

Managing Editor of Halsbury's Laws of England, Hailsham Edition.

Consulting Editor for Chancery Cases :

HAROLD CHRISTIE, ESQ., K.C.

Bencher of Lincoln's Inn.

Consulting Editor for Taxation Cases :

CYRIL KING, ESQ., K.C.

Bencher of the Middle Temple.

General Editor :

G. F. L. BRIDGMAN, ESQ.

of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

[For list of Reporters see overleaf]

Published by the Proprietors of

THE LAW JOURNAL, 11 & 12 BELL YARD, TEMPLE BAR, LONDON, W.C.2.

REPORTERS.

|                                      |                                                                                                                                                                               |                          |
|--------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------|
| House of Lords .. ..                 |   C. ST. JOHN W. NICHOLSON,B.A. (OXON.)J. D. PENNINGTON                                                                                       | Barristers-at-Law |
| Privy Council .. ..                  | H. McL. MORRISON                                                                                                                                                              | Barrister-at-Law  |
| Court of Appeal, No. 1 ..            | F. GUTTMAN                                                                                                                                                                    | Barrister-at-Law  |
| Court of Appeal, No. 2 ..            |   C. ST. JOHN W. NICHOLSON,B.A. (OXON.)J. D. PENNINGTON                                                                                       | Barristers-at-Law |
| Court of Appeal, No. 3 ..            | C. N. BEATTIE                                                                                                                                                                 | Barrister-at-Law  |
| Court of Criminal Appeal             | H. McL. MORRISON                                                                                                                                                              | Barrister-at-Law  |
| Chancery Division ..                 |   R. D. H. OSBORNEH. McL. MORRISON                                                                                                                 | Barristers-at-Law |
| King's Bench Division ..             |   F. A. AMIES, B.A. (LEEDS)M.D. CHORLTON, M.A. (OXON.)F. GUTTMANGWYNEDD LEWISH. McL. MORRISONCONRAD OLDHAMG. M. SMAILES   | Barristers-at-Law |
| Revenue Cases .. ..                  | C. N. BEATTIE                                                                                                                                                                 | Barrister-at-Law  |
| Probate, Divorce and Admiralty .. .. | R. HENDRY WHITE                                                                                                                                                               | Barrister-at-Law  |
| Ecclesiastical Cases ..              | R. HENDRY WHITE                                                                                                                                                               | Barrister-at-Law  |

HOUSE OF LORDS

THE LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR. The Rt. Hon. Viscount Jowitt

LORDS OF APPEAL IN ORDINARY

|                                      |                                |
|--------------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| The Rt. Hon. Lord Porter             | The Rt. Hon. Lord MacDermott   |
| The Rt. Hon. Lord Simonds            | The Rt. Hon. Lord Reid of Drem |
| The Rt. Hon. Lord Normand            | The Rt. Hon. Lord Greene       |
| The Rt. Hon. Lord Oaksey             | (retired May 5, 1950)          |
| The Rt. Hon. Lord Morton of Henryton | The Rt. Hon. Lord Radcliffe    |

COURT OF APPEAL

MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The Rt. Hon. Sir Raymond Evershed

|                                     |                                     |
|-------------------------------------|-------------------------------------|
| The Rt. Hon. Lord Justice Tucker    | The Rt. Hon. Lord Justice Asquith   |
| The Rt. Hon. Lord Justice Bucknill  | The Rt. Hon. Lord Justice Singleton |
| The Rt. Hon. Lord Justice Somervell | The Rt. Hon. Lord Justice Denning   |
| The Rt. Hon. Lord Justice Cohen     | The Rt. Hon. Lord Justice Jenkins   |

CHANCERY DIVISION

|                                 |                                  |
|---------------------------------|----------------------------------|
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Vaisey     | The Hon. Mr. Justice Harman      |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Romer      | The Hon. Mr. Justice Danckwerts  |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Roxburgh   | The Hon. Mr. Justice Lloyd-Jacob |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Wynn-Parry | (appointed Jan. 1, 1950)         |

KING'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND. The Rt. Hon. Lord Goddard

|                                                   |                                                                                     |
|---------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| The Rt. Hon. Mr. Justice Humphreys                | The Hon. Mr. Justice Sellers                                                        |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Hilbery                      | The Hon. Mr. Justice Finnemore                                                      |
| The Hon Mr. Justice Lewis(died Mar. 15, 1950) | The Hon. Mr. Justice Pritchard                                                      |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Oliver                       | The Hon. Mr. Justice Streatfeild                                                    |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Croom-Johnson                | The Hon. Mr. Justice Ormerod(transferred from P.D.A. Division,May 26, 1950) |
| The Hon Mr. Justice Stable                        | The Hon. Mr. Justice Slade                                                          |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Cassels                      | The Hon. Mr. Justice Devlin                                                         |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Hallett                      | The Hon. Mr. Justice Parker(appointed Mar. 24, 1950)                            |
| The Rt. Hon. Mr. Justice Birkett                  | The Hon. Mr. Justice Gorman(appointed May 26, 1950)                             |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Lynskey                      |                                                                                     |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Jones                        |                                                                                     |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Byrne                        |                                                                                     |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Morris                       |                                                                                     |

PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION

PRESIDENT. The Rt. Hon. Lord Merriman

|                                 |                                                                          |
|---------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Hodson     | The Hon. Mr. Justice Ormerod(transferred to K.B.D., May 26,1950) |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Pilcher    |                                                                          |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Wallington | The Hon. Mr. Justice Pearce                                              |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Barnard    | The Hon. Mr. Justice Collingwood(appointed May 26, 1950)             |
| The Hon. Mr. Justice Willmer    |                                                                          |

These reports are cited thus :

[1950] 1 All E. R.

CASES REPORTED IN VOLUME I

|                                                                                                                           | PAGE |                                                                                                                   | PAGE |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------|
| ABERGELE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL, PILLING v.[K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                                  | 76   | CHAPELLE v. CHAPELLE [MANCHESTER MICHAEL-MAS ASSIZES]                                                  | 236  |
| ACKROYDS AIR TRAVEL, LTD. v. DIRECTOR OFPUBLIC PROSECUTIONS [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                 | 933  | CHILL ENGINEERING, LTD. v. UNIT TOOL ANDENGINEERING CO., LTD. [C.A.]                                   | 378  |
| ALLEN, PROLE v. [SOMERSET WINTER ASSIZES]                                                                          | 476  | CHESSINGTON ZOO, LTD., SURREY COUNTY VALUA-TION COMMITTEE v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                        | 154  |
| AMALGAMATED RELAYS, LTD. v. BURNLEY RATINGAUTHORITY [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                         | 253  | CIECIBSKI, TAYLOR v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                                                    | 319  |
| ARNOLD, HALL v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                                                                 | 993  | CLARKE, R. v. [C.C.A.]                                                                                     | 546  |
| ASHER v. SEAFORD COURT ESTATES, LTD. [H.L.]                                                                        | 1018 | COBB, EATON v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                                                          | 1016 |
| ASHFORD, HARRIES v. [C.A.]                                                                                         | 427  | COLE (ERNEST J.) AND PARTNERS, LTD., Ex parteR. v. SOMERSET J.J. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]             | 264  |
| ASHTON, KNEEN (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. [CH.D.]                                                                      | 982  | COLLINS (AN INFANT), Re [C.A.]                                                                             | 1057 |
| ATKINSON, PACEY v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                                                              | 320  | CONSTANT, SMITH & CO., KIRIL MISCHIEFF, LTD. v.[K.B.D.]                                                | 890  |
| A.-G., MACDARMAID v. [Div.]                                                                                        | 497  | CONTINENTAL EXPRESS, LTD., HESKELL v.[K.B.D.]                                                          | 1033 |
| A.-G. v. ST. AUBYN (SR JOHN MOLESWORTH)[C.A.]                                                                  | 79   | COPPS v. PAYNE [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                                                          | 246  |
| A.-G. v. ST. AUBYN (L.M.) (No. 2) [C.A.]                                                                           | 951  | CORCORAN v. CORCORAN [Div.]                                                                                | 495  |
| AUSTIN MOTOR CO., LTD. v. BRITISH STEAMSHIPINVESTMENT TRUST, LTD. [C.A.]                                       | 632  | CORFIELD v. GROVES [K.B.D.]                                                                                | 488  |
| BAKER v. TURNER [H.L.]                                                                                             | 834  | COUGHTRY v. PORTER [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                                                      | 257  |
| BALDOCK, MIDDLETON v. [C.A.]                                                                                       | 708  | CUNLIFFE v. GOODMAN [C.A.]                                                                                 | 720  |
| BANK OF ENGLAND, DOLLUS MIEG ET COMPAGNIES.A. v. [C.A.]                                                        | 747  | DALE v. de SOISSONS [CH.D.]                                                                                | 912  |
| BARKER v. BARKER [C.A.]                                                                                            | 812  | DAVIES (dec'd.), Re [CH.D.]                                                                                | 120  |
| BARKWAY v. SOUTH WALES TRANSPORT CO.,LTD. [H.L.]                                                               | 392  | DAVIES, BASTIN v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                                                       | 1095 |
| BARTRAM AND SONS, LTD., HOBSON v. [C.A.]                                                                           | 412  | DAVIS v. DAVIS [C.A.]                                                                                      | 40   |
| BASTIN v. DAVIES [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                                                                | 1095 | DEAN v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR [C.A.]                                                                  | 344  |
| BAXTER v. ECKERSLEY [C.A.]                                                                                         | 139  | DEAN'S WILL TRUSTS, Re [CH.D.]                                                                             | 882  |
| BEAUMONT'S WILL TRUSTS, Re [CH.D.]                                                                                 | 802  | DEARLEY, LAW v. [C.A.]                                                                                     | 124  |
| BELL v. GOSDEN [C.A.]                                                                                              | 266  | DEBTOR (No. 564 of 1949), Re A. Ex parte CUSTOMSAND EXCISE COMRS. v. THE DEBTOR [C.A.]          | 308  |
| BENNETT (dec'd.), Re [CH.D.]                                                                                       | 435  | DEBTOR (No. 416 of 1940), Re A. Ex parteOFFICIAL RECEIVER (TRUSTEE) v. HUBBARD[C.A.]        | 1085 |
| BERMIONSEY BOROUGH COUNCIL, R. v. Ex parteLEONARD [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                    | 1069 | DEELEY, KNIGHTSBRIDGE ESTATES TRUST, LTD. v.[C.A.]                                                     | 577  |
| BERWICKSHIRE, THE [ADM.]                                                                                                  | 699  | DE SOISSONS, DALE v. [CH.D.]                                                                               | 912  |
| BESSER MANUFACTURING CO., INTERNATIONALCORPN., LTD. v. [C.A.]                                                  | 355  | DINGLE, Ex parte . R. v. MINISTER OF HEALTH[K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                   | 875  |
| BIRKETT (dec'd.), Re [CH.D.]                                                                                       | 316  | DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS, Ex parteR. v. MIDDLESEX QUARTER SESSIONS [K.B.D.DIVL. CT.] | 916  |
| BLATHWAYT'S WILL TRUSTS, Re [CH.D.]                                                                                | 582  | DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS, ACKROYDSAIR TRAVEL, LTD. v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                        | 933  |
| BOARD OF TRADE, STAG LINE, LTD. v. [K.B.D.]                                                                        | 516  | DOLLFUS MIEG ET COMPAGNIE S.A. v. BANK OFENGLAND [C.A.]                                                | 747  |
| —, [C.A.]                                                                                                                 | 1105 | DOWDELL O'MAHONEY & CO., LTD., INLANDREVENUE COMRS. v. [C.A.]                                          | 969  |
| BOISSEVAIN v. WELL [H.L.]                                                                                          | 728  | EATON v. COBB [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                                                           | 1016 |
| BOLTON LEATHERS, LTD., HALES v. [C.A.]                                                                             | 149  | ECKERSLEY, BAXTER v. [C.A.]                                                                                | 139  |
| BORDER RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. ROBERTS[C.A.]                                                                 | 370  | EDWARDS v. NEWLAND (E. BURCHETT, LTD.,THIRD PARTIES) [C.A.]                                            | 1072 |
| BORTHWICK-NORTON v. ROMNEY WARWICKESTATES, LTD. [K.B.D.]                                                       | 362  | ELWES v. ELWES [Div.]                                                                                      | 826  |
| —, [C.A.]                                                                                                                 | 798  | ETON RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. RIVER THAMESCONSERVATORS [CH.D.]                                        | 996  |
| BOSLYMON QUARRIES, LTD., GWYTHYR v. [K.B.D.]                                                                       | 384  | ETON URAL DISTRICT COUNCIL, WALTER v.[K.B.D.]                                                          | 796  |
| BOSTOCK v. BOSTOCK [Div.]                                                                                          | 25   | EULENBURG (ERNST), LTD., NOVELLO & CO., LTD.v. [C.A.]                                                  | 44   |
| BOYS' WILL TRUSTS, Re [CH.D.]                                                                                      | 624  | EVANS, R. v. [C.C.A.]                                                                                      | 610  |
| BRADSHAW, (dec'd.), Re [C.A.]                                                                                      | 643  | FALMOUTH BOAT CONSTRUCTION, LTD. v. HOWELL[C.A.]                                                       | 538  |
| BRATT, FOWLER v. [C.A.]                                                                                            | 662  | FELLOWS v. FELLOWS [C.A.]                                                                                  | 602  |
| BRIGHTON AND AREA RENT TRIBUNAL, R. v.Ex parte MARINE PARADE ESTATES (1936),LTD. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] | 946  | FENNELL, PRESTON v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                                                     | 1099 |
| BRITISH STEAMSHIP INVESTMENT TRUST, LTD.,AUSTIN MOTOR CO., LTD. v. [C.A.]                                      | 632  | FIRER PRODUCTION CO., LTD. AND MONTAGUE &CO., TUDOR FURNISHERS, LTD. v. [CH.D.]                        | 65   |
| BROWN v. SHEEN AND RICHMOND CAR SALES, LTD.[K.B.D.]                                                            | 1102 | FISON'S WILL TRUSTS, Re [CH.D.]                                                                            | 501  |
| BROWNLOW TRUST, LTD., J. W. CAFES, LTD. v.[K.B.D.]                                                             | 894  | FITZWILLIAM'S (BARI) AGREEMENT, Re [CH.D.]                                                                 | 191  |
| BRYAN v. FORROW [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                                                                 | 294  | FLOCKHART v. ROBERTSON [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                                                  | 1091 |
| BURNLEY RATING AUTHORITY, AMALGAMATEDRELAYS, LTD. v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                        | 253  | FOLLAND, SHEARMAN v. [C.A.]                                                                                | 976  |
| BUTSER TURF AND TIMBER CO., LTD. v. PETERS-FIELD RATING AUTHORITY [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                           | 288  | FORROW, BRYAN v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                                                        | 294  |
| CACKETT (otherwise TRICE) v. CACKETT [Div.]                                                                        | 677  | FOWLER v. BRATT [C.A.]                                                                                     | 662  |
| CARDIFF CORPN., WILLIAMS v. [C.A.]                                                                                 | 250  | FOX, MINISTRY OF HEALTH v. [CH.D.]                                                                         | 1050 |
| CARDIFF RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL, WINTER v.[H.L.]                                                                | 819  | FRASER, WEST MERSEA URBAN DISTRICT COUN-CIL v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.]                                      | 990  |
| CAREY (dec'd.), Re [CH.D.]                                                                                         | 726  | FURLONG, R. v. [C.C.A.]                                                                                    | 636  |
| CARTER v. GREEN [C.A.]                                                                                             | 627  | GENERAL STEAM NAVIGATION CO., LTD., GRACE(G. W.) & CO., LTD. v. [K.B.D.]                               | 201  |
| CARTER v. MINISTER OF HEALTH [K.B.D.]                                                                              | 904  |                                                                                                                   |      |
| CEEN v. JACOBS. JACOBS v. JACOBS AND CEEN[Div.]                                                         | 96   |                                                                                                                   |      |
| CHANDRIS v. ISBRANDTSEN-MOLLER CO. INC.[K.B.D.]                                                                | 768  |                                                                                                                   |      |

| PAGE |                                                                                                                    |
|------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| 276  | GOLDSACK v. SHORE [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                   |
| 720  | GOODMAN, CUNLIFFE v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                |
| 919  | GOODY, REED (DENNIS), LTD. v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                       |
|      | GORDON ROSSALL PLASTICS, LTD., J.R.P. PLASTICS, LTD. v. (HEXA PEN CO., LTD., CLAIMANTS) [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. . |
| 241  | GOSDEN, BELL v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                     |
| 266  | GOWER v. GOWER [Div.] .. .. .                                                                                      |
| 27   | —, [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                                  |
| 804  | GRACE (G. W.) & CO., LTD. v. GENERAL STEAM NAVIGATION CO., LTD. [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                   |
| 201  | GRAHAM, NORTH CENTRAL WAGON AND FINANCE CO., LTD. v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                |
| 780  | GRAHAM & SCOTT (SOUTHGATE), LTD. v. OXLADE [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                        |
| 91   | —, [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                                  |
| 856  | GREEN, CARTER v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                    |
| 627  | GREEN, R. v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                        |
| 38   | GREENWOOD'S AGREEMENT, Re [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                    |
| 436  | GRIFFIN v. LONDON TRANSPORT EXECUTIVE [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                             |
| 716  | GRIGOR, PLATTIS (FREDERICK) CO., LTD. v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                            |
| 941  | GROVES, CORFIELD v. [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                                               |
| 488  | GWYTHYR v. BOSLYMON QUARRIES, LTD. [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                                |
| 384  | HALES v. BOLTON LEATHERS, LTD. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                      |
| 149  | HALL (decd.), Re [Prob.] .. .. .                                                                            |
| 718  | HALL v. ARNOLD [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                                                                          |
| 993  | HAMBLIN v. HAMBLIN (BY HER GUARDIAN) [Div.] .. .. .                                                                |
| 35   | HAMBROS BANK, LTD., ITALY (THE REPUBLIC OF) v. [Ch.D.] .. .. .                                                     |
| 430  | HARLOW v. MINISTRY OF TRANSPORT [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                                   |
| 898  | HARRIES v. ASHFORD [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                  |
| 427  | HARRIS v. ROTOL, LTD. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                               |
| 867  | HARRISON v. NATIONAL COAL BOARD [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                     |
| 171  | HARVEY (decd.), Re [Ch.D.] .. .. .                                                                          |
| 491  | HAYWARD v. PULLINGER & PARTNERS, LTD. [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                             |
| 581  | HEATH v. HEATH [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                      |
| 877  | HENDERSON, Re [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                |
| 283  | HENLEY v. MURRAY (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) [C.A.] .. .. .                                                               |
| 908  | HERXHEIMER, JONES v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                |
| 323  | HERXHEIMER, JONES v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                |
| 1033 | HICKS, MCCALLUM v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                  |
| 864  | HILL (WILLIAM) (PARK LANE), LTD. v. HOFMAN [Ch.D.] .. .. .                                                         |
| 1013 | HOBSON v. BARTRAM & SONS, LTD. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                      |
| 412  | HODGKINS v. HODGKINS [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                |
| 619  | HOFMAN, HILL (WILLIAM) (PARK LANE), LTD. v. [Ch.D.] .. .. .                                                        |
| 1013 | HONEYSET AND MUDGE, MUDGE v. (GOODWIN cited) [Div.] .. .. .                                                        |
| 607  | HORNER (GEORGE W.) & CO., LTD., LINDLEY v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                                              |
| 234  | HORTON v. LONDON GRAVING DOCK CO., LTD. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                             |
| 180  | HOUGHTON-LE TOUZEL v. MECCA, LTD. [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                                 |
| 638  | HOWELL, FALMOUTH BOAT CONSTRUCTION, LTD. v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                         |
| 538  | HOWLETT (decd.), Re [Prob.] .. .. .                                                                         |
| 485  | HUDSON, PYBURN v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                                                                       |
| 1006 | HUNTINGFORD v. HUNTINGFORD [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                          |
| 785  | HUTCHINSON v. JAUNCEY [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                               |
| 165  | HYDE v. HYDE [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                        |
| 788  | HYLAND, LTD., LAMONT (JAMES) & CO., LTD. v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                         |
| 341  | HYLAND, LTD. (No. 2), LAMONT (JAMES), & CO., LTD. v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                |
| 929  | INLAND REVENUE COMRS. v. DOWDELL O'MAHONEY & CO., LTD. [C.A.] .. .. .                                              |
| 969  | INLAND REVENUE COMRS. v. STUART (JOHN DOW), LTD. [H.L.] .. .. .                                                    |
| 1    | INTERNATIONAL CORPN., LTD. v. BESSER MANUFACTURING CO. [C.A.] .. .. .                                              |
| 355  | INTERNATIONAL GALLERIES, LEAF v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                    |
| 693  | ISBRANDTSEN-MOLLER CO. INC., CHANDRIS v. [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                          |
| 768  | ITALY (THE REPUBLIC OF) v. HAMBROS BANK, LTD. [Ch.D.] .. .. .                                                      |
| 430  | ITTER (decd.), Re [Prob.] .. .. .                                                                           |
| 68   | J.R.P. PLASTICS, LTD. v. GORDON ROSSALL PLASTICS, LTD. (HEXA PEN CO., LTD., CLAIMANTS) [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .  |
| 241  | J. W. CAFES, LTD. v. BROWNLOW TRUST, LTD. [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                         |
| 894  | JACOBS v. JACOBS AND CEEN (CEEN v. JACOBS) [Div.] .. .. .                                                          |
| 96   | JACOBS v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL [H.L.] .. .. .                                                                     |
| 737  | JAUNCEY, HUTCHINSON v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                              |
| 165  | JOHNSON v. YOUDEN [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                                                                       |
| 300  | JOHNSTONE, R. v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                    |
| 830  | JOHNSTON'S APPLICATION, Re [Ch.D.] .. .. .                                                                  |
| 613  | JONAS v. ROSENBERG [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                  |
| 296  |                                                                                                                    |

| PAGE |                                                                                                                      |
|------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| 276  | JONES v. HERXHEIMER [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                   |
| 323  | JONES v. WHITEHILL [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                    |
| 71   | KAVANAGH, Re. Ex parte THE BANKRUPT v. JACKSON (THE TRUSTEE) [C.A.] .. .. .                                   |
| 39   | KAYE v. LEVINSON [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                      |
| 594  | KAYSER v. LONDON PASSENGER TRANSPORT BOARD [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                          |
| 231  | KEEBLE v. MILLER [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                                                                          |
| 261  | KELLY, R. v. [C.C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                        |
| 806  | KING v. SMITH [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                         |
| 553  | KIRIL MISCHIEFF, LTD. v. CONSTANT, SMITH & CO. [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                      |
| 890  | KLEIN, WEINBAUM v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                    |
| 353  | KNEEN (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. ASHTON [Ch.D.] .. .. .                                                                 |
| 982  | KNIGHTSBRIDGE ESTATES TRUST, LTD. v. DEELEY [C.A.] .. .. .                                                           |
| 577  | KORNER v. WITKOWITZER BERGBAU UND EISENHUETTEN GEWERKSCHAFT [C.A.] .. .. .                                           |
| 558  | LAMBETH BOROUGH COUNCIL, PEARSON v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                   |
| 682  | LAMONT (JAMES) & CO., LTD. v. HYLAND, LTD. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                            |
| 341  | LAMONT (JAMES) & CO., LTD. v. HYLAND, LTD. (No. 2) [C.A.] .. .. .                                                    |
| 929  | LAND REALISATION CO., LTD. v. POST OFFICE [Ch.D.] .. .. .                                                            |
| 1062 | LAW v. DEARNLEY [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                       |
| 124  | LEAF v. INTERNATIONAL GALLERIES [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                       |
| 693  | LEDEGER, R. v. [C.C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                      |
| 1104 | LEIGH, WIGLEY v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                      |
| 73   | LEONARD, Ex parte. R. v. BERMONDSEY BOROUGH COUNCIL [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                                |
| 1069 | LEVIN v. ROTH [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                         |
| 698  | LEVINSON, KAYE v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                     |
| 594  | LEWIS v. THOMAS [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                       |
| 116  | LINDLEY v. HORNER (GEORGE W.) & CO., LTD. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                                                 |
| 234  | LINDOP, THOMAS v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                                                                         |
| 966  | LINERHAM, LUCAS v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                    |
| 586  | LIVERPOOL CORPN., PARKINSON v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                        |
| 367  | LONDON CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY, LTD., WHITSHIRE COUNTY VALUATION COMMITTEE v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                |
| 937  | LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL, JACOBS v. [H.L.] .. .. .                                                                      |
| 737  | LONDON GRAVING DOCK CO., LTD., HORTON v. [C.A.] .. .. .                                                              |
| 180  | LONDON PASSENGER TRANSPORT BOARD, KAYSER v. [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                         |
| 231  | LONDON TRANSPORT EXECUTIVE, GRIFFIN v. [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                              |
| 716  | LORY'S WILL TRUSTS, Re [Ch.D.] .. .. .                                                                        |
| 349  | LOWE, WATSON v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                                                                           |
| 100  | LOWNDES v. LOWNDES [Div.] .. .. .                                                                                    |
| 999  | LUCAS v. LINEHAM [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                      |
| 586  | LYONS (J.) & CO., LTD. v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR HOME AFFAIRS [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                             |
| 280  | MACADAM (A BANKRUPT), Re. Ex parte GUILLAUME v. THE TRUSTEE [Ch.D.] .. .. .                                   |
| 303  | MACADAM (No. 2), Re. Ex parte GUILLAUME v. THE TRUSTEE [C.A.] .. .. .                                         |
| 659  | MCCALLUM v. HICKS [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                     |
| 864  | MACDARMAD v. A.-G. [Div.] .. .. .                                                                                    |
| 497  | MCGILLIVRAY v. STEPHENSON [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                                                                 |
| 942  | MCGREAVY, Re. Ex parte MCGREAVY v. BENFLEET URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL [Ch.D.] .. .. .                            |
| 30   | —, [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                                    |
| 442  | MANNING v. MANNING [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                    |
| 602  | MARINE PARADE ESTATES (1936), LTD., Ex parte R. v. BRIGHTON AND AREA RENT TRIBUNAL [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. . |
| 946  | MARSDEN, WAROQUIERS v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                                                                    |
| 93   | MATTHEWS, R. v. [C.C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                     |
| 137  | MECCA, LTD., HOUGHTON-LE TOUZEL v. [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                                  |
| 638  | MERIDEN AND SOLIHULL RATING AUTHORITY v. TYACKE [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                                           |
| 939  | METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER PICTURES, LTD., TURNER (OTHERWISE ROBERTSON) v. [H.L.] .. .. .                                   |
| 449  | MIDDLESEX QUARTER SESSIONS, R. v. Ex parte DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .         |
| 916  | MIDDLETON v. BALDOCK [C.A.] .. .. .                                                                                  |
| 708  | MILLER, KEEBLE v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                                                                         |
| 261  | MILL'S DECLARATION OF TRUST, Re [Ch.D.] .. .. .                                                               |
| 789  | MINISTER OF FOOD, NOEMIJULIA STEAMSHIP CO., LTD. v. [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                 |
| 985  | MINISTER OF HEALTH, CARTER v. [K.B.D.] .. .. .                                                                       |
| 904  | MINISTER OF HEALTH, R. v. Ex parte DINGLE [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .                                          |
| 875  | MINISTER OF TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING, R. v. Ex parte C. B. NORTH, LTD. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. .. .            |
| 163  | MINISTRY OF FOOD, UNDERHILL v. [Ch.D.] .. .. .                                                                       |
| 591  | MINISTRY OF HEALTH v. FOX [Ch.D.] .. .. .                                                                            |
| 1050 |                                                                                                                      |

|                                                                                                                                     |      |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------|
| MINISTRY OF TRANSPORT, HARLOW v. [K.B.D.] ..                                                                                 | 898  |
| MITCHELL, PARMEE v. [C.A.] ..                                                                                                | 872  |
| MONTAGUE & Co. AND FINER PRODUCTION Co.,LTD., TUDOR FURNISHERS, LTD. v. [Ch.D.] ..                                       | 65   |
| MORGAN'S WILL TRUSTS, Re [Ch.D.] ..                                                                                          | 1097 |
| MORLEYS (BIRMINGHAM), LTD. v. SLATER [C.A.] ..                                                                               | 331  |
| MUDGE v. MUDGE AND HONEYSETT (GOODWINcited ) [Div.] ..                                                            | 607  |
| MUNRO v. MUNRO [C.A.] ..                                                                                                     | 832  |
| MURRAY (INSPECTOR OF TAXES), HENLEY v.[C.A.] ..                                                                          | 908  |
| NATIONAL COAL BOARD, HARRISON v. [C.A.] ..                                                                                   | 171  |
| NAYLOR BENSON MINING Co., LTD., Re [Ch.D.] ..                                                                                | 518  |
| NEWLAND, EDWARDS v. (B. BURCHETT, LTD.,THIRD PARTIES) [C.A.] ..                                                          | 1072 |
| NOEMIJULIA STEAMSHIP Co., LTD. v. MINISTER OFFOOD [K.B.D.] ..                                                            | 985  |
| NORFOLK'S (DUKE) WILL TRUSTS, Re [C.A.] ..                                                                                   | 664  |
| NORMAN v. NORMAN [Div.] ..                                                                                                   | 1032 |
| NORTH CENTRAL WAGON AND FINANCE Co., LTD.v. GRAHAM [C.A.] ..                                                             | 780  |
| NORTH (C.B.), LTD., Ex parte . R. v. MINISTER OFTOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING [K.B.D. DIVL.CT.] ..                | 163  |
| NOVELLO & Co., LTD. v. EULENBURG (ERNST), LTD.[C.A.] ..                                                                  | 44   |
| OPPENHEIM, RICKARDS (CHARLES), LTD. v. [C.A.] ..                                                                             | 420  |
| OWEN, ZEIDMAN v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                                                       | 290  |
| OXLADE, GRAHAM & SCOTT (SOUTHGATE), LTD. v.[K.B.D.] ..                                                                   | 91   |
| —, [C.A.] ..                                                                                                                        | 856  |
| PACEY v. ATKINSON [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                                                      | 320  |
| PARKINSON v. LIVERPOOL CORPN. [C.A.] ..                                                                                      | 367  |
| PARKINSON (SIR LINDSAY) & Co., LTD. v. COMRS.OF WORKS AND PUBLIC BUILDINGS [C.A.] ..                                     | 208  |
| PARMEE v. MITCHELL [C.A.] ..                                                                                                 | 872  |
| PARTABMULL RAMESHWAR, SETHI (K.C.) (1944),LTD. v. [C.A.] ..                                                              | 51   |
| PAYNE, COPPS v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                                                        | 246  |
| PAYNE, R. v. [C.C.A.] ..                                                                                                     | 102  |
| PEARSON v. LAMBETH BOROUGH COUNCIL [C.A.] ..                                                                                 | 682  |
| PETERSFIELD RATING AUTHORITY, BUTSEE TURFAND TIMBER Co., LTD. v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                   | 288  |
| PILLING v. ABERGLE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL[K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                           | 76   |
| PLATS (FREDERICK) Co., LTD. v. GRIGOR [C.A.] ..                                                                              | 941  |
| PORTER, COUGHTREY v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                                                   | 257  |
| POST OFFICE, LAND REALISATION Co., LTD. v.[Ch.D.] ..                                                                     | 1062 |
| PRACTICE NOTE (CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT, 1948)[C.C.A.] ..                                                                           | 37   |
| PRESTON v. FENNELL [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                                                     | 1099 |
| PRICE ( dec'd. ), Re [Ch.D.] ..                                                                                       | 338  |
| PROLE v. ALLEN (SOMERSET WINTER ASSIZES)[C.A.] ..                                                                        | 476  |
| PULLINGER & PARTNERS, LTD., HAYWARD v.[K.B.D.] ..                                                                        | 581  |
| PYBURN v. HUDSON [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                                                       | 1006 |
| R. v. BERMONDSEY BOROUGH COUNCIL. Ex parteLEONARD [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                           | 1069 |
| R. v. BRIGHTON AND AREA RENT TRIBUNAL. Exparte MARINE PARADE ESTATES (1936), LTD.[K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] .. | 946  |
| R. v. CLARKE [C.C.A.] ..                                                                                                     | 546  |
| R. v. EVANS [C.C.A.] ..                                                                                                      | 610  |
| R. v. FURLONG [C.C.A.] ..                                                                                                    | 636  |
| R. v. GREEN [C.C.A.] ..                                                                                                      | 38   |
| R. v. JOHNSTONE [C.C.A.] ..                                                                                                  | 830  |
| R. v. KELLY [C.C.A.] ..                                                                                                      | 806  |
| R. v. LEDGER [C.C.A.] ..                                                                                                     | 1104 |
| R. v. MATTHEWS [C.C.A.] ..                                                                                                   | 137  |
| R. v. MIDDLESEX QUARTER SESSIONS. Ex parteDIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS [K.B.D.DIVL. CT.] ..                | 916  |
| R. v. MINISTER OF HEALTH. Ex parte DINGLE[K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                    | 875  |
| R. v. MINISTER OF TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING.Ex parte C. B. NORTH, LTD. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                      | 163  |
| R. v. PAYNE [C.C.A.] ..                                                                                                      | 102  |
| R. v. REYNOLDS [C.C.A.] ..                                                                                                   | 335  |
| R. v. SOMERSET J.J. Ex parte COLE (ERNEST J.) ANDPARTNERS, LTD. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                             | 264  |
| REDPATH v. REDPATH [C.A.] ..                                                                                                 | 600  |
| REED (DENNIS), LTD. v. GOODY [C.A.] ..                                                                                       | 919  |
| REYNOLDS, R. v. [C.C.A.] ..                                                                                                  | 335  |
| RICKARDS (CHARLES), LTD. v. OPPENHEIM [C.A.] ..                                                                              | 420  |
| RIVER THAMES CONSERVATORS, ETON RURALDISTRICT COUNCIL v. [Ch.D.] ..                                                      | 996  |
| ROBERTS, BORDER RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v.[C.A.] ..                                                                       | 370  |

|                                                                                                              |      |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------|
| ROBERTSON, FLOCKHART v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                         | 1091 |
| ROMNEY WARWICK ESTATES, LTD., BORTHWICK-NORTON v. [K.B.D.] ..                                     | 362  |
| —, [C.A.] ..                                                                                                 | 798  |
| ROSENBERG, JONAS v. [C.A.] ..                                                                         | 296  |
| ROSS v. ROSS [Div.] ..                                                                                | 654  |
| ROTH, LEVIN v. [C.A.] ..                                                                              | 698  |
| ROTEL, LTD., HARRIS v. [C.A.] ..                                                                      | 867  |
| ST. AUBYN (SIR JOHN MOLESWORTH), A.-G. v.[C.A.] ..                                                | 79   |
| ST. AUBYN (L.M.), ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. (No.2) [C.A.] ..                                            | 951  |
| SCARISBRICK'S WILL TRUSTS, Re [Ch.D.] ..                                                              | 143  |
| SCOTT-RUSSELL, WHITTY v. [C.A.] ..                                                                    | 884  |
| SEAFORD COURT ESTATES, LTD., ASHER v. [H.L.] ..                                                       | 1018 |
| SECHIARI ( dec'd. ), Re [Ch.D.] ..                                                             | 417  |
| SECRETARY OF STATE FOR HOME AFFAIRS, LYONS(J.) & Co., LTD. v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..               | 280  |
| SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR, DEAN v. [C.A.] ..                                                         | 344  |
| SELBY-BIGGE ( dec'd. ), Re [PROB.] ..                                                          | 1009 |
| SETHI (K.C.) (1944), LTD. v. PARTABMULLRAMESHWAR [C.A.] ..                                        | 51   |
| SHEARMAN & FOLLAND [C.A.] ..                                                                                 | 976  |
| SHEEN AND RICHMOND CAR SALES, LTD., BROWN v.[K.B.D.] ..                                           | 1102 |
| SHORE, GOLDSACK v. [C.A.] ..                                                                          | 276  |
| SLATER, MORLEYS (BIRMINGHAM), LTD. v. [C.A.] ..                                                       | 331  |
| SMILEY v. TOWNSHEND [C.A.] ..                                                                         | 530  |
| SMITH, KING v. [C.A.] ..                                                                              | 553  |
| SMITH, SUNNUCKS v. [Ch.D.] ..                                                                         | 550  |
| SOLICITOR-GENERAL, THEOPHILE v. [H.L.] ..                                                             | 405  |
| SOMERSET J.J., R. v. Ex parte COLE (ERNEST J.)AND PARTNERS, LTD. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..     | 264  |
| SOUTH WALES TRANSPORT Co., LTD., BARKWAY v.[H.L.] ..                                              | 392  |
| STAG LINE, LTD. v. BOARD OF TRADE [K.B.D.] ..                                                         | 516  |
| —, [C.A.] ..                                                                                                 | 1105 |
| STEANE'S (BOURNEMOUTH), LTD., Re [Ch.D.] ..                                                           | 21   |
| STEPHENSON, MCGILLIVRAY v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                      | 942  |
| STUART (JOHN DOW), LTD., INLAND REVENUECOMRS. v. [H.L.] ..                                        | 1    |
| SUNNUCKS v. SMITH [Ch.D.] ..                                                                          | 550  |
| SURREY COUNTY VALUATION COMMITTEE v. CHESS-INGTON ZOO, LTD. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                 | 154  |
| TAYLOR v. CECILSKIS [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                             | 319  |
| THEOPHILE v. SOLICITOR-GENERAL [H.L.] ..                                                              | 405  |
| THOMAS, LEWIS v. [C.A.] ..                                                                            | 116  |
| THOMAS v. LINDOP [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                                | 966  |
| TOWNSHEND, SMILEY v. [C.A.] ..                                                                        | 530  |
| TRESTAIN v. TRESTAIN [C.A.] ..                                                                        | 618  |
| TROILUS, THE [C.A.] ..                                                                                       | 103  |
| TUDOR FURNISHERS, LTD. v. MONTAGUE & Co. ANDFINER PRODUCTION Co., LTD. [Ch.D.] ..                 | 65   |
| TURNER, BAKER v. [H.L.] ..                                                                            | 834  |
| TURNER (OTHERWISE ROBERTSON) v. METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER PICTURES, LTD. [H.L.] ..                      | 449  |
| TYACKE, MERIDEN AND SOLIHULL RATINGAUTHORITY v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                             | 939  |
| UNDERHILL v. MINISTRY OF FOOD [Ch.D.] ..                                                              | 591  |
| UNIT TOOL AND ENGINEERING Co., LTD., CHELLENGINEERING, LTD. v. [C.A.] ..                          | 378  |
| WALLACH ( dec'd. ), Re [PROB.] ..                                                              | 199  |
| WALTER v. ETON RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL[K.B.D.] ..                                                  | 796  |
| WARQUERS v. MARSDEN [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                             | 93   |
| WATSON v. LOWE [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                                  | 100  |
| WEIL, BOISSEVIN v. [H.L.] ..                                                                          | 728  |
| WEINBAUM v. KLEIN [C.A.] ..                                                                           | 353  |
| WEST MERSEA URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v.FRASER [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                 | 990  |
| WESTBY'S SETTLEMENT, Re [C.A.] ..                                                                     | 479  |
| WHITEHILL, JONES v. [C.A.] ..                                                                         | 71   |
| WHITTY v. SCOTT-RUSSELL [C.A.] ..                                                                     | 884  |
| WIGHTWICK'S WILL TRUSTS, Re [Ch.D.] ..                                                                | 689  |
| WIGLEY v. LEIGH [C.A.] ..                                                                             | 73   |
| WILLIAMS v. CARDIFF CORPN. [C.A.] ..                                                                  | 250  |
| WILTSHIRE COUNTY VALUATION COMMITTEE v.LONDON CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY, LTD. [K.B.D.DIVL. CT.] .. | 937  |
| WINDMILL STREET (Nos. 38, 39 and 40), ST.PANCRAS, LONDON, Re [Ch.D.] ..                           | 59   |
| WINTER v. CARDIFF RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL[H.L.] ..                                                 | 819  |
| WIKOWITZER, BERGBAU UND EISENHUTTENGEWERKSCHAFT, KORNER v. [C.A.] ..                              | 558  |
| WORKS AND PUBLIC BUILDINGS COMRS., PARK-INSON (SIR LINDSAY) & Co., LTD. v. [C.A.] ..              | 208  |
| YODEN, JOHNSON v. [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                               | 300  |
| ZEIDMAN v. OWEN [K.B.D. DIVL. CT.] ..                                                                 | 290  |

INDEX

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | PAGE    |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------|
| ABATEMENT                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |         |
| Statutory nuisance. See PUBLIC HEALTH.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |         |
| ACCORD AND SATISFACTION                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |         |
| Deduction of tax on payment of royalties— Recipient accepting deduction under mistake of law [GWYTHYR v. BOSLYMON QUARRIES, LTD.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 384     |
| ACCOUNT                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |         |
| Action for— Service of writ out of jurisdiction [INTERNATIONAL CORPORATION, LTD. v. BESSER MANUFACTURING CO.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 355     |
| ACQUISITION OF LAND                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |         |
| See COMPULSORY PURCHASE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |         |
| ADMINISTRATION                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |         |
| Administrator pendente lite— Costs of administration and remuneration of administrator—Possible benefit of administration to estate—Apportionment between estate and party bringing proceedings [Re HOWLETT (deceased)] .. .. .                                                                                                                             | 485     |
| Grant to sole administrator— Possible life interest—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 160 (1), s. 162 (1) (as amended by the Administration of Justice Act, 1928 (c. 26), s. 9) [Re HALL (deceased)] .. .. .                                                                                                                | 718     |
| Lunatic— Distribution of estate—Lunatic entitled, on father's death in 1906, to undivided share in freehold estates—Freeholds unsold and held by trustees on statutory trusts—Nature of lunatic's interest—"Beneficial interest in real estate"—Administration of Estates Act, 1925 (c. 23), s. 51 (2) [Re BRADSHAW (deceased)] .. .. .                     | 643     |
| ADULTERY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |         |
| See DIVORCE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |         |
| AERIAL TRAFFIC                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |         |
| Reservation of air services— Scheduled journey—Company prohibited from landing aircraft—Feeder service arranged by travel agency and operated by "non-corporation" aircraft companies—Liability of travel agency—Aiding and abetting—Civil Aviation Act, 1946 (c. 70), s. 23 (1) (2) [ACKROYDS AIR TRAVEL, LTD. v. DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS] .. .. . | 933     |
| AGENT                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |         |
| Estate agent— Commission—Agreement to purchase "subject to formal contract" [MCALLUM v. HICKS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 864     |
| Contract to pay commission on introduction of person "ready, able and willing to purchase"—Introduction of potential purchaser—Withdrawal by purchaser before completion [DENNIS REED, LTD. v. GOODY] .. .. .                                                                                                                                               | 919     |
| Contract to pay commission on introduction of person "willing and able to purchase"—Person willing to purchase "subject to satisfactory survey" [GRAHAM AND SCOTT (SOUTHGATE), LTD. v. OXLADE] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                      | 91, 856 |
| Instructions to find "purchaser"—Purchaser bound by law to purchase [FOWLER v. BRATT] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 662     |
| AGRICULTURAL HOLDING                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |         |
| See AGRICULTURE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |         |
| AGRICULTURAL LAND                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |         |
| Rateability. See RATES.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |         |
| AGRICULTURE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |         |
| Agricultural holding— Agreement to let land for interest less than tenancy from year to year—Whether agreement capable of taking effect as tenancy from year to year—Need for agreement to be enforceable at law—Jurisdiction of county court—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 2 (1) (2) [GOLDSACK v. SHORE] .. .. .                             | 276     |
| Tenancy agreement—Compensation for disturbance—Amount of compensation—Covenant by landlord to pay "for any loss or damage through disturbance"—Amount of compensation not confined to statutory limits—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923 (c. 9), s. 12 (6) [DEAN v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR] .. .. .                                                       | 344     |
| AIDING AND ABETTING                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |         |
| See INTOXICATING LIQUOR.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |         |
| AIR SERVICES                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |         |
| Offences relating to. See AERIAL TRAFFIC.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |         |
| ALIEN                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |         |
| Bankruptcy—"Debtor" [THEOPHILE v. SOLICITOR-GENERAL] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 405     |
| ANALYST                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |         |
| Under Food and Drugs Act. See FOOD AND DRUGS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |         |
| ANNUITY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |         |
| Annuity purchased from trustees of son's marriage settlement— Liability to estate duty on annuitant's death [Re EARL FITZWILLIAM'S AGREEMENT] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 191     |
| Estate duty— Continuing annuity—Bequest of annuity for joint lives and life of survivor—Property passing on death of first of beneficiaries to die [Re DUKE OF NORFOLK'S WILL TRUSTS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                               | 664     |
| APPEAL                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |         |
| Abatement— Leave to appeal—Conditional stay of execution—Condition not complied with and order executed—Destruction of lis [BAKER v. TURNER] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 834     |
| County court, from. See COUNTY COURT.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |         |
| Court of Appeal, to. See COURT OF APPEAL.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |         |
| ARBITRATION                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |         |
| Award— Remission—Error of law on face of award—Remission to arbitrators to cure apparent defect—Admission of evidence on question whether award should be remitted [KIRIL MISCHIEFF, LTD. v. CONSTANT, SMITH & CO.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                 | 890     |
| ATTESTATION CLAUSE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |         |
| Will— Omission of statement that witnesses "subscribed their names as witnesses" [Re SELBY-BIGGE (decd.)] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 1009    |

AWARD

See ARBITRATION.

BAILMENT

Personal contract—Personal skill and care—Storage of furniture for reward—Damage to premises by bombing—Loss of goods—Reasonable care—Burden of proof [EDWARDS v. NEWLAND (E. BURCHETT, LTD., THIRD PARTIES)] . . . . . 1072

BANKRUPTCY

Appeal—Appeal to Court of Appeal—Appeal out of time—Jurisdiction of Court of Appeal to grant leave—Need to show special circumstances—R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 15—Bankruptcy Rules, 1915 (S.R. & O., 1914, No. 1824), r. 130, r. 134. [Re MACADAM (NO. 2)] . . . . . 659

"Debt"—Arrears of rates—Arrears as basis for petition—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 4 (1) (b), s. 33 (1) (a) [Re MCGREAVY, Ex parte MCGREAVEY v. BENFLEET URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL] . . . . . 30, 442

Official receiver succeeding to trusteeship—Onerous property—Right of disclaimer—Statutory period for exercise of right—Extension of time—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 54 (1) (7), s. 109 (4). [Re A DEBTOR (No. 416 of 1940). Ex parte OFFICIAL RECEIVER (TRUSTEE) v. HUBBARD] . . . . . 1085

Petition—Service—Service out of jurisdiction—"Debtor"—"Foreigner"—"Carrying on business"—Business continued till all debts paid—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 1 (1) (a), (2) (c), s. 4 (1) (c) [THEOPHILE v. SOLICITOR-GENERAL] . . . . . 405

Property available for distribution—Claim by bankrupt for damage to reputation and property—Settlement of Action—Apportionment of agreed damages—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 38 (a) [Re KAYANAGH, Ex parte THE BANKRUPT v. JACKSON (THE TRUSTEE)] . . . . . 39

Settlement within two years of bankruptcy—Valuable consideration—Purchase of house for bankrupt by trustees of settlement—Contribution by bankrupt of part of purchase price—Settlement by bankrupt of his contribution on trusts of original settlement—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 42 (1) [Re MACADAM (A BANKRUPT), Ex parte GUILLAUME v. THE TRUSTEE] . . . . . 303

Receiving order—Infant—Infant trading with adult—Jurisdiction to make receiving order against infant—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 3 [Re A DEBTOR (No. 564 of 1949), Ex parte COMRS. OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE v. THE DEBTOR] . . . . . 308

BARGAIN

Unconscionable bargain with expectant heir. See UNCONSCIONABLE BARGAIN.

BILL OF LADING

See SHIPPING.

BOMB DAMAGE

House rendered uninhabitable—Use by tenant for business purposes—Notice to quit served before repair [MORLEYS (BIRMINGHAM), LTD. v. SLATER] . . . . . 331

BRIBERY AND CORRUPTION

Conviction by court of summary jurisdiction—Committal to quarter sessions for sentence—No power to sentence at quarter sessions [R. v. MIDDLESEX QUARTER SESSIONS. Ex parte DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS] . . . . . 916

BROTHEL

Suffering premises to be used as—User by sub-tenant—Knowledge of tenant—Imputation of knowledge—Relief—Exercise of discretion of court [BORTHWICK-NORTON v. ROMNEY WARWICK ESTATES, LTD.] . . . . . 362, 798

See also CRIMINAL LAW (Brothel).

BUILDING CONTRACT

Liability to pay for alterations and additions—Contract amended by deed of variation—Payment to contractor limited—Subsequent large increase in works—Right of contractor to payment for additional work [SIR LINDSAY PARKINSON & CO., LTD. v. COMRS. OF WORKS AND PUBLIC BUILDINGS] . . . . . 208

CAPITA, PER

Division of fund—"Equally between the children of my deceased sister T. and the said F.H."—Children of different generation from that of testatrix, T., and F.H. [Re BIRKETT (deceased)] . . . . . 316

CAPITAL

Gift rendering capital inalienable—Perpetuities [Re WIGHTWICK'S WILL TRUSTS] . . . . . 689

CAPITAL PROFITS DIVIDEND

Capital or income—Assets of company required by State—Profit on sale—Reconstruction of company as investment and holding company—Receipt of dividend by settlement trustees [Re SECHIARI (deceased)] . . . . . 417

CARGO

Dangerous. See SHIPPING.

CARRIER

Failure to despatch goods to ship—Discovery delayed by negligent issue of bill of lading—Shipper's resultant liability in damages to purchaser for failure to deliver goods—Measure of damages [HESKELL v. CONTINENTAL EXPRESS, LTD.] . . . . . 1033

CASE STATED

Friendly society—Accounts of officers—Neglect to deliver—Order by justices to deliver—Decision of justices "final and conclusive"—No appeal by Case Stated. [HALL v. ARNOLD] . . . . . 993

Quarter sessions—Refusal to state Case—Mandamus—Power of High Court to issue—Criminal Justice Act, 1925 (c. 86), s. 20 [R. v. SOMERSET JJ., Ex parte ERNEST J. COLE AND PARTNERS, LTD.] . . . . . 264

CATCHMENT BOARD

See LAND DRAINAGE.

CAUTION

Need to administer—Admission of previous convictions [CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT, 1948, PRACTICE NOTE] . . . . . 37

CHARGE

Deed—Executed for illegal consideration—Betting debt secured by deed—Covenant to repay [WILLIAM HILL (PARK LANE), LTD. v. HOFMAN] . . . . . 1013

CHARITABLE PURPOSE

See CHARITY.

CHARITY

- Charitable purpose—Gift to a hospital to provide "accommodation for the use of relatives who come from a distance of patients who are critically ill" [Re DEAN'S WILL TRUSTS] . . . . . 882
- Relief of poverty—Public element—Immediate gift for such relations of sons and daughters as should be in needy circumstances [Re SCARISBRICK'S WILL TRUSTS] . . . . . 143

CHARTERPARTY

See SHIPPING.

CHILD

- Custody—Failure to obey order. See CONTEMPT OF COURT.
- Evidence. See CRIMINAL LAW.
- Licensee—Trap—Injury. See NEGLIGENCE.

CLAIM

Statement of. See PLEADING.

CLUB

- Negligence—Unincorporated members' club—Member injured by fall down unlighted steps—Liability of committee—Liability of steward [PROLE v. ALLEN] . . . . . 476

COAL MINE

See MINE (Coal Mine).

COITUS INTERRUPTUS

See DIVORCE (Cruelty); NULLITY.

COLLISION

At sea. See SHIPPING.

COLLUSION

See DIVORCE.

COMMISSION

Estate agent. See AGENT.

COMMON GAMING HOUSE

See GAMING.

COMPANY

- Capital profits dividend—Capital or income—Assets of company acquired by State—Profit on sale—Reconstruction of company as investment and holding company—Receipt of dividend by settlement trustees [Re SECHLARI (deceased)] . . . . . 417
- Dividend—Computation—Payment of dividend tax free up to 6s. in the £ [AUSTIN MOTOR CO., LTD. v. BRITISH STEAMSHIP INVESTMENT TRUST, LTD.] . . . . . 632
- Sunday Observance Act—Liability to penalty under [HOUGHTON-LE TOUZEL v. MECCA, LTD.] . . . . . 638
- Winding-up—Avoidance of disposition of property after commencement of winding-up—Discretion of court—Principles for exercise—Justice in particular circumstances—Special regard to bona fides of applicant—Debenture to secure advances made for payment of debts, to enable company to carry out its contracts—Company and debenture-holder not aware of presentation of petition when debenture issued—Advances made before and after service of petition—Companies Act, 1948 (c. 38), s. 227 [Re STEANE'S (BOURNEMOUTH), LTD.] . . . . . 21

COMPENSATION

- Agricultural holding—Disturbance. See AGRICULTURE.
- Loss of office—Liability to income tax. See INCOME TAX.
- Minerals—Grant of right to work. See MINE.
- Requisitioned property. See REQUISITIONING.
- Tithe rentcharge—Extinguishment. See TITHE AND TITHE RENTCHARGE.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE

- Speedy acquisition of land in urgent cases—Authorisation rendered abortive—Validity of second authorisation—No change of circumstances—Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946 (c. 49), s. 2 (2), (3)—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 37 (2) [LAND REALISATION CO., LTD. v. POST OFFICE] . . . . . 1062

CONFESSION

See CRIMINAL LAW.

CONFLICT OF LAWS

- Impleading foreign sovereign States—Gold bars belonging to French company seized by Germans and carried off to Germany—Discovery by allied forces—In possession and under control of governments of United States, United Kingdom and France—Deposit with Bank of England for purpose of applying agreement by allied governments on restitution of monetary gold—Action by French company against bank claiming delivery of bars or damages for conversion [DOLLFUS MIEG ET COMPAGNIE S.A. v. BANK OF ENGLAND] . . . . . 747

CONJUGAL RIGHTS

Restitution of. See DIVORCE.

CONNIVANCE

See DIVORCE.

CONTEMPT OF COURT

- Divorce—Child—Custody—Failure to obey order—Child sent out of jurisdiction—Proceedings for custody by petitioner in Eire—Waiver—Need to purge contempt [CORCORAN v. CORCORAN] . . . . . 495

CONTINUING ANNUITY

See ANNUITY.

CONTRACT

- Implied term—Shipment of jute from India to Italy—Export permitted only under licence and subject to quota—Contract not expressed to be subject to quota—Conditions governing sellers' ability to perform contract under quota system known to both parties [K. C. SETHIA (1944), LTD. v. PARTABMULL RAMESHWAR] . . . . . 51
- Personal contract—Personal skill and care—Storage of furniture for reward [EDWARDS v. NEWLAND (E. BURCHETT, LTD., Third Parties)] . . . . . 1072
- Rescission—Sale of goods—Innocent misrepresentation as to quality of article sold—Acceptance by buyer of delivery—Claim to rescind contract after five years [LEAF v. INTERNATIONAL GALLERIES] . . . . . 693

CONTRACT—continued.

- Service of writ—Service out of jurisdiction—Breach within jurisdiction—Proof of such breach—Contract to pay pension—Contract made in Czechoslovakia—Pension payable in England [KORNER v. WITKOWITZ BERGBAU UND EISENHUETTEN GEWERKSCHAFT] . . . . . 558
- Time of performance—Sale of goods—Work and labour—Contract to build motor car body—Time of the essence—Original condition in regard to time waived—Subsequent notice fixing time for completion—Reasonableness—Conduct amounting to waiver [CHARLES RICKARDS, LTD. v. OPPENHEIM] . . . . . 420

Warranty. See WARRANTY.

CONVERSION

- Hire-purchase—Claim for damages—"Owners may terminate hiring" on default of hirer—Right to immediate possession of chattel hired—Need of notice [NORTH CENTRAL WAGON AND FINANCE CO., LTD. v. GRAHAM] . . . . . 780

COPYRIGHT

- Emergency legislation—Enemy owner of copyright—Grant of interest in copyright to non-enemy person—Non-exclusive licence—Action by licensee for infringement—Rights of licensee—Joinder of owner—Dispensation—Discretion of court—Onus of proof that owner an enemy alien—Evidence—Existence of licence—Patents, Designs, Copyright and Trade Marks (Emergency) Act, 1939 (c. 107), s. 2 (1) (5) [NOVELLO & CO., LTD. v. ERNST EULENBURG, LTD.] . . . . . 44

CO-RESPONDENT

Damages against. See DIVORCE.

CORRECTIVE TRAINING

See CRIMINAL LAW (Sentence).

CORROBORATION

Nullity cases. See NULLITY.

COSTS

- Claim—Counterclaim—Recovery by plaintiff of larger sum on claim than that recovered by defendant on counterclaim—Form of judgment—Amount of costs recoverable by plaintiff [CHELL ENGINEERING, LTD. v. UNIT TOOL AND ENGINEERING CO., LTD.] . . . . . 378
- Counsel's fees—Fee on appeal—Allowance of fee less than that allowed at first instance [SUNNUCKS v. SMITH] . . . . . 550
- Fees of counsel for trustees or executors on hearing of originating summons on the construction of a will* [Re BENNETT (deceased)] . . . . . 435
- Divorce. See DIVORCE.
- Probate action. See PROBATE.
- Security for costs—Interpleader—Issue directed—Parties in substance both claimants—Discretion of Court—Corresponding security offered by respondent to application [TUDOR FURNISHERS, LTD. v. MONTAGUE & CO. AND FINER PRODUCTION CO., LTD.] . . . . . 65

COUNSEL

- Fee on appeal—Allowance of fee less than that at first instance [SUNNUCKS v. SMITH] . . . . . 550
- Fees—Counsel for trustees or executors on hearing of originating summons on construction of will [Re BENNETT (deceased)] . . . . . 435

COUNTY COURT

- Appeal—Claim exceeding £200—Issue tried in county court by consent—Decision on question of fact—Right of appeal—County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), s. 105 [HYDE v. HYDE] . . . . . 788
- New trial—Further evidence—Power of Court of Appeal to order new trial—County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), s. 105—County Courts Rules, 1936, Ord. 37, r. 1 (1) [WEINBAUM v. KLEIN]* . . . . . 353
- Raising in Court of Appeal of point of law not argued in court below* [BELL v. GOSDEN] . . . . . 266
- Pleadings drawn by unqualified person. See SOLICITOR.

COURT OF APPEAL

- Appeal—Consent to dismissal—Consent initialled by president of court—No order drawn up or entered—Discretion of court to allow or refuse appeal to be proceeded with [JAMES LAMONT & CO., LTD. v. HYLAND, LTD.] . . . . . 341
- Bankruptcy—Leave to appeal out of time—Need to show special circumstances [Re MACADAM (No. 2)] . . . . . 659

COVENANT

In lease. See LANDLORD AND TENANT.

CRIMINAL LAW

- Brothel—Keeping a brothel—Right to trial by jury—Charge under Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (c. 69), s. 13 (1) [WAROQUIERS v. MARSDEN] . . . . . 98
- Evidence—Child—Ability to understand nature of oath—Evidence of school attendance officer—Evidence given in absence of jury—Children and Young Persons Act, 1933 (c. 12), s. 38 (1) [R. v. REYNOLDS] . . . . . 335
- Confession—Confession of two crimes—Admissibility on trial for one crime—Murder—Charges of murder of wife and child—Trial on charge relating to child—Admissibility of confession of murder of wife* [R. v. EVANS] . . . . . 610
- False pretences—Indictment—Need to state to whom pretences made—Larceny Act, 1916 (c. 50), s. 32 (1)—Indictments Act, 1915 (c. 90), s. 3 (2), sched. 1, appendix, form 12 [R. v. JOHNSTONE]* . . . . . 830
- Loitering with intent to commit a felony—Suspected person—Acts antecedent to the act occasioning the arrest—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (c. 83), s. 4 (as amended by Penal Servitude Act, 1891 (c. 69), s. 7) [PYBURN v. HUDSON]* . . . . . 1006
- Receiving stolen property—Innocent receipt—Later intention to appropriate property [R. v. MATTHEWS] . . . . . 137
- Sentence—Conviction by court of summary jurisdiction of indictable offence—Committal to quarter sessions for sentence—Offence not triable on indictment at quarter sessions—No power to sentence at quarter sessions—Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906 (c. 34), s. 1, s. 2—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 29 (3) (a) [R. v. MIDDLESEX QUARTER SESSIONS. Ex parte DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS] . . . . . 916
- Corrective training—Difference between imprisonment and corrective training—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 21 (1) [R. v. LEDGER]* . . . . . 1104
- Preventive detention—Supervision order—Previous convictions—Admission—Need to caution prisoner—Notice of intention to prove conviction—Need to give notice to produce notice—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), ss. 21 (1), 22 (1), 23 (1) [PRACTICE NOTE. CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT, 1948]* . . . . . 37

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | PAGE |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------|
| CRIMINAL LAW — continued .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |      |
| Suspected person— Previous convictions — Character not known to police before arrest — Vagrancy Act, 1824 (c. 83), s. 4 [R. v. CLARKE] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 546  |
| Trial— Irregularity — Communication from jury to judge — Answer given in absence of prisoner [R. v. GREEN] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 38   |
| Communication from jury to judge — Jury's question while considering verdict — Answer by judge — Question and answer not announced in court until after verdict and discharge of jury — Irregularity not going to root of case [R. v. FURLONG] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 636  |
| Juror— Disqualification — "Attainted of felony" — Conviction of receiving — "Free pardon" — Liability of jurymen to serve if name in jurors book, although entitled to exemption — When court will order venire de novo — Juries Act, 1870 (c. 77), s. 10 — Juries Act, 1922 (c. 11), s. 2 (1) [R. v. KELLY] .. .. .                                                                                                                 | 806  |
| Sentence— Several prisoners charged — One prisoner pleading Guilty — Other prisoners tried later — All prisoners to be sentenced together [R. v. PAYNE] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 102  |
| CROWN                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |      |
| Relief against the Crown— Interlocutory proceedings — Declaration in lieu of injunction — Crown Proceedings Act, 1947 (c. 44), s. 21 (1) (a) [UNDERHILL v. MINISTRY OF FOOD] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 591  |
| CRUELTY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |      |
| Divorce proceedings, in. See DIVORCE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |      |
| CURRENCY CONTROL                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |      |
| Loan in foreign currency— Promise to repay in sterling — Parties resident in foreign country in military occupation of enemy — Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. &amp; O., 1939 No. 950), reg. 2 (1) [BOISSEVAIN v. WELL] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 728  |
| CUSTODY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |      |
| Child— Failure to obey order . See CONTEMPT OF COURT.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |      |
| See also INFANT.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |      |
| DAMAGE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |      |
| Special damage— Pleading . See PLEADING.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |      |
| DAMAGES                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |      |
| Available for distribution in bankruptcy— Claim by bankrupt for damage to reputation and property — Settlement of action — Apportionment of agreed damages [Re KAVANAGH] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 39   |
| Co-respondent, against. See DIVORCE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |      |
| Measure of damages— Agreement to grant lease — Breach through defect of title — No lack of good faith [J. W. CAFES, LTD. v. BROWNLOW TRUST, LTD.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 894  |
| Special damages — Personal injuries — Fees paid to nursing home — Deduction of hotel expenses not incurred by plaintiff [SHEARMAN v. FOLLAND] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 976  |
| DANGEROUS CARGO                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |      |
| See SHIPPING                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |      |
| DEATH DUTY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |      |
| See ESTATE DUTY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |      |
| DECLARATION                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |      |
| Crown, against— Interlocutory proceedings [UNDERHILL v. MINISTRY OF FOOD] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 591  |
| DECREE ABSOLUTE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |      |
| See DIVORCE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |      |
| DEED                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |      |
| Of charge. See CHARGE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |      |
| DEMURRAGE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |      |
| See SHIPPING.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |      |
| DE-RATING                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |      |
| See RATING.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |      |
| DERMATITIS                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |      |
| See INDUSTRIAL INJURY (Industrial disease).                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |      |
| DETINUE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |      |
| Demand for delivery— Instructions to despatch goods to specified destination [HESKELL v. CONTINENTAL EXPRESS, LTD.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 1033 |
| DEVISEE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |      |
| Purchaser or devisee— Option to purchase real property — Right of grantee to take property free from incumbrances [Re FISON'S WILL TRUSTS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 501  |
| DIVIDEND                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |      |
| See COMPANY.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |      |
| DIVORCE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |      |
| Adultery— Onus of proof — Charge of adultery by husband — Plea by wife that adultery committed without her consent during a rape on her by the co-respondent [REDPATH v. REDPATH AND MILLIGAN] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 600  |
| Standard of proof [GOWER v. GOWER] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 804  |
| Collusion— Negotiations as to maintenance during pendency of petition — Deposit of £2,000 with stakeholder before trial — Wife to receive money only if she proceeded with petition — Need to disclose to court negotiations for maintenance during pendency of proceedings — Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 178 (2) (iii) (as substituted by Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 4) [LOWNDES v. LOWNDES] .. .. . | 999  |
| Connivance— Encouragement of situations likely to lead to adultery — Only motive to obtain conclusive evidence [MANNING v. MANNING. FELLOWS v. FELLOWS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 602  |
| "Passive acquiescence" — Wife watched by husband — Act of adultery observed — No intervention by husband [MUDGE v. MUDGE AND HONEYSETT] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 607  |
| Contempt of court— Refusal to obey custody order . See CONTEMPT OF COURT.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |      |
| Costs— Order against respondent wife — Discretion and duty of judge — Effect of Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935 (c. 30), s. 1 [BARKER v. BARKER] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 812  |
| Poor person — Discretion to order poor person to pay opponent's costs unfettered — Order for payment of profit costs in "special circumstances" — R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 28 (1) and r. 31B (1) (2) [HUNTINGFORD v. HUNTINGFORD] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 785  |

DIVORCE

Costs—continued.

- Security for wife's costs*—Trial of issue after decree absolute—Jurisdiction of court to order security—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 523/L.9), r. 74 (2) [GOWER v. GOWER] . . . . . 27
- Cruelty*—Coitus interruptus [CACKETT (otherwise TRICE) v. CACKETT] . . . . . 677
- Standard of proof*—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 178 (2) (as substituted by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 4) [DAVIS v. DAVIS] . . . . . 40
- Damages*—Claim against co-respondent—Competence—Husband not domiciled in England [JACOBS v. JACOBS AND CEEN (CEEN v. JACOBS)] . . . . . 96
- Decree absolute*—Wife's petition on ground of adultery—Reconciliation after decree nisi—Resumption of cohabitation—Subsequent desertion by husband—Wife's application for decree absolute after more than a year—Need to disclose full facts—Notice to parties affected by charges—Jurisdiction of court—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 40 [ELWES v. ELWES] . . . . . 826
- Evidence*—Privilege—Meeting between parties and their solicitors with view to reconciliation—Admissibility of evidence of proceedings at meeting [BOSTOCK v. BOSTOCK] . . . . . 25
- Insanity*—Incurable unsoundness of mind—Period of "care and treatment"—Detention in approved hospital in pursuance of order made under Lunacy Act, 1890—Quarterly returns by medical officer not made within prescribed time—Returns not sent to Board of Control within prescribed time—Effect on detention order—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 176 (d) (as amended by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 2)—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 3 (a)—Mental Treatment Rules, 1930 (S.R. & O., 1930, No. 1083), r. 126 (1), (3) (as amended by the Mental Treatment (Emergency Provisions) Rules, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 1095)) [HAMBLIN v. HAMBLIN (by her Guardian)] . . . . . 35
- Jurisdiction*—Marriage already declared void ab initio by decree of court in Malta in 1944—Legal effect of decree—Petitioner husband domiciled in Malta until 1945—Marriage in England in 1931—Wife domiciled in England until marriage—Domicil of wife after purported marriage—Wife's claim to Maltese domicil founded on marriage [CHAPELLE v. CHAPELLE] . . . . . 236
- Maintenance*—Assessment—Factors to be considered—Conduct of parties—Guidance by trial judge—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 190 (1) [TRESTAIN v. TRESTAIN] . . . . . 618
- Wife entitled to maintenance under order made by justices*—Application to Divorce Court for maintenance while justices' order still in force—Election by wife—Waiver of right to order by Divorce Court—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 190 (2) [ROSS v. ROSS] . . . . . 654
- Petition*—Service by registered post—No acknowledgment—Need for substituted service—Probability that petition was received—Discretion to dispense with substituted service—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 8 (1), (2), (3), r. 10 [HEATH v. HEATH] . . . . . 877
- Practice*—Application for decree absolute by respondent—Suspicion of collusion—Representation of the King's Proctor—Hearing of evidence in open court [LOWNDES v. LOWNDES] . . . . . 999
- Restitution of conjugal rights*—Petitioner's refusal to share matrimonial home with mother-in-law—Departure from matrimonial home—Willingness to resume cohabitation elsewhere—Order that respondent "return home to the petitioner and render to her conjugal rights" [MUNRO v. MUNRO] . . . . . 832

DOCTOR

See MEDICAL PRACTITIONER.

DOG

- Road accident*—Sudden stopping of omnibus to avoid running over dog—Injury to passenger—Driver's duty to take reasonable care [PARKINSON v. LIVERPOOL CORPORATION] . . . . . 367

DOMICIL

- Widow*—Retention of domicil of husband [Re WALLACH (deceased)] . . . . . 199

EASEMENT

- Rent payable in respect of*—Deduction of tax—Right to excavate sand [GWYTHYR v. BOSLYMON QUARRIES, LTD.] . . . . . 384
- Right of way*—Interruption—Interruption in fact—Relevance of intention of interrupter—Rights of Way Act, 1932 (c. 45), s. 1 (1) (2) [LEWIS v. THOMAS] . . . . . 116

EDUCATION

- Infant aged more than sixteen years*—Continuation of payments under previous maintenance order—Application after cessation of order [NORMAN v. NORMAN] . . . . . 1082

ELECTRICITY SUPPLY

- Pylons*—Support—Right of electricity board to have condition imposed on mineral undertaker not to withdraw support [Re NAYLOR BENZON MINING CO., LTD.] . . . . . 518

EMERGENCY LEGISLATION

Copyright. See COPYRIGHT.

- Evacuation area*—Recovery of rent—Limitation of action—When time begins to run—Liabilities (War-time Adjustment) Act, 1941 (c. 24), s. 3 (1) (2)—Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1944 (c. 40), s. 2 (2)—Defence (Evacuated Areas) Regulations, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 1209) (as amended by S.R. & O., 1945, No. 1453), reg. 4A (1), reg. 4 (1), reg. 4A (1)—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 17 [BELL v. GOSDEN] . . . . . 266

ENCROACHMENT

Land, on. See LAND

ENEMY

- Enemy property*—Financial agreement between Great Britain and ex-enemy Power—Action by ex-enemy Power to enforce agreement—Competence—Financial Agreement, Apr. 17, 1947 (Treaty Series, No. 31, 1947, Annex to No. 6), arts. 1, 2, 5 [REPUBLIC OF ITALY v. HAMBROS BANK, LTD.] . . . . . 430
- See also ALIEN.

EQUITY.

- Unconscionable bargain with expectant heir*—Bills of exchange given by reversioner for small consideration—Sale of reversion—Subsequent renewal of bills from time to time—Loss of right to application of equitable doctrine [LEVIN v. ROTH] . . . . . 698

ESTATE AGENT

See AGENT.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | PAGE |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------|
| ESTATE DUTY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |      |
| Continuing annuity— Bequest of annuity for joint lives and life of survivor—Property passing on death of first of beneficiaries to die—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 1, s. 2 (1) (b) [Re DUKE OF NORFOLK'S WILL TRUSTS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 664  |
| Determination of life interest— Exclusion of deceased from benefit "by contract or otherwise"—"Property in which the interest subsisted"—Transfer of assets of settlement to company for cash payable partly by instalments—Trustees transferring some cash and title to instalments to life tenant absolutely—Trustees and life tenant purchasing shares of company—Extinguishment of life tenant's interest in assets remaining settled—Application of "statutory hypothesis"—Finance Act, 1940 (c. 29), s. 43 (1), (2), s. 56 (1), (2) [ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ST. AUBYN (L.M.) (No. 2)] .. .. . | 951  |
| Successive dispositions of life interest— Transfer of life interest to company—Transfer of assets by company to new company—Life interest merging with reversion by virtue of ultimate disposition by new company—Life tenant owning all issued capital of new company at date of ultimate disposition—Exclusion of benefit to "person who had interest"—Guarantee of payment of annuity—Finance Act, 1940 (c. 29), ss. 43 (1), (2), 56 (1), (2) [ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ST. AUBYN (SIR JOHN MOLESWORTH)] .. .. .                                                                                   | 79   |
| Property deemed to pass— Annuity purchased from trustees of son's marriage settlement—Liability on annuitant's death—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), ss. 2 (1) (c), 3 (1)—Finance Act, 1940 (c. 29), s. 44 (1) [Re EARL FITZWILLIAM'S AGREEMENT] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 191  |
| ESTOPPEL                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |      |
| Deduction of tax on payment of royalties— Recipient accepting deduction under mistake of law [GWYTHER v. BOSLYMON QUARRIES, LTD.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 384  |
| Rent restriction— Possession—Claim by landlord against tenant's widow—Allegation that tenant a contractual tenant—Claim and acceptance by landlord from tenant of statutory increases of rent [BAXTER v. ECKERSLEY] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 139  |
| EVACUATION AREA.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |      |
| Recovery of rent. See EMERGENCY LEGISLATION.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |      |
| EVIDENCE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |      |
| Divorce— Privilege—Meeting between parties and their solicitors with view to reconciliation—Admissibility of evidence of proceedings at meeting [BOSTOCK v. BOSTOCK] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 25   |
| EXCESS PROFITS TAX                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |      |
| Deductions against profits— Deduction of Eire taxes against English profits—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, r. 3 (a)—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109), s. 14 (1) [INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. DOWDELL O'MAHONEY &amp; CO., LTD.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 961  |
| Deduction in assessing income tax— Adjustment of excess profits tax over five years—Right of taxpayer to deduct excess profits tax payable in each year and not merely the adjusted figure [INLAND REVENUE COMRS. v. JOHN DOW STUART, LTD.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 1    |
| EXECUTOR                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |      |
| Fund for payment of legacies and legacy duty— Whether payable out of residue or primarily out of lapsed share of residue [Re BEAUMONT'S WILL TRUSTS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 802  |
| EXTRADITION                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |      |
| Discharge of fugitive— Power of court to make order—Circumstances influencing exercise of power—"Unjust or oppressive or too severe a punishment to return the fugitive"—Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881 (c. 69), s. 10 [Re HENDERSON] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 283  |
| FACTORY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |      |
| Premises used for substantial repair of vehicle—"Running repairs" and "minor adjustments"— Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 151 (1) [GRIFFIN v. LONDON TRANSPORT EXECUTIVE] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 716  |
| FALSE PRETENCES                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |      |
| Obtaining money by. See CRIMINAL LAW.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |      |
| FAMILY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |      |
| Tenants', member of. See RENT RESTRICTION.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |      |
| FEES                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |      |
| Counsel. See COUNSEL.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |      |
| FELONY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |      |
| Loitering with intent to commit. See CRIMINAL LAW.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |      |
| FOOD AND DRUGS                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |      |
| Milk— Adulteration—Analyst's certificate—Conclusiveness—Analyst not required to be called by defence—Right to produce rebutting evidence—Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56), s. 81 (1) [PRESTON v. FENNELL] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 1099 |
| Proceedings against manufacturer— Nail found in sweet—Absence of negligence—Liability of manufacturer—Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56), ss. 3 (1), 83 (3) [LINDLEY v. GEORGE W. HORNER &amp; CO., LTD.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 234  |
| Selling to the prejudice of the purchaser— Information—Validity—Charge of selling food "not of the nature or not of the substance or not of the quality demanded"—Disclosure of more than one offence—Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56), s. 3 (1) [BASTIN v. DAVIES] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 1095 |
| FOOTBALL POOL                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |      |
| See GAMING.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |      |
| FOREIGN STATE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |      |
| Impleading. See CONFLICT OF LAWS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |      |
| FOREIGNER                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |      |
| See ALIEN.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |      |
| FORFEITURE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |      |
| Lease. See LANDLORD AND TENANT.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |      |
| Settlement— Receiver in lunacy of life tenant's property appointed—Percentage charged on estate of lunatic [Re WESTBY'S SETTLEMENT] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 479  |
| Will, under. See WILL.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |      |
| FREE PASSAGE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |      |
| Highway— Interruption—Cyclist struck by driver opening door of stationary motor car [WATSON v. LOWE] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 100  |

FRIENDLY SOCIETY

- Accounts of officers—Neglect to deliver—Order by justices to deliver—Decision of justices "final and conclusive"—No appeal by Case Stated—Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (c. 25), s. 55 (2) [HALL v. ARNOLD] .. .. . 993

FUGITIVE OFFENDER

See EXTRADITION.

FURNITURE

- Storage for reward, personal contract [EDWARDS v. NEWLAND (E. BURCHETT, LTD., Third Parties)] 1072

GAMING

- Account stated—Action brought on—Competence [LAW v. DEARNLEY] .. .. . 124
 Common gaming house—Special warrant of arrest and search—Person not found on premises—Subsequent arrest elsewhere—Destruction of gaming instruments—Validity of order—Gaming Act, 1845 (c. 109), ss. 3, 8 [COUGHTREY v. PORTER] .. .. . 257
 Deed executed for illegal consideration—Betting debt secured by deed of charge—Covenant to repay—Claim to repayment under bare covenant—Gaming Act, 1835 (c. 41), s. 1—R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A [WILLIAM HILL (PARK LANE), LTD. v. HOFMAN] .. .. . 1013
 Pool betting—Football pools—Collector appointed by promoters—House used to receive coupons and stake money—Offence against statute—Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934 (c. 58), s. 3 (2) [ZEIDMAN v. OWEN] .. .. . 290

GAMING INSTRUMENTS

Destruction. See GAMING.

GATE

- Railway level crossing—Duty to close gates—Accommodation road converted into public highway [COPPS v. PAYNE] .. .. . 246

HEALTH

National Health Service. See NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE.

HEIR

Unconscionable bargain with expectant heir. See UNCONSCIONABLE BARGAIN.

HIGHWAY

Accident on. See NEGLIGENCE.

- Interruption of free passage—Cyclist struck by driver opening door of stationary motor car—Highway Act, 1835 (c. 50), s. 78 [WATSON v. LOWE] .. .. . 100
"Wilful obstruction"—Highway Act, 1835 (c. 50), s. 72 [EATON v. COBB] .. .. . 1016
 Stopping up—Town and country planning—Power of Minister of Transport to override statute giving inhabitants right to use highway [HARLOW v. MINISTER OF TRANSPORT] .. .. . 898

HIRE PURCHASE

- Conversion—"Owners may terminate hiring" on default of hirer—Right to immediate possession of chattel hired—Need of notice [NORTH CENTRAL WAGON AND FINANCE CO., LTD. v. GRAHAM] 780
 Inducement to enter into agreement—Sale of motor car—Warranty as to condition by dealer to buyer—Car sold by dealer to finance company—Hire-purchase agreement between company and buyer—Action for damages by buyer against dealer [BROWN v. SHEEN & RICHMOND CAR SALES, LTD.] .. .. . 1102

HOSPITAL

See NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE.

HOUSE

Purchase price. See HOUSING.

HOUSING

- Moveable dwelling—License—Consideration of local amenities—Public Health Act, 1936 (c. 49), s. 269 (1), (2) [PILLING v. ABERGELE U.D.C.] .. .. . 76
 Purchase price—Limitation—House constructed under building licence—Sale of house at price in excess of permitted price—Knowledge of vendor's solicitors—Aiding and abetting—Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945 (c. 20), ss. 7 (1), 7 (5) [JOHNSON v. YOUDEN] .. .. . 300

IMPOTENCE

Nullity, ground for. See NULLITY.

INCOME TAX

- Compensation for loss of office—Abrogation of service agreement—Separate agreement for payment of compensation—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. E, r. 1 [HENLEY v. MURRAY (INSPECTOR OF TAXES)] .. .. . 908
Term in service agreement for payment on termination of service agreement—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. E, r. 1 [DALE v. DE SOISSONS] .. .. . 912
 Deduction—Excess profits tax—Adjustment of excess profits tax over five years—Right of taxpayer to deduct excess profits tax payable in each year and not merely the adjusted figure—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109), ss. 15 (2), 18 (1) [INLAND REVENUE COMRS. v. JOHN DOW STUART, LTD.] .. .. . 1
Royalties—Sand gotten—Deduction of tax by tenant—Landowner accepting deduction under mistake of law—Estoppel—Accord and satisfaction—Later objection to deduction—"Difference . . . with regard to the deduction"—Jurisdiction of court—Rent payable in respect of easement—Recoupment of rent by reduction of royalties—Excess rent under short lease—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), All Schedules Rules, r. 22 (1) (a)—Finance Act, 1934 (c. 32), s. 21 (1) (a)—Finance Act, 1940 (c. 29) s. 15 (1) [GWYTHYR v. BOSLYMON QUARRIES, LTD.] 384
 Exemption—Superannuation contribution—"Ordinary annual contribution"—Payment of back contributions by annual instalments—Finance Act, 1921 (c. 32), s. 32 (1)—Regulations dated Nov. 10, 1921 (S.R. & O., 1921, No. 1699), reg. 5 [KNEEN (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. ASHTON] 982

INCORPOREAL HEREDITAMENT

- Inclusion in devise of "land"—Tithe rentcharge [Re LORY'S WILL TRUSTS] .. .. . 349

INDICTMENT

See CRIMINAL LAW.

INDUSTRIAL DISEASE

See INDUSTRIAL INJURY; WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION.

INDUSTRIAL HEREDITAMENT

De-rating. See RATING.

INDUSTRIAL INJURY

Industrial disease—Dermatitis—Attack before July 5, 1948—Recurrence after that date—Workman insured under National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946—Right of workman to workmen's compensation—National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946 (c. 62), s. 89 (1), proviso (a) [HALES v. BOLTON LEATHERS, LTD.] . . . . . 149

INFANT

Bankruptcy—Jurisdiction to make receiving order against infant [Re A DEBTOR (No. 564 of 1949)] . . . . . 308
 Custody—Orphan—Religious upbringing—Conflict between grandparents—Father's direction as to religion of child—Welfare of child paramount consideration—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925 (c. 45), s. 1 [Re COLLINS (AN INFANT)] . . . . . 1057
 Maintenance—Education or training—Infant aged more than sixteen—Continuation of payments under previous order—Application after cessation of order—Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949 (c. 99), s. 2 (2) [NORMAN v. NORMAN] . . . . . 1082

INFRA-RED RAYS

Photography, use in. See PHOTOGRAPH.

INNOCENT MISREPRESENTATION

See MISREPRESENTATION.

INSANITY

See DIVORCE.

INSTRUMENTS

Gaming—Destruction. See GAMING.

INSURANCE

Motor insurance—Driving uninsured vehicle. See STREET TRAFFIC.

INTEREST

Damages—Collision at sea—Collision during war between British ship and ship belonging to enemy alien—Damages awarded to alien at end of hostilities—Time from which interest accrues—Date of collision [THE BERWICKSHIRE] . . . . . 699

INTERPLEADER

Claim—Power of master to bar—Signature to claim by director of company in wrong capacity—Validity of claim—Competence of action by claimants against execution creditors—R.S.C., Ord. 57, rr. 10, 16 (1) [J. R. P. PLASTICS, LTD. v. GORDON ROSSALL PLASTICS, LTD. (HEXA PEN CO., LTD., CLAIMANTS)] . . . . . 241
 Costs—Security—Issue directed—Parties in substance both claimants—Discretion of court—Corresponding security offered by respondent to application [TUDOR FURNISHERS, LTD. v. MONTAGUE & CO. AND FINER PRODUCTION CO., LTD.] . . . . . 65

INTOXICATING LIQUOR

Consumption during prohibited hours—Consumption by customers—Licensee unaware of offence—Aiding and abetting—Licensing Act, 1921, s. 4 (b) [THOMAS v. LINDOP] . . . . . 966

INVESTMENT CLAUSE

In will. See WILL.

INVITEE

Duty to. See NEGLIGENCE.

JOINT TENANCY

Will—Bequest—“Pay the income arising to my children in equal shares and after the death of all my children” to grandchildren then living [Re DAVIES (deceased.)] . . . . . 120

JUDGMENT

Judicial decision as authority—Ratio decidendi or obiter dictum—Decision based on more than one ground [JACOBS v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL] . . . . . 737
 Summary judgment—Leave to sign. See PRACTICE.

JUROR

Qualification—“Attained of felony”—Conviction of receiving—“Free pardon”—Liability of jurymen to serve if name in jurors book, although entitled to exemption [R. v. KELLY] . . . . . 806

JURY

Trial by—Right to—Offence triable summarily and also indictable at common law—Keeping a brothel [WAROQUIERS v. MARSDEN] . . . . . 93

JUSTICES

Case Stated. See CASE STATED.

Quarter sessions—Sentence—Conviction by court of summary jurisdiction of indictable offence—Committal to quarter sessions for sentence—Offence not triable at quarter sessions—No power to sentence at quarter sessions [R. v. MIDDLESEX QUARTER SESSIONS. Ex parte DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS] . . . . . 916
 Summary jurisdiction—Right to trial by jury—Offence triable summarily and also indictable at common law—Charge brought under Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (c. 69), s. 13 (1) [WAROQUIERS v. MARSDEN] . . . . . 93
Sentence—Conviction by court of summary jurisdiction of indictable offence—Committal to quarter sessions for sentence—Offence not triable at quarter sessions—No power to sentence at quarter sessions [R. v. MIDDLESEX QUARTER SESSIONS. Ex parte DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS] . . . . . 916

LAND

Encroachment on adjoining land by tenant of house—Purchase by tenant of house subject to tenancy—Sale by landlord of adjoining land—Right of purchaser of land to possession [KING v. SMITH] . . . . . 553
 Requisition. See REQUISITION (Land).

LAND DRAINAGE

Catchment board—Commutation of obligation to repair—Contractual obligation to keep ditch clean—Land Drainage Act, 1930 (c. 44), s. 9 (1) [ETON RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. RIVER THAMES CONSERVATORS] . . . . . 996

LANDLORD

Negligence—Liability—Defective paving of forecourt of shop—Forecourt in occupation of landlord—Shop let to tenant—Injury to customer—Invitee or licensee [JACOBS v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL] . . . . . 737

LANDLORD AND TENANT

- Covenant to repair—Breach—Measure of damages—Diminution to value of reversion—Cost of re-decoration—Repairs necessary to make premises fit for re-letting—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 18 (1) [JONES v. HERXHEIMER] . . . . . 323
- Lease—Agreement to grant—Breach through defect of title—No lack of good faith—Measure of damages [J. W. CAFES, LTD. v. BROWNLOW TRUST, LTD.] . . . . . 894
- Forfeiture—Breach of covenant—Suffering premises to be used as a brothel—User by sub-tenant—Knowledge of tenant—Imputation of knowledge—Relief—Exercise of discretion of court—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 146 (2) [BORTHWICK-NORTON v. ROMNEY WARWICK ESTATES, LTD.] . . . . . 362, 798
- Renewal—Perpetual right of renewal—Lease for three years with option to renew for further period of three years on same terms “including the present covenant for renewal”—Law of Property Act, 1922 (c. 16), s. 145, sched. XV, para. 5 [Re GREENWOOD'S AGREEMENT] . . . . . 436
- Repair—Covenant to repair—Breach—Landlord's intention to pull down premises—Onus on tenant to prove definite decision or intention—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 18 (1) [CUNLIFFE v. GOODMAN] . . . . . 720
- Requisition—Land—Requisition during lease—Covenant to repair—Breach—Measure of damages—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 18 (1) [SMILEY v. TOWNSHEND] . . . . . 530

LEASE

See LANDLORD AND TENANT.

LEGACY

See WILL.

LEGITIMATION

- Legitimation per subsequens matrimonium—Marriage to third person at date of birth of illegitimate person—Onus of proof—Presumption as to continuance of life—Legitimacy Act, 1926 (c. 60), s. 1 (2) [MACDARMAID v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL] . . . . . 497

LEVEL CROSSING

See RAILWAY.

LIBEL

- Privilege—Qualified privilege—Malice—Evidence—Expression of opinion—Opinion actuated by financial considerations—Right of defence against written attack—Procedure at trial [TURNER (otherwise ROBERTSON) v. METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER PICTURES] . . . . . 449

LICENCE

Moveable dwelling. See MOVEABLE DWELLING.

Ship repairs. See SHIP.

LICENSEE

Duty to. See NEGLIGENCE.

LIFE

- Presumption as to continuance [MACDARMAID v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL] . . . . . 497

LIGHT LOCOMOTIVE

See STREET TRAFFIC.

LOADING

Ship. See SHIPPING (Charterparty).

LOADING BROKER

- Negligent issue of bill of lading—Goods not received at dock—Liability of broker [HESKELL v. CONTINENTAL EXPRESS, LTD.] . . . . . 1033

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

- Superannuation—Decision of claim by “authority concerned”—Scheme administered by county council—Employees of rural district council entitled to participate—Claim to annual superannuation allowance by former employee of rural district council—Claim admitted by rural district council, but rejected by county council—Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937 (c. 68), s. 35 [WALTER v. ETON RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL] . . . . . 795

LOITERING

With intent to commit felony. See CRIMINAL LAW.

LUNATIC

Distribution of estate. See ADMINISTRATION.

- Settlement—Forfeiture clause—Receiver of life tenant's property appointed—Percentage charged on lunatic's estate [Re WESTBY'S SETTLEMENT] . . . . . 479

MAINTENANCE

See DIVORCE; INFANT.

MALTA

- Marriage—Decree declaring marriage void—Effect—Petitioner husband domiciled in Malta until 1945—Marriage in England in 1931—Wife domiciled in England until marriage—Domicil of wife after purported marriage—Wife's claim to Maltese domicile founded on marriage [CHAPELLE v. CHAPELLE] . . . . . 236

MANDAMUS

- Quarter sessions—Refusal to state Case—Power of High Court to issue mandamus [R. v. SOMERSET JUSTICES. Ex parte ERNEST J. COLE & PARTNERS, LTD.] . . . . . 264

MARRIAGE

Consummation—Wilful refusal to consummate. See NULLITY.

See also DIVORCE.

MASTER AND SERVANT

- Duty of master—Proper system of working—Extent of master's duty—Need to give instructions—Question for decision [WINTER v. CARDIFF RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL] . . . . . 819

MEASURE OF DAMAGES

See DAMAGES.

MEDICAL PRACTITIONER

National Health Service. See NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | PAGE |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------|
| METROPOLIS                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |      |
| Street trading— Application to designate street—Earlier designating resolution rescinded—No right to apply anew—London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1947 (c. xlv), s. 16 [R. v. BERMONDSEY BOROUGH COUNCIL. Ex parte LEONARD] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                         | 1069 |
| MILK                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |      |
| Adulteration. See FOOD AND DRUGS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |      |
| Premises used for cleaning and cooling— Rateability [WILTSHIRE COUNTY VALUATION COMMITTEE v. LONDON CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY, LTD.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 937  |
| MINE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |      |
| Coal mine— Shot firing—Breach of statutory duty by shot firer—Liability of mine-owner, manager, and under manager—General Regulations, 1913 (S.R. &amp; O., 1913, No. 748), reg. 1, made under Coal Mines Act, 1911 (c. 50), s. 86 (1)—Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934 (S.R. &amp; O., 1934, No. 6), cl. 2 (e) [HARRISON v. NATIONAL COAL BOARD] .. .. .                                                         | 171  |
| Minerals— Right to work—Grant by Minister of Fuel and Power—Compensation—"Fair and reasonable between a willing grantor and a willing grantee"—Right of electricity board to have condition imposed on mineral undertaker not to withdraw support from pylons on the land—Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923 (c. 20), s. 8 (1), s. 9 (2), s. 11 [Re NAYLOR BENZON MINING CO., LTD.] .. .. .             | 518  |
| MINERALS                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |      |
| Right to work. See MINE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |      |
| MISREPRESENTATION                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |      |
| Innocent misrepresentation— Sale of goods—Misrepresentation as to quality of article sold—Rescission of contract—Acceptance by buyer of delivery—Claim to rescind contract after five years [LEAF v. INTERNATIONAL GALLERIES] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                 | 693  |
| MORTGAGE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |      |
| Deed executed for illegal consideration— Betting debt secured by deed—Covenant to repay [WILLIAM HILL (PARK LANE), LTD. v. HOFMAN] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 1013 |
| MOTOR SPIRIT                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |      |
| Commercial petrol in tank of private car— Prima facie evidence—Analysis—Result possibly produced by derivatives of diphenylamine—Motor Spirit (Regulation) Act, 1948 (c. 34), s. 2 (1) [TAYLOR v. CIECIEFSKI] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 319  |
| MOTOR VEHICLE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |      |
| See STREET TRAFFIC.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |      |
| MOVEABLE DWELLING                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |      |
| Licence— Consideration of local amenities [PILLING v. ABERGELE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL] ..                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 76   |
| MURDER                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |      |
| Evidence— Confession—Confession of two murders—Admissibility on trial for one murder of confession relating to the other [R. v. EVANS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 610  |
| NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |      |
| Hospital— Legacy to hospital—Destruction of object—Vesting of hospital in Minister of Health after date of will but before death of testatrix [Re MORGAN'S WILL TRUSTS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 1097 |
| Transfer of property and endowment—"Held by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital"—Power of trustees to divert property and endowment to other charitable purposes—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 6 (1), s. 7 (4) [MINISTRY OF HEALTH v. FOX] .. .. .                                                                                                                                      | 1050 |
| Medical practitioner— Compensation for loss of right to sell practice—Assessment—"Calculated by reference to the last two accounting years immediately preceding the appointed day"—Powers of arbitrator—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 36 (1)—National Health Service (Medical Practices Compensation) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1506), reg. 7 (2) (a) [CARTER v. MINISTER OF HEALTH] .. .. . | 904  |
| Assessment—"Last two accounting years immediately preceding the appointed day"—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 36 (1)—National Health Service (Medical Practices Compensation) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1506), reg. 2 (1), reg. 7 (2) [R. v. MINISTER OF HEALTH. Ex parte DINGLE] .. .. .                                                                                                      | 875  |
| NEGLIGENCE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |      |
| Club— Unincorporated members' club—Member injured by fall down unlighted steps—Liability of committee—Liability of steward [PROLE v. ALLEN] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 476  |
| Driving of motor vehicle— Sudden stopping of omnibus to avoid running over dog—Injury to passenger—Driver's duty to take reasonable care [PARKINSON v. LIVERPOOL CORPORATION] ..                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 367  |
| Invitee— Duty of occupier—Protection against "unusual danger"—Workman falling from staging—Workman's knowledge that staging faulty—No contributory negligence—Defence of volenti non fit injuria not available on evidence [HORTON v. LONDON GRAVING DOCK CO., LTD.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                          | 180  |
| Licencee— Child—Trap—Waste land used for tipping—Child falling down sloping bank and being injured by broken glass [WILLIAMS v. CARDIFF CORPORATION] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 250  |
| Liability of landlord—Defective paving of forecourt of shop—Forecourt in occupation of landlord—Shop let to tenant—Injury to customer—Invitee or licensee [JACOBS v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 737  |
| Licensor's "actual knowledge" of danger—Knowledge of potential danger—Public convenience—Injury caused by children tampering with grille—Liability of local authority [PEARSON v. LAMBETH BOROUGH COUNCIL] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 682  |
| Personal injuries— Measure of damages—Fees paid to nursing home—Deduction of hotel expenses not incurred by plaintiff [SHEARMAN v. FOLLAND] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 976  |
| Res ipsa loquitur— Highway—Omnibus—Accident due to tyre burst—Impact fracture of tyre—Supervision of condition of tyre—Duty of owners of vehicle—Breach of regulation—Right of action—Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1941 (S.R. &amp; O., 1941, No. 398), reg. 71 [BARKWAY v. SOUTH WALES TRANSPORT CO., LTD.] .. .. .                                                                            | 392  |
| Ship— Invitee—Injury to employee of independent contractor during ship's trial—Ship under command of employee of ship builders—Negligence of purchaser's servants on board—Common interest of shipbuilders and purchasers in success of trial—Control of purchaser's servants by shipbuilders' employee—Liability of shipbuilders [HOBSON v. BARTRAM &amp; SONS, LTD.] .. .. .                                        | 412  |
| NEW TRIAL                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |      |
| Court of appeal— Further evidence—Power of Court of Appeal to order new trial [WEINBAUM v. KLEIN] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 353  |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| NUISANCE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |     |
| Defective paving of forecourt adjoining highway—Need to cross forecourt to reach shop—Injury to customer leaving highway to visit shop—Liability of occupier of forecourt [JACOBS v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL]                                                                                                                                                                 | 737 |
| Statutory nuisance. See PUBLIC HEALTH.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |     |
| NULLITY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |     |
| Impotence—Sole evidence of petitioner—Need of corroboration [HODGKINS v. HODGKINS]                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 619 |
| Wilful refusal to consummate marriage—Coitus interruptus—Cruelty [CAKETT (OTHERWISE TRICE) v. CAKETT]                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 677 |
| OCCUPIER                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |     |
| Duty to invitee—Protection against "unusual danger." See NEGLIGENCE (Invitee).                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |     |
| OFFICE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |     |
| Loss of—Compensation [HENLEY v. MURRAY (INSPECTOR OF TAXES)]                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 908 |
| [DALE v. DE SOISSONS]                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 912 |
| OMNIBUS                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |     |
| Accident due to tyre burst—Supervision of condition of tyre—Duty of owners of vehicle [BARKWAY v. South WALES TRANSPORT CO., LTD.]                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 392 |
| OPTION                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |     |
| Will, under. See WILL.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |     |
| PEDESTRIAN CROSSING                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |     |
| See STREET TRAFFIC.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |     |
| PENSION                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |     |
| Breach of contract to pay—Service of writ out of jurisdiction—Breach within jurisdiction—Proof of such breach—Contract made in Czechoslovakia—Pension payable in England [KORNER v. WITKOWITZER BERGHAU UND EISENHUETTEN GEWERKSCHAFT]                                                                                                                                      | 558 |
| PERPETUITIES                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |     |
| Gift rendering capital inalienable—Gift of income to non-charitable association "until vivisection shall be made a punishable offence"—Gift over to Royal Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals—Validity of gift and gift over—Contingency [Re WIGHTWICK'S WILL TRUSTS]                                                                                              | 689 |
| Settlement—Limitation dependent on void limitation—Accord with previous valid limitations—"Issue" [Re MILL'S DECLARATION OF TRUST]                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 789 |
| PERSONAL INJURIES                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |     |
| See NEGLIGENCE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |     |
| PETROL                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |     |
| See MOTOR SPIRIT.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |     |
| PHOTOGRAPH                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |     |
| Infra-red rays—Use to ascertain words of codicil under pasted-on slips—Whether words "apparent" before alteration [Re ITTER (deceased)]                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 68  |
| PLANNING                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |     |
| See TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |     |
| PLEADING                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |     |
| Amendment—Claim made by writ omitted from statement of claim—Revival of claim [HARRIES v. ASHFORD]                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 427 |
| Damage—Special damage—Wrongful dismissal—Remuneration during period of alleged contractual notice [HAYWARD v. PULLINGER & PARTNERS, LTD.]                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 581 |
| Delivery. See PRACTICE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |     |
| Striking out. See PRACTICE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |     |
| Unqualified person—Preparation by. See SOLICITOR.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |     |
| POOL BETTING                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |     |
| See GAMING.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |     |
| POOR PERSON                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |     |
| Costs. See DIVORCE (Costs—Poor Person).                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |     |
| POVERTY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |     |
| Relief—Charitable purpose. See CHARITY.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |     |
| POWER OF APPOINTMENT                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |     |
| General or special power—"In trust for such persons or person not being her husband" as daughter should appoint—Purported exercise of power by spinster daughter in favour of charity—Validity [Re HARVEY (deceased)]                                                                                                                                                       | 491 |
| PRACTICE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |     |
| Pleading—Time for delivery—Order dismissing action unless statement of claim be served on or before specified date—Delivery after 4 p.m. on specified date—R.S.C., Ord. 64, r. 11 [KAYE v. LEVINSON]                                                                                                                                                                        | 594 |
| See also PLEADING.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |     |
| Service—Service out of jurisdiction—Action for account and payment of commission—Breach of contract committed within the jurisdiction—English company acting as American company's agent in Europe—Commission payable in England—Duty to render account in England—Prima facie case—R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e) [INTERNATIONAL CORPORATION, LTD. v. BESSER MANUFACTURING Co.] | 355 |
| Breach of contract committed within jurisdiction—Proof of such breach—Contract to pay pension—Contract made in Czechoslovakia—Pension payable in England—R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e)—R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4 [KORNER v. WITKOWITZER BERGHAU UND EISENHUETTEN GEWERKSCHAFT]                                                                                                      | 558 |
| Striking out pleading—Order of Court of Appeal—Reliance on decision at nisi prius—Gaming debt—Action brought as on an account stated—Gaming Act, 1892 (c. 9), s. 1—R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4 [LAW v. DEARNLEY]                                                                                                                                                                  | 124 |
| Summary judgment—Leave to sign judgment—Set-off and counterclaim—Bill of exchange given in pursuance of contract—Claim by defendants for damages for breach—R.S.C., Ord. 14, r. 1 [JAMES LAMONT & Co., LTD. v. HYLAND, LTD. (No. 2)]                                                                                                                                        | 929 |
| PREVENTIVE DETENTION                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |     |
| See CRIMINAL LAW (Sentence).                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |     |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | PAGE    |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------|
| PRIVILEGE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |         |
| Evidence. See EVIDENCE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |         |
| Qualified. See LIBEL.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |         |
| PROBATE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |         |
| Costs— Administrator pending suit —Costs of administration and remuneration of administrator—Possible benefit of administration to estate—Apportionment between estate and party bringing proceedings [ Re HOWLETT (deceased) ] . . . . .                                                                                   | 485     |
| PROCESSION                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |         |
| Prohibited. See PUBLIC ORDER.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |         |
| PUBLIC HEALTH                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |         |
| Statutory nuisance— Abatement notice specifying manner in which nuisance to be abated —Validity—Power of justices to make nuisance order in terms other than those of abatement notice— Public Health Act, 1936 (c. 49), s. 93, s. 94 (1) (2), s. 95 (1) [ McGILLIVRAY v. STEPHENSON ] . . . . .                     | 942     |
| PUBLIC ORDER                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |         |
| Preservation—Prohibition of processions—"Organising" procession—Procession formed spontaneously—Subsequently led and directed by an individual— Public Order Act, 1936 (c. 6), s. 3 (4) [ FLOCKHART v. ROBERTSON ] . . . . .                                                                                                | 1091    |
| PURCHASE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |         |
| Purchaser or devisee—Option to purchase real property—Right of grantee to take property free from incumbrances [ Re FISON'S WILL TRUSTS ] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                | 501     |
| QUALIFIED PRIVILEGE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |         |
| See LIBEL.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |         |
| QUARTER SESSIONS                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |         |
| Case Stated. See CASE STATED.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |         |
| QUOTA                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |         |
| Contract—Implied term that contract subject to quota—Shipment of jute—Export subject to quota—Contract not expressed to be subject to quota [ K. C. SETHIA (1944), LTD. v. PARTABMULL RAMESHWAR ] . . . . .                                                                                                                        | 51      |
| RAILWAY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |         |
| Level crossing—Gate—Duty to close—Accommodation road converted into public highway— Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (c. 20), ss. 47, 75 [ COFFEY v. PAYNE ] . . . . .                                                                                                                                               | 246     |
| RAPE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |         |
| Adultery—Charge by husband—Plea by wife that adultery committed without her consent during a rape on her by the co-respondent—Onus of proof [ REDPATH v. REDPATH AND MILLIGAN ] . . . . .                                                                                                                                          | 600     |
| RATES                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |         |
| Agricultural land—Field used for grazing and turf cutting—Rating and Valuation ( Apportionment Act, 1928 (c. 44), s. 2 (2) )— Local Government Act, 1929 (c. 17), s. 67 (1) [ MERIDEN AND SOLIHULL RATING AUTHORITY v. TYACKE ] . . . . .                                                                            | 939     |
| "Nursery grounds"—Turf cutting—Rating and Valuation ( Apportionment Act, 1928 (c. 8), s. 2 (2) )— Local Government Act, 1929 (c. 17), s. 67 (1) [ BUTSER TURF AND TIMBER CO., LTD. v. PETERSFIELD RATING AUTHORITY ] . . . . .                                                                                       | 288     |
| Assessment—Wireless relay service—Valuation on profits basis [ AMALGAMATED RELAYS, LTD. v. BURNLEY RATING AUTHORITY ] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 253     |
| Zoological gardens—Valuation on profits basis—Exceptional hereditament—Factors to be considered—Receipts from employment of tenant's capital—Gains from hiring out animals—Profits tax [ SURREY COUNTY VALUATION COMMITTEE v. CHESSINGTON ZOO, LTD. ] . . . . .                                                                    | 154     |
| Bankruptcy—"Debt" as basis for petition—Arrears of rates [ Re MCGREAVY ] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 30, 442 |
| De-rating—Industrial hereditament—Adapting for sale—Cleaning and cooling of milk for transport—Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (c. 22), s. 149 (1) (c) (iii)—Rating and Valuation ( Apportionment Act, 1928 (c. 44), s. 3 (1) ) [ WILTSHIRE COUNTY VALUATION COMMITTEE v. LONDON CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY, LTD. ] . . . . .      | 937     |
| Water. See WATER SUPPLY.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |         |
| REAL PROPERTY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |         |
| Option, in will, to purchase. See WILL.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |         |
| RECEIVING ORDER                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |         |
| See BANKRUPTCY.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |         |
| RECEIVING STOLEN PROPERTY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |         |
| See CRIMINAL LAW.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |         |
| RELIGION                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |         |
| Orphan child—Upbringing—Conflict between grandparents—Father's direction as to religion of child—Welfare of child paramount consideration [ Re COLLINS (AN INFANT) ] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                     | 1057    |
| RENT                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |         |
| Evacuation area, in—Recovery [ BELL v. GOSDEN ] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 266     |
| RENT CONTROL                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |         |
| Application of Rent Control Act—Retrospective effect—Proceedings for possession commenced by landlord and case heard before coming into operation of Act—Judgment reserved—No order made until after Act in operation—"Anything done"—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 10 [ JONAS v. ROSENBERG ] . . . . . | 296     |
| Rent tribunal—Procedure—Need to hear parties or evidence—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 1 (1)—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Regulations, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 1096), regs. 4, 5, 8 (1) [ R. v. BRIGHTON AND AREA RENT TRIBUNAL. Ex parte MARINE PARADE ESTATES (1936), LTD. ] . . . . .             | 946     |
| RENT RESTRICTION                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |         |
| Alternative accommodation—Sub-tenant of part of house purchasing reversion—Whether part of house occupied by tenant suitable alternative accommodation as compared with whole house—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 3 (1) (b) [ PARMEE v. MITCHELL ] . . . . .                           | 872     |
| Death of tenant—"Member of tenant's family"—Niece of tenant's wife—Nursing of tenant and wife for substantial period—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (g) [ JONES v. WHITEHILL ] . . . . .                                                                                       | 71      |

RENT RESTRICTION—continued.

- "Dwelling-house"—Premises comprising house and cottage, contiguous but without internal communication—Covenant by tenant, in original tenancy agreement, to use "the premises as a private dwelling-house only"—Cottage sub-let by tenant—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 16 (1)—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), s. 3 (1), s. 3 (3) [WHITTY v. SCOTT-RUSSELL] . . . . . 884
- Permitted increase—Transfer of burden—Covenant by landlord to provide service previously supplied voluntarily—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 2 (3). [ASHER v. SEAFORD COURT ESTATES, LTD.] . . . . . 1018
- Personal occupation—Tenant unable to live in house owing to illness—Intention to return—House kept in readiness for return—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 3 (1) [WIGLEY v. LEIGH] . . . . . 73
- Possession—Claim as landlord for own occupation—Grantee of head-lease subject to tenant's tenancy—Grantor a purchaser after Sept. 1, 1939—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), sched. 1, para. (h) (as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1) and sched. 1) [LUCAS v. LINEHAM] . . . . . 586
- Claim by landlord against tenant's widow—Allegation that tenant a contractual tenant—Claim and acceptance by landlord from tenant of statutory increases of rent—No statutory notice of increase—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (g) [BAXTER v. ECKERSLEY] . . . . . 139
- "Conduct which is a nuisance or annoyance to adjoining occupiers"—Evidence—User of premises by tenant for immoral purpose—No evidence from adjoining occupiers of actual nuisance or annoyance—Right to draw inference from user of premises—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 3 (1) (a), sched. 1, para. (b) [FREDERICK PLATTS CO., LTD. v. GRIGOR] . . . . . 941
- Dwelling-house let to husband—Subsequent desertion by husband—Wife remaining in occupation—Separate actions against husband and wife—No statutory ground pleaded by landlord—Husband's consent to possession [MIDDLETON v. BALDOCK] . . . . . 708
- House rendered uninhabitable by bomb—No loss of identity—Use by tenant for business purposes—Notice to quit served before repair [MORLEYS (BIRMINGHAM), LTD. v. SLATER] . . . . . 331
- Practice—Separate actions for possession against husband and wife—Consolidating actions—Joinder of parties in one action [MIDDLETON v. BALDOCK] . . . . . 708
- "Separate dwelling"—Common use of scullery between tenant and sub-tenant—Proceedings for possession commenced by landlord before June 2, 1949—Effect of Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), ss. 9, 10 [HUTCHINSON v. JAUNCEY] . . . . . 165
- Unfurnished tenancy—Sub-letting of one room, furnished, with use, in common with tenant, of kitchen—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 16 (1), sched. 1, para. (d)—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), s. 3 (2) (b) [BAKER v. TURNER] . . . . . 834
- Sub-letting—Dwelling-house let at rent less than two-thirds of rateable value—Sub-letting at rent more than two-thirds—Expiry of head-lease—Right of landlords to possession—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (7), s. 15 (3) [KNIGHTSBRIDGE ESTATES TRUST, LTD. v. DEELEY] . . . . . 577
- "Lawfully sub-let"—Sub-letting in breach of covenant—Acceptance by landlord of rent from head lessee after knowledge of breach—Qualified acceptance—Question of fact whether such acceptance to be treated as unequivocal act of affirmation of tenancy—"Unlawful sub-letting"—No right of re-entry—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 15 (3) [CARTER v. GREEN] . . . . . 627

RENT TRIBUNAL

See RENT CONTROL.

REPAIR

Liability of tenant. See LANDLORD AND TENANT.

Vehicles. See FACTORY.

REQUISITION

- Compensation—Damage to land—Work done on land—Air-raid shelter erected during possession by Crown—Shelter removed after possession yielded up—Period between return of possession and restoration to original condition—Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939 (c. 75), s. 3 (2)—Requisitioned Land and War Works Act, 1948 (c. 17), s. 11 (2) [J. LYONS & Co., LTD. v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR HOME AFFAIRS] . . . . . 280
- Land—Requisition during lease—Covenant to repair—Breach—Assessment of damages—Damage to reversion—"Damage" [SMILEY v. TOWNSHEND] . . . . . 530

RES IPSA LOQUITUR

See NEGLIGENCE.

RESTITUTION OF CONJUGAL RIGHTS

See DIVORCE.

RETROSPECTIVE EFFECT

Statute, of. See STATUTE.

REVERSION

- Damage to—Requisition of premises during lease—Breach of covenant to repair [SMILEY v. TOWNSHEND] . . . . . 530

RIGHT OF WAY

See EASEMENT.

ROAD TRAFFIC

See STREET TRAFFIC.

ROYALTY

- Income tax—Deduction of tax by payer of royalty—Legality [GWYTHYR v. BOSLYMON QUARRIES, LTD.] . . . . . 384

RULE AGAINST PERPETUITIES

See PERPETUITIES.

SALE OF GOODS

- Rescission of contract—Innocent misrepresentation as to quality of article sold—Acceptance by buyer of delivery—Claim to rescind contract after five years [LEAF v. INTERNATIONAL GALLERIES] . . . . . 693

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |             |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------|
| SALE OF GOODS—continued.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | PAGE |
| Time of performance of contract—Contract to build motor car body—Time of the essence—Original condition in regard to time waived—Subsequent notice fixing time for completion—Reasonableness—Conduct amounting to waiver [CHARLES RICKARDS, LTD. v. OPPENHEIM] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 420         |
| SALVAGE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |             |
| See SHIPPING.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |             |
| SECURITY FOR COSTS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |             |
| See COSTS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |             |
| SENTENCE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |             |
| See CRIMINAL LAW.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |             |
| SERVICE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |             |
| Bankruptcy petition. See BANKRUPTCY.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |             |
| Divorce petition. See DIVORCE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |             |
| Writ. See PRACTICE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |             |
| SETTLEMENT                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |             |
| Capital or income—Tenant for life and remainderman—Capital profits dividend—Profit on sale of company's assets—Company to continue as investment and holding company [Re SECHIARI (deceased)] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 417         |
| Forfeiture clause—Receiver in lunacy of life tenant's property appointed—Percentage charged on estate of lunatic—Lunacy Act, 1890 (c. 5), s. 148 (3) [Re WESTBY'S SETTLEMENT] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 479         |
| SHARE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |             |
| Will—Investment clause—"Shares of public company"—Inclusion of stock [Re BOYS' WILL TRUSTS] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 624         |
| Option to purchase. See WILL (Option—Share).                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |             |
| SHIP                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |             |
| Negligence in—Injury to persons working therein. See NEGLIGENCE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |             |
| Repairs—Licence—Need to be in writing—Oral permission given by Admiralty licensing officer—Legality—Restriction of Repairs of Ships Order, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 142), art. 1 [FALMOUTH BOAT CONSTRUCTION, LTD. v. HOWELL] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 538         |
| SHIPPING                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |             |
| Bill of lading—Negligent issue of bill of lading—Goods not received at dock—Liability of loading broker [HESKELL v. CONTINENTAL EXPRESS, LTD.] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 1033        |
| Charterparty—Dangerous cargo—Exclusion of "acids, explosives, arms, ammunition, or other dangerous cargo"—Turpentine—Ejusdem generis rule—Acceptance of cargo by master—Breach of charterparty by charterer—Liability to damages—Delay in unloading—Amount of damages—Limitation by terms of demurrage clause—U.S.A. Carriage of Goods Act, 1936, s. 4 (6) (Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 (c. 22), sched., art. IV, r. 6) [CHANDRIS v. ISBRANDTSEN-MOLLER Co. INC.] . . . . . | 768         |
| Demurrage—When ship "arrived"—Ship "to proceed to one or two safe ports East Canada or Newfoundland, place or places as ordered by charterers"—"Place"—Berth in port [STAG LINE, LTD. v. BOARD OF TRADE] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 516, 1105   |
| "Good and safe port"—Ship damaged by ice—Extraordinary risk—Liability of charterers [G. W. GRACE & Co., LTD. v. GENERAL STEAM NAVIGATION Co., LTD.] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 201         |
| Loading—"Ready to load"—Stowage space occupied by bunkers—Mainmast and after derricks not in position [NOEMI JULIA STEAMSHIP Co., LTD. v. MINISTER OF FOOD] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 985         |
| Collision—Damages—Interest—Collision during war between British ship and ship belonging to enemy alien—Damages awarded to alien at end of hostilities—Time from which interest accrues [THE BERWICKSHIRE] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 699         |
| Salvage—Distinction between towage and salvage—Onus of proof—Presumption of danger—Ship losing propeller—Towed to place of temporary safety—Towed to home port via ports at which repairs could be effected and alternative service available [THE TROILUS] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 103         |
| SHOP                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |             |
| Injury to customer—Defective paving of forecourt to shop—Forecourt in occupation of landlord of shop—Customer invitee or licensee [JACOBS v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 737         |
| SHOT FIRING                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |             |
| Coal mine, in—Safety regulations. See MINE (Coal Mine).                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |             |
| SOLICITOR                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |             |
| Unqualified person drawing instruments—"Expectation of . . . gain or reward"—Rent collector—Particulars of claim in county court actions for arrears of rent—Commission received in respect of all moneys recovered—No specific fee for drawing instrument—Solicitors Act, 1932 (c. 37), s. 47 (1) (as amended by Solicitors Act, 1941 (c. 46), s. 23 (1)) [FACEY v. ATKINSON] . . . . .                                                                                           | 320         |
| SPECIAL DAMAGE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |             |
| Pleading. See PLEADING.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |             |
| SPECIAL DAMAGES                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |             |
| See DAMAGES.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |             |
| STATE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |             |
| Foreign—Impleading. See CONFLICT OF LAWS.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |             |
| STATEMENT OF CLAIM                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |             |
| See PLEADING.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |             |
| STATUTE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |             |
| Retrospective effect—Pending proceedings—Disturbance of existing rights [HUTCHINSON v. JAUNCEY] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 165         |
| Statute coming into force after hearing of action, but before judgment—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 10 [JONAS v. ROSENBERG] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 296         |
| STATUTORY NUISANCE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |             |
| See PUBLIC HEALTH.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |             |
| STIRPES, PER                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |             |
| Division of fund—"Equally between the children of my deceased sister T. and the said F.H."—Children of different generation from that of testatrix, T., and F.H. [Re BIRKETT] . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 316         |
| STOPPING UP                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |             |
| Highway. See HIGHWAY.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |             |

STREET TRADINGMetropolis. See METROPOLIS.STREET TRAFFIC

- Accident—Sudden stopping of omnibus to avoid running over dog—Injury to passenger—Driver's duty to take reasonable care [PARKINSON v. LIVERPOOL CORPORATION] . . . . . 367
- Driving uninsured motor vehicle—Driver without means—Liability of owner of vehicle to satisfy judgment against driver—Effect on owner's liability of independent contract of insurance—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (1) [CORFIELD v. GROVES] . . . . . 488
- Insurance covering the "proposer or his paid driver"—Car driven by paid driver not in general employment of proposer—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (1) [BRYAN v. FORROW] . . . . . 294
- Duty of driver—Right to proceed when satisfied that persons crossing are out of danger [KAYSER v. LONDON PASSENGER TRANSPORT BOARD] . . . . . 231
- Light locomotive—Car converted to carry generating plant—Relevant date—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 2 (1) (b) [KEEBLE v. MILLER] . . . . . 261
- Pedestrian crossing—Duty of driver—Right to proceed when satisfied that persons crossing are out of danger [KAYSER v. LONDON PASSENGER TRANSPORT BOARD] . . . . . 231

STRIKING OUT PLEADINGSee* PRACTICE.SUMMARY JUDGMENTLeave to sign. See PRACTICE.SUMMARY JURISDICTIONSee* JUSTICES.SUNDAY ENTERTAINMENTSSee* THEATRES AND ENTERTAINMENTS.SUPERANNUATION

- Income tax—Exemption of contribution—"Ordinary annual contribution"—Payment of back contributions by annual instalments [KNEEN (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. ASHTON] . . . . . 982
- Local government officers. See LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Superannuation).

SUPERVISION ORDERSee* CRIMINAL LAW (Sentence).SUSPECTED PERSONSee* CRIMINAL LAW.SYSTEM OF WORKINGSee* MASTER AND SERVANT.TENANCY IN COMMON

- Will—Bequest—"Pay the income arising to my children in equal shares and after the death of all my children" to grandchildren then living [Re DAVIES (deceased)] . . . . . 120

THEATRES AND ENTERTAINMENTS

- Sunday entertainment—Offence—Penalty—Liability of limited company—Evidence against company—Sunday Observance Act, 1780 (21 Geo. 3, c. 49), s. 1, s. 2 [HOUGHTON-LE TOUZEL v. MECCA, LTD.] . . . . . 638

TITHE AND TITHE RENTCHARGE

- Devises of "land," inclusion in [Re LORY'S WILL TRUSTS] . . . . . 349
- Extinguishment—Compensation—Right of devisee under will of testator dying in 1902—Tithe rentcharge included in bequest of life interest—Tithe Act, 1936 (c. 43), s. 7 (1), sched. I, pt. I, para. 5 [Re LORY'S WILL TRUSTS] . . . . . 349

TOWAGESee* SHIPPING.TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING

- Highway—Stopping up—Power of Minister of Transport to override statute giving inhabitants right to use highway—"Development"—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 49 (1), s. 118 (1) [HARLOW v. MINISTRY OF TRANSPORT] . . . . . 898
- War damage—Compulsory purchase order—Direction by Minister that application for order under Act of 1944 be continued after Act of 1947 came into force—Direction given before Act of 1947 came into force—Validity—Interpretation Act, 1889 (c. 63), s. 37—Town and Country Planning Act, 1944 (c. 47), s. 1 (1)—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), sched. X, para. 16 [R. v. MINISTER OF TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING, Ex parte C. B. NORTH, LTD.] . . . . . 163

TRAINING

- Infant aged more than sixteen years—Continuation of payments under previous maintenance order—Application after cessation of order [NORMAN v. NORMAN] . . . . . 1082

TRIAL

Jury, by. See JURY.

See also CRIMINAL LAW.

UNCONSCIONABLE BARGAIN

- Expectant heir, with—Bills of exchange given by reversioner for small consideration—Renewal of bills from time to time—Loss of right to application of equitable doctrine [LEVIN v. ROTH] . . . . . 698

UNINSURED MOTOR VEHICLEDriving. See STREET TRAFFIC.UNSOUNDNESS OF MINDGround for divorce. See DIVORCE."UNUSUAL DANGER"Duty of occupier to protect invitee against. See NEGLIGENCE (Invitee).VALUE PAYMENTWar damage. See WAR DAMAGE.VENIRE DE NOVOSee* CRIMINAL LAW.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |      |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------|
| Compulsory purchase order— Direction by Minister that application for order under Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, be continued after Act of 1947 came into force—Direction given before Act of 1947 came into force—Validity [R. v. MINISTER OF TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING, Ex parte C. B. NORTH, LTD.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                | 163  |
| Value payment—Apportionment—Proprietary interest—"Incident" of proprietary interest—Option to lessee to purchase freehold reversion— War Damage Act, 1943 (c. 21), s. 12 (3) [RE JOHNSTON'S APPLICATION] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 613  |
| "Proprietary interest"—"Short tenancy"—Term of more than seven years under two instruments—Lease for five years extended to twelve years— War Damage Act, 1943 (c. 21), s. 123 [Re Nos. 38, 39 and 40 WINDMILL STREET, ST. PANCRAS, LONDON] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 59   |
| WAREHOUSEMAN                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |      |
| Failure to despatch goods to ship—Discovery delayed by negligent issue of bill of lading—Shipper's resultant liability in damages to purchaser for failure to deliver goods—Measure of damages [HESKELL v. CONTINENTAL EXPRESS, LTD.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 1033 |
| WARRANT                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          |      |
| Gaming house— Special warrant of arrest and search. See GAMING.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |      |
| WARRANTY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         |      |
| Breach—Sale of motor car—Warranty as to condition by dealer to buyer—Car sold by dealer to finance company—Hire-purchase agreement between company and buyer—Action for damages by buyer against dealer [BROWN v. SHEEN & RICHMOND CAR SALES, LTD.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 1102 |
| WATER SUPPLY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |      |
| Domestic purposes—Right of owner of premises to demand supply—"Premises"—House-boat— Water Act, 1945 (c. 42), sched. 11, s. 30 (1) [WEST MERSEA URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. FRASER] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 990  |
| Rates and charges—Special expense charged on ratepayers in contributory place—Cost of supply to that place thereafter small—Right of ratepayers in that place to have rate reduced to reflect cost— Public Health Act, 1936 (c. 49), s. 126 (1) [BORDER RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. ROBERTS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                        | 370  |
| WAY                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              |      |
| Right of way. See EASEMENT.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               |      |
| WIDOW                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            |      |
| Domicil—Retention of husband's domicil [Re WALLACH (deceased)] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 199  |
| WILL                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             |      |
| Alteration after execution—Evidence of original contents—"Apparent"—Original words photographed by use of infra-red rays—Not visible on document itself unless slips removed— Wills Act, 1837 (c. 26), s. 21 [Re IITER (deceased)] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 68   |
| Attestation—Attestation clause—Validity—Omission of statement that witnesses "subscribed their names as witnesses"— Wills Act, 1837 (c. 26), s. 9 [Re SELBY-BIGGE (decd.)] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 1009 |
| Division of fund—Per stirpes or per capita—Prima facie rule—Rejection—"Equally between the children of my deceased sister T. and the said F.H."—Children of different generation from that of testatrix, T., and F.H. [Re BIRKETT (deceased)] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 316  |
| Forfeiture—Gift to C. for life with remainder to first and other sons in tail male, and remainders over—Forfeiture of C.'s life interest, while C. a bachelor—Acceleration of second life estate—Accelerated life estate not determined by birth of son to C. [Re BLATHWAYT'S WILL TRUSTS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                               | 582  |
| Gift of "all my belongings"—Exclusion of real property [Re PRICE (deceased)] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 338  |
| Investment clause—"Shares of public company"—Inclusion of stock [Re BOYS' WILL TRUSTS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 624  |
| Joint tenancy or tenancy in common—"Pay the income arising to my children in equal shares and after the death of all my children" to grandchildren then living [Re DAVIES (deceased)] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 120  |
| "Land"—Inclusion of incorporeal hereditaments—Title rentcharge [Re LORY'S WILL TRUSTS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 349  |
| Legacy—Destruction of object—Gift to hospital—Vesting of hospital in Minister of Health after date of will but before death of testatrix—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 6, s. 7 [Re MORGAN'S WILL TRUSTS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 1097 |
| Option—Option to purchase real property—Subject-matter of option—Agreement by testator to purchase additional property, but sale not completed until after his death—Right of grantee to take property free from incumbrances—Purchaser or devisee—Real Estate Charges Act, 1854 (c. 113), s. 1 [Re FISON'S WILL TRUSTS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                 | 501  |
| Share—Options to sons to purchase shares after death of tenant for life—"At par value"—Changes in regard to shares during tenancy of tenant for life—Amalgamation of company and substitution of increased number of shares in new company for those of old company—Substantial increase in value of holding—Liquidation of another company—Large sum paid by liquidator in respect of shares—Right of sons to exercise options [Re FISON'S WILL TRUSTS] .. .. . | 501  |
| Perpetuity—Gift rendering capital inalienable—Gift of income to non-charitable association "until revocation shall be made a punishable offence"—Gift over to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals—Validity of gifts and gift over—Contingency [Re WIGHTWICK'S WILL TRUSTS] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                        | 689  |
| Probate. See PROBATE.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |      |
| "To pay the income of the residuary trust fund up to the sum of £1,000 per annum to L. for her life"—Whether deficiency of income may be supplied out of surplus of subsequent years [Re CAREY (deceased)] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 726  |
| WINDING-UP                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |      |
| Of company. See COMPANY (Winding-up).                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |      |
| WIRELESS RELAY SERVICE                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |      |
| Rates—Assessment—Valuation on profits basis [AMALGAMATED RELAYS, LTD. v. BURNLEY RATING AUTHORITY] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 253  |
| WORK OR LABOUR                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   |      |
| Time of performance of contract—Contract to build motor car body—Time of the essence—Original condition in regard to time waived—Subsequent notice fixing time for completion—Reasonableness—Conduct amounting to waiver [CHARLES RICKARDS, LTD. v. OPPENHEIM] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                           | 420  |
| WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |      |
| Industrial disease—Certifying surgeon's certificate given after July 5, 1948, in respect of disablement suffered before that date—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (c. 84), s. 43 (1), (2)—National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946 (c. 62), s. 89 (1) (a) [HARRIS v. ROTOL, LTD.] .. .. .                                                                                                                                                             | 867  |

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION

PAGE

Industrial disease—continued.

Dermatitis—Attack before July 5, 1948—Recurrence after that date—Workman insured under National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946—Right of workman to workmen's compensation [HALES v. BOLTON LEATHERS, LTD.] .. .. .

149

WRIT

Service. See PRACTICE.

WRONGFUL DISMISSAL

Damage—Pleading—Special damage—Remuneration during period of contractual notice [HAYWARD v. PULLINGER AND PARTNERS, LTD.] .. .. .

581

ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS

Rates—Assessment—Valuation on profits basis—Factors to be considered [SURREY COUNTY VALUATION COMMITTEE v. CHESSINGTON ZOO, LTD.] .. .. .

154

CASES REFERRED TO

|                                                                                                                                                                                        | PAGE                                   |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------|
| A. and M., Re , [1926] Ch.D. 274; sub nom. , Re L.A. and B.F.M., Ex p. , Official Receiver v. The Debtors, 95 L.C. 258; 134 L.T. 539; Digest Supp. . . . . | 308, 310, 315                          |
| Abalian v. Innous, [1936] 2 All E.R. 834; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                                                         | 594, 596                               |
| Ackroyd's Air Travel, Ltd. v. Director of Public Prosecutions, [1950] 1 All E.R. 933 . . . . .                                                                                         | 966, 968                               |
| Addie (R.) & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck, [1929] A.C. 358; 98 L.J.P.C. 119; 140 L.T. 650; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                       | 181, 187, 250, 253, 682, 684, 685      |
| Addis v. Gramophone Co., Ltd., [1909] A.C. 488; 78 L.J.K.B. 1122; 101 L.T. 466; 17 Digest 78, 1 . . . . .                                                                              | 40                                     |
| Akt. Frank v. Namaqua Copper Co., Ltd., (1920), 90 L.J.K.B. 36; 123 L.T. 523; 41 Digest 307, 1690 . . . . .                                                                            | 769, 771                               |
| Akt. Reidar v. Arcos, Ltd., [1927] 1 K.B. 352; 96 L.J.K.B. 33; 136 L.T. 1; 41 Digest 341, 1922 . . . . .                                                                               | 768, 770, 778, 779                     |
| Alberg v. Chandler, (1948), 64 T.L.R. 394; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                                                    | 124, 125, 128, 129, 130, 133, 135      |
| Alcock, Re , [1945] 1 All E.R. 613; [1945] Ch. 264; 114 L.J.Ch. 161; 173 L.T. 4; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                       | 316, 318                               |
| Allen, Re , Ex p. Shaw, [1915] 1 K.B. 285; 84 L.J.K.B. 271; 112 L.T. 194; 4 Digest 33, 273 . . . . .                                                                     | 405, 406, 411, 412                     |
| Amazona, The, [1940] 1 All E.R. 269; [1940] P. 40; 109 L.J.P. 49; 163 L.T. 375; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                   | 749, 757                               |
| Amphlett v. Dorrell, [1948] 2 All E.R. 674; [1949] 1 K.B. 276; [1949] L.J.R. 219; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                             | 885                                    |
| Ancona v. Rogers, (1876), 1 Ex.D. 285; 46 L.J.Q.B. 121; 35 L.T. 115; 37 Digest 158, 34 . . . . .                                                                                       | 749, 753, 756                          |
| Anderson v. Anderson, [1895] 1 Q.B. 749; 64 L.J.Q.B. 457; 72 L.T. 313; 17 Digest 274, 893 . . . . .                                                                                    | 768, 769, 771, 773                     |
| Anderson v. Ocean S.S. Co., (1884), 10 App. Cas. 107; 54 L.J.Q.B. 192; 52 L.T. 441; 41 Digest 601, 4281 . . . . .                                                                      | 105, 115                               |
| Andrews v. Hailes, (1853), 2 E. & B. 349; 22 L.J.Q.B. 409; 21 L.T.O.S. 151; 11 Digest 56, 850 . . . . .                                                                                | 553                                    |
| Angel v. Jay, [1911] 1 K.B. 666; 80 L.J.K.B. 458; 103 L.T. 809; 30 Digest 479, 1408 . . . . .                                                                                          | 693, 695                               |
| Anglo-Italian Bank v. Wells, Anglo-Italian Bank v. Davies, (1878), 38 L.T. 197; 6 Digest 474, 3017 . . . . .                                                                           | 929, 932                               |
| Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders & Batt (John) & Co. (London), Re , [1917] 2 K.B. 679; 86 L.J.K.B. 1360; 116 L.T. 805; 12 Digest 397, 3223 . . . . .                              | 52, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59                 |
| Arantzazu Mendi, The, [1939] 1 All E.R. 719; [1939] A.C. 256; 160 L.T. 513; sub nom. , Spain Republic Government v. Arantzazu Mendi, 108 L.J.P. 55; Digest Supp. . . . .        | 749, 757                               |
| Ardan S.S. Co. v. Weir (Andrew) & Co., [1905] A.C. 501; 74 L.J.P.C. 143; 93 L.T. 559; 41 Digest 453, 2843 . . . . .                                                                    | 770, 777, 778                          |
| Armement Adolf Deppe v. Robinson (John) & Co., Ltd., [1917] 2 K.B. 204; 86 L.J.K.B. 1103; 116 L.T. 664; 41 Digest 529, 3563 . . . . .                                                  | 986, 988                               |
| Armstrong v. Eldridge, (1791), 3 Bro. C.C. 215; 44 Digest 989, 8458 . . . . .                                                                                                          | 120, 122, 123                          |
| Armstrong's Will Trusts, Re , [1943] 2 All E.R. 537; [1943] Ch. 400; 112 L.J.Ch. 335; 169 L.T. 268; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                    | 501, 502, 505, 506                     |
| Arpad, The, [1934] P. 189; 103 L.J.P. 129; 152 L.T. 521; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                                          | 1034, 1035, 1049, 1050                 |
| Ashcroft v. Ashcroft & Roberts, [1902] P. 270; 71 L.J.P. 125; 87 L.T. 229; 27 Digest 501, 5360 . . . . .                                                                               | 618                                    |
| A.-G. v. Beech, [1899] A.C. 53; 68 L.J.Q.B. 130; 79 L.T. 565; 63 J.P. 116; 21 Digest 7, 26 . . . . .                                                                                   | 81, 82                                 |
| A.-G. v. Buckland, (1742), cited in Amb, 71; 44 Digest 890, 7478 . . . . .                                                                                                             | 143, 144                               |
| A.-G. v. Carrington (Lord), (1843), 6 Beav. 454; Digest, Practice, 993, 4726 . . . . .                                                                                                 | 435                                    |
| A.-G. v. Clarkson, [1900] 1 Q.B. 156; 69 L.J.Q.B. 81; 81 L.T. 617; 21 Digest 45, 288 . . . . .                                                                                         | 192, 197, 198                          |
| A.-G. v. De Preville, [1900] 1 Q.B. 223; 69 L.J.Q.B. 283; 81 L.T. 266, 690; 21 Digest 10, 42 . . . . .                                                                                 | 81, 82                                 |
| A.-G. v. Fairley, [1897] 1 Q.B. 698; 66 L.J.Q.B. 454; 76 L.T. 526; 21 Digest 45, 287 . . . . .                                                                                         | 192, 197, 198                          |
| A.-G. v. Great Northern Ry. Co., [1916] 2 A.C. 356; 85 L.J.Ch. 717; 115 L.T. 235; 80 J.P. 337; 38 Digest 274, 136 . . . . .                                                            | 246, 248                               |
| A.-G. v. Holden, [1903] 1 K.B. 832; 72 L.J.K.B. 420; 88 L.T. 729; 67 J.P. 135; 21 Digest 11, 48 . . . . .                                                                              | 192, 195, 196, 197                     |
| A.-G. v. Johnson, [1903] 1 K.B. 617; 72 L.J.K.B. 323; 88 L.T. 445; 67 J.P. 113; 21 Digest 12, 55 . . . . .                                                                             | 192, 195, 196, 197                     |
| A.-G. v. Lockwood, (1842), 9 M. & W. 378; 152 E.R. 160; affd. on other grounds sub nom. , Lockwood v. A.-G., 10 M. & W. 464; 42 Digest 767, 1934 . . . . .               | 969, 973                               |
| A.-G. v. Luncheon & Sports Club, Ltd., [1929] A.C. 400; 98 L.J.K.B. 359; 141 L.T. 153; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                            | 291, 292                               |
| A.-G. v. Northumberland (Duke), (1877), 7 Ch.D. 745; 47 L.J.Ch. 569; varied without affecting this point , (1878), 38 L.T. 245; 8 Digest 306, 856 . . . . .                     | 143, 146                               |
| A.-G. v. Price, (1810), 17 Ves. 371; 8 Digest 242, 12 . . . . .                                                                                                                        | 143, 146, 147                          |
| A.-G. v. St. Aubyn, [1950] 1 All E.R. 79 . . . . .                                                                                                                                     | 952, 953                               |
| A.-G. v. Seacombe, [1911] 2 K.B. 688; 80 L.J.K.B. 913; 105 L.T. 18; 21 Digest 13, 59 . . . . .                                                                                         | 952, 962                               |
| A.-G. v. Smyth, [1905] 2 I.R. 553; 21 Digest 10, 4 . . . . .                                                                                                                           | 192, 195, 196, 198                     |
| A.-G. v. Tomline, (1880), 15 Ch.D. 150; 43 L.T. 486; 11 Digest 56, 842 . . . . .                                                                                                       | 553, 555, 556                          |
| A.-G. v. Walkergate Press, Ltd., A.-G. v. Bloomfield, A.-G. v. Carlton, (1930), 142 L.T. 408; 94 J.P. 90; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                         | 639, 640, 641                          |
| A.-G. v. Watson, [1917] 2 K.B. 427; 86 L.J.K.B. 1034; 117 L.T. 187; 21 Digest 10, 37 . . . . .                                                                                         | 665, 674                               |
| A.-G. v. Worrall, [1895] 1 Q.B. 99; 64 L.J.Q.B. 141; 71 L.T. 807; 59 J.P. 467; 21 Digest 12, 54 . . . . .                                                                              | 192, 197, 195, 952, 958                |
| A.-G. for Ontario v. Perry, [1934] A.C. 477; 153 L.J.P.C. 145; 151 L.T. 405; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                      | 192, 196                               |
| Axel Brostrom & Son v. Louis Dreyfus & Co., (1932), 38 Com. Cas. 79; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                              | 202, 205, 206                          |
| Aylesford (Earl) v. Morris, (1873), 8 Ch. App. 484; 42 L.J.Ch. 546; 28 L.T. 541; 37 J.P. 227; 12 Digest 110, 689 . . . . .                                                             | 698                                    |
| Bain v. Fothergill, (1874), L.R. 7 H.L. 158; 43 L.J.Ex. 243; 81 L.T. 387; 39 J.P. 228; 40 Digest 265, 2306 . . . . .                                                                   | 895, 896, 897                          |
| Bain v. Whitehaven & Furness Ry. Co., (1850), 3 H.L.Cas. 1; 11 Digest 488, 1400 . . . . .                                                                                              | 559, 576                               |
| Baker, Re , (1891), 8 Morr. 116; 5 Digest 939, 7674 . . . . .                                                                                                                   | 1086, 1089                             |
| Baker v. Bethnal Green Corp., [1945] 1 All E.R. 135; 109 J.P. 72; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                             | 682, 685, 688                          |
| Baker v. Lewis, [1946] 2 All E.R. 592; [1947] K.B. 186; [1947] L.J.R. 468; 175 L.T. 490; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                      | 586, 589                               |
| Ballard v. North British Ry. Co., 1923 S.C. 43; 36 Digest 88, 581 vix . . . . .                                                                                                 | 1073, 1078                             |
| Barlee v. Barlee, (1822), 1 Add. 301; 162 E.R. 105; 16 Digest 82, 1010 . . . . .                                                                                                       | 495, 496                               |
| Barnes v. Ward, (1850), 9 C.B. 392; 19 L.J.C.P. 195; 36 Digest 130, 862 . . . . .                                                                                                      | 738, 745                               |
| Barrell v. Fordree, [1932] A.C. 676; 101 L.J.K.B. 529; 96 J.P. 278; sub nom. , Fordree v. Barrell, 147 L.T. 206; Digest Supp. . . . .                                           | 835, 836, 841, 846, 850, 852, 855, 856 |
| Barrett v. Hardy Brothers (Alnwick), Ltd., [1925] 2 K.B. 220; 94 L.J.K.B. 665; 133 L.T. 249; 31 Digest 561, 7090 . . . . .                                                             | 885, 888, 889                          |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |                                   |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------|
| Barton v. Fincham, [1921] 2 K.B. 291; 90 L.J.K.B. 451; 124 L.T. 495; 85 J.P. 145; 31 Digest 579, 7280                                                                                                                 | 708, 710, 711, 715                |
| Batavier, The, (1853), 1 Ecc. & Ad. 169; 41 Digest 828, 6871                                                                                                                                                          | 104, 108, 114                     |
| Batchelor v. Murphy, [1926] A.C. 63; 95 L.J.Ch. 89; 134 L.T. 161; affy. [1925] Ch. 220; reversg. [1924] 2 Ch. 253; 94 L.J.Ch. 177; 132 L.T. 449; 30 Digest 498, 1567                                    | 613, 617                          |
| Baxter v. Baxter, [1947] 2 All E.R. 886; [1948] A.C. 274; [1948] L.J.R. 479; 2nd Digest Supp. 677, 678, 679, 680, 681                                                                                                 | 827, 828                          |
| Beard v. Beard, [1945] 2 All E.R. 306; [1946] P. 8; 114 L.J.P. 33; 174 L.T. 65; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                      | 790, 793, 794, 795                |
| Beard v. Westcott, (1813), 5 Taunt. 393; subsequent proceedings (1822), Turn. & R. 25; 44 Digest 1271, 10992                                                                                                   | 1000, 1004                        |
| Beattie v. Beattie, [1938] 2 All E.R. 74; [1938] P. 99; 107 L.J.P. 45; 159 L.T. 69; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                  | 769, 772                          |
| Beaumont-Thomas v. Blue Star Line, Ltd., [1939] 3 All E.R. 127; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                          | 96, 100                           |
| Bell v. Bell and Cooke, (1932), The Times , June 10                                                                                                                                                            | 693, 695, 697                     |
| Bell v. Lever Bros., Ltd., [1932] A.C. 161; 101 L.J.K.B. 129; 146 L.T. 258; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                              | 65, 66, 67                        |
| Belmonte v. Aynard, (1879), 4 C.P.D. 352; 29 Digest 482, 318                                                                                                                                                          | 790, 791                          |
| Bence, Re , [1891] 3 Ch. 242; 60 L.J.Ch. 636; 65 L.T. 530; 37 Digest 105, 396                                                                                                                                  | 662, 663, 857, 859, 860, 864, 866 |
| Bennett (E.H.) & Partners v. Millett, [1948] 2 All E.R. 929; [1949] 1 K.B. 362; [1949] L.J.R. 1050; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                  | 143, 146, 920, 925, 927           |
| Bernal v. Bernal, (1838), as reported in 3 My. & Cr. 559, n.; 44 Digest 533, 3499                                                                                                                                     | 96, 99                            |
| Berney v. Bickmore, (1863), 8 L.T. 353; 11 Digest 56, 848                                                                                                                                                             | 420, 423                          |
| Bernstein v. Bernstein, [1893] P. 292; 63 L.J.P. 3; 69 L.T. 513; 27 Digest 341, 3213                                                                                                                                  | 495, 496                          |
| Besseler, Waechter Glover & Co. v. South Derwent Coal Co., Ltd., [1937] 4 All E.R. 552; [1938] 1 K.B. 408; 107 L.J.K.B. 365; 158 L.T. 12; Digest Supp.                                                                | 700, 703, 704, 707                |
| Best v. Gompertz, (1837), 2 Y. & C. Ex. 582; 160 E.R. 528; 16 Digest 92, 1156                                                                                                                                         | 665, 670                          |
| Biedermann v. Althausen & Co., (1921), 37 T.L.R. 662; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                    | 976, 979                          |
| Bignold v. Giles, (1859), 4 Drew. 343; 23 L.J.Ch. 353; 32 L.T.O.S. 308; 39 Digest 135, 296                                                                                                                            | 421, 425                          |
| Billingham v. Hughes, [1949] 1 All E.R. 684; [1949] 1 K.B. 643; [1949] L.J.R. 1147                                                                                                                                    | 172, 178                          |
| Bird v. Hildage, [1947] 2 All E.R. 7; [1948] 1 K.B. 91; [1948] L.J.R. 196; 177 L.T. 97; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                              | 539, 542                          |
| Black v. Fife Coal Co., Ltd., [1912] A.C. 149; 81 L.J.P.C. 97; 106 L.T. 161; 5 B.W.C.C. 217; 34 Digest 740, 1166                                                                                                      | 898, 901                          |
| Blackpool Corpn. v. Locker, [1948] 1 All E.R. 85; [1948] 1 K.B. 349; [1948] L.J.R. 847; 112 J.P. 130; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                | 405, 408, 409                     |
| Blackpool Corpn. v. Starr Estate Co., [1922] 1 A.C. 27; 91 L.J.K.B. 202; 126 L.T. 258; 86 J.P. 25; 42 Digest 770, 1974                                                                                                | 1035, 1044                        |
| Blain, Ex p. , Re Sawers, (1879), 12 Ch.D. 522; 41 L.T. 46; 4 Digest 25, 197                                                                                                                            | 618                               |
| Bloomenthal v. Ford, [1897] A.C. 156; 66 L.J.Ch. 253; 76 L.T. 205; reversg. S.C. sub nom. Re Veuve Monnier et ses Fils, Ltd., Ex parte , Bloomenthal, [1896] 2 Ch. 525; 35 Digest 45, 406 | 690, 692                          |
| Blunt v. Blunt, [1943] 2 All E.R. 76; [1943] A.C. 517; 112 L.J.P. 58; 169 L.T. 33; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                   | 802, 803                          |
| Blunt's Trusts, Re , [1904] 2 Ch. 767; 74 L.J.Ch. 33; 91 L.T. 687; 68 J.P. 571; 8 Digest 323, 1055                                                                                                             | 966, 968                          |
| Boards, Re , [1895] 1 Ch. 499; 64 L.J.Ch. 305; 72 L.T. 220; 23 Digest 510, 5758                                                                                                                                | 539, 541, 543                     |
| Bosley v. Davies, (1875), 1 Q.B.D. 84; 45 L.J.M.C. 27; 33 L.T. 528; 40 J.P. 550; 25 Digest 430, 301                                                                                                                   | 682, 684, 738, 743                |
| Bostel Bros., Ltd. v. Hurlock, [1948] 2 All E.R. 312; [1949] 1 K.B. 74; [1948] L.J.R. 1846; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                          | 181, 185                          |
| Bowater v. Bowley Regis Corpn., [1944] 1 All E.R. 465; [1944] K.B. 476; 113 L.J.K.B. 427; 170 L.T. 814; 108 J.P. 163; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                | 966, 968                          |
| Bowler v. Woodroffe, Bowker v. Premier Drug Co., [1928] 1 K.B. 217; 96 L.J.K.B. 750; 137 L.T. 847; 91 J.P. 118; Digest Supp.                                                                                          | 780, 782                          |
| Boylan v. Dublin Corpn., [1949] I.R. 60                                                                                                                                                                               | 708, 714                          |
| Brabant & Co. v. King, [1895] A.C. 632; 64 L.J.P.C. 161; 72 L.T. 785; 3 Digest 73, 137, 1073, 1077, 1078                                                                                                              | 181, 187                          |
| Brackley v. Midland Ry. Co., (1916), 85 L.J.K.B. 1596; 114 L.T. 1150; 80 J.P. 369; 36 Digest 41, 254                                                                                                                  | 460, 463, 470                     |
| Bradburn v. Great Western Ry. Co., (1874), L.R. 10 Exch. 1; 44 L.J.Ex. 9; 81 L.T. 464; 17 Digest 125, 339                                                                                                             | 538, 539, 541, 543                |
| Braddock v. Tillotsons Newspapers, Ltd., [1949] 2 All E.R. 306; [1950] 1 K.B. 47                                                                                                                                      | 788                               |
| Bradfield, Re , [1914] W.N. 423; 44 Digest 722, 5722                                                                                                                                                           | 338, 339, 340                     |
| Bradley v. Copley, (1845), 1 C.B. 685; 14 L.J.C.P. 222; 5 L.T.O.S. 198; 43 Digest 497, 361                                                                                                                            | 780, 782                          |
| Bramwell v. Bramwell, [1942] 1 All E.R. 137; [1942] 1 K.B. 370; 111 L.J.K.B. 430; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                    | 708, 714                          |
| Bremer Oeltransport G. m. b. H. v. Drewry, [1933] 1 K.B. 753; 102 L.J.K.B. 360; 148 L.T. 540; Digest Supp.                                                                                                            | 559, 575                          |
| Brenchlev v. Higgins, (1900), 70 L.J.Ch. 788; 83 L.T. 751; 12 Digest 110, 695                                                                                                                                         | 598                               |
| Bretherton v. United Kingdom Totalisator Co., Ltd., [1945] 2 All E.R. 202; [1945] K.B. 555; 114 L.J.K.B. 517; 173 L.T. 126; 110 J.P. 45; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                             | 291, 292                          |
| British & Beningtons v. North Western Cachar Tea Co., etc., [1923] A.C. 48; 92 L.J.K.B. 62; 128 L.T. 422; 12 Digest 355, 2958                                                                                         | 920, 923, 925                     |
| British Columbia Saw Mill Co. v. Nettleship, (1868), L.R. 3 C.P. 499; 37 L.J.C.P. 235; 18 L.T. 604; 41 Digest 556, 3820                                                                                               | 1084, 1041                        |
| British Russian Gazette and Trade Outlook, Ltd. v. Associated Newspapers, Ltd., [1933] 2 K.B. 616; 102 L.J.K.B. 775; 149 L.T. 545; Digest Supp.                                                                       | 813, 817                          |
| British Waggon Co. v. Lea & Co., (1880), 5 Q.B.D. 149; 49 L.J.Q.B. 321; 42 L.T. 437; 44 J.P. 440; 12 Digest 589, 4911                                                                                                 | 1073, 1075, 1076                  |
| Broadmayne, The, [1916] P. 64; 85 L.J.P. 153; 114 L.T. 891; 1 Digest 109, 131                                                                                                                                         | 749, 760                          |
| Brook v. Williams, [1949] 1 All E.R. 715; [1949] 2 K.B. 388                                                                                                                                                           | 71, 139, 141                      |
| Bromley v. Mercer, [1922] 2 K.B. 126; 91 L.J.K.B. 577; 127 L.T. 282; 36 Digest 69, 436                                                                                                                                | 738, 739, 746                     |
| Brooke, Re , [1923] 2 Ch. 265; 92 L.J.Ch. 504; 120 L.T. 379; 44 Digest 431, 2592                                                                                                                               | 582, 584                          |
| Brookes v. Liffen, [1928] 2 K.B. 347; 97 L.J.K.B. 326; 138 L.T. 676; 92 J.P. 102; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                        | 577, 579                          |
| Brook's Wharf & Bull Wharf, Ltd. v. Goodman Bros., [1936] 3 All E.R. 696; [1937] 1 K.B. 534; 106 L.J.K.B. 437; 156 L.T. 4; Digest Supp.                                                                               | 1073, 1078                        |
| Brown v. Crawshaw, (1614), 2 Bulstr. 154; 30 Digest 228, 208                                                                                                                                                          | 807                               |
| Brown v. Draper, [1944] 1 All E.R. 246; [1944] K.B. 309; 113 L.J.K.B. 196; 170 L.T. 144; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                             | 708, 711, 713, 715                |
| Brown v. Hiatts, (1872), 15 Wallace 177                                                                                                                                                                               | 700, 704, 705, 706                |
| Brown v. Lewis, (1896), 12 T.L.R. 455; 8 Digest 518, 89                                                                                                                                                               | 476, 477                          |
| Brown v. Whalley, [1866] W.N. 386                                                                                                                                                                                     | 143, 146                          |
| Browne v. Reid, (1892), 30 L.R. Ir. 619                                                                                                                                                                               | 594, 597, 599                     |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | PAGE                                             |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------|
| Bruner v. Moore, [1904] 1 Ch. 305; 73 L.J.Ch. 377; 89 L.T. 738; 12 Digest 79, 465 .. .. .                                                                                                                                             | 421, 423                                         |
| Bryan d. Child v. Winwood, (1808), 1 Taunt. 208; 11 Digest 56, 843 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                            | 553                                              |
| Buck, Re, [1896] 2 Ch. 727; 65 L.J.Ch. 881; 75 L.T. 312; 60 J.P. 775; 8 Digest 262, 246 .. .. .                                                                                                                                       | 143, 147                                         |
| Burdett v. Spilsbury, Skynner v. Spilsbury, (1843), 10 Cl. & Fin. 340; 6 Man. & G. 386; 8 E.R. 772; 17 Digest 199, 93 .. .. .                                                                                                         | 1009, 1012                                       |
| Burrell & Sons v. Green (F.) & Co., [1914] 1 K.B. 293; 83 L.J.K.B. 499; 109 L.T. 970; on appeal, sub nom. , Burrell & Sons v. Hind, Rolph & Co., [1915] 1 K.B. 391; 84 L.J.K.B. 192; 112 L.T. 105; 41 Digest 361, 2094 .. .. . | 769, 772                                         |
| Burrows v. March Gas and Coke Co., (1870), L.R. 5 Exch. 67; 39 L.J.Ex. 33; 22 L.T. 24; affd. , (1872), L.R. 7 Exch. 96; 41 L.J.Ex. 46; 26 L.T. 318; 36 J.P. 517; 36 Digest 25, 124 .. .. .                                     | 1035, 1047                                       |
| Bush v. Whitehaven Port and Town Trustees, (1888), 52 J.P. 392; 2 Hudson's B.C., 4th ed., 122; affd. , 2 Hudson's B.C., 4th ed., 130; 7 Digest 392, 232 .. .. .                                                                | 208, 209, 217, 219, 220, 223, 224, 225, 229, 231 |
| Butler (or Black) v. Fife Coal Co., Ltd., [1912] A.C. 149; 81 L.J.P.C. 97; 106 L.T. 161; 34 Digest 213, 1809 .. .. .                                                                                                                  | 820, 822                                         |
| Byron's Settlement, Re, [1891] 3 Ch. 474; sub nom. , Re Reynolds, 60 L.J.Ch. 807; 65 L.T. 218; 37 Digest 437, 429 .. .. .                                                                                                      | 491, 492, 493, 494                               |
| C. (otherwise H.) v. C., [1921] P. 399; 90 L.J.P. 345; 125 L.T. 768; 27 Digest 268, 2362 .. .. .                                                                                                                                      | 619, 622                                         |
| Californian Fig Syrup Co.'s Trade Mark, Re, (1888), 40 Ch.D. 620; 58 L.J.Ch. 341; 60 L.T. 590; 43 Digest 184, 341 .. .. .                                                                                                             | 431, 434                                         |
| Cameron v. Prendergast, [1940] 2 All E.R. 35; [1940] A.C. 549; 109 L.J.K.B. 486; 162 L.T. 348; sub nom. , Prendergast v. Cameron, 23 Tax Cas. 122; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                    | 908, 909, 910                                    |
| Camillo Tank S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Alexandria Engineering Works, (1921), 35 T.L.R. 134; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                              | 125, 136                                         |
| Campbell v. Campbell, [1887] W.N. 83; Digest, Practice, 939, 4801 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                             | 435                                              |
| Campbell (Donald) & Co. v. Pollak, [1927] A.C. 732; 96 L.J.K.B. 1132; 137 L.T. 656; Digest, Practice, 855, 4004 .. .. .                                                                                                               | 813, 816, 817                                    |
| Canadian Eagle Oil Co., Ltd. v. R., [1945] 2 All E.R. 499; [1946] A.C. 119; 114 L.J.K.B. 451; 173 L.T. 234; 27 Tax Cas. 206; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                 | 192, 198                                         |
| Cant's Estate, Re, (1859), 4 De. G. & J. 503; 28 L.J.Ch. 641; 33 L.T.O.S. 280; 44 Digest 212, 392 .. .. .                                                                                                                             | 501, 502, 504, 505, 506                          |
| Cape Brandy Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Comrs., [1921] 1 K.B. 64; 90 L.J.K.B. 113; affd. , [1921] 2 K.B. 403; 90 L.J.K.B. 461; 125 L.T. 108; 12 Tax Cas. 358; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                             | 192, 198                                         |
| Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty, (1882), 7 App. Cas. 741; 52 L.J.Q.B. 232; 47 L.T. 662; 47 J.P. 214; 32 Digest 21, 121 .. .. .                                                                                                     | 450, 454                                         |
| Cargill v. Bower, (1878), 10 Ch.D. 502; 47 L.J.Ch. 649; 38 L.T. 779; 9 Digest 127, 663 .. .. .                                                                                                                                        | 427, 428, 429                                    |
| Carroll (J. M.), Re [1931] 1 K.B. 317; 100 L.J.K.B. 113; 144 L.T. 383; 95 J.P. 25; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                               | 1058, 1061                                       |
| Cartwright v. Sculcoates Union, [1900] A.C. 150; 69 L.J.Q.B. 403; 82 L.T. 157; 64 J.P. 229; 38 Digest 564, 1025 .. .. .                                                                                                               | 155, 159, 161                                    |
| Cassel, Re, [1927] 2 Ch. 275; 96 L.J.Ch. 483; 137 L.T. 785; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                                                      | 664, 665, 667, 668, 669, 671, 673, 674, 676      |
| Cavalier v. Pope, [1906] A.C. 428; 75 L.J.K.B. 609; 95 L.T. 65; 12 Digest 49, 273 .. .. .                                                                                                                                             | 181, 187                                         |
| Central London Property Trust, Ltd. v. High Trees House, Ltd., [1947] K.B. 130; [1947] L.J.R. 77; 175 L.T. 332; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                              | 421, 423                                         |
| Chamberlayne v. Brockett, (1872), 8 Ch. App. 206; 42 L.J.Ch. 368; 28 L.T. 248; 37 J.P. 261; 8 Digest 326, 1095 .. .. .                                                                                                                | 689, 690, 692                                    |
| Chardon, Re, [1928] Ch. 464; 97 L.J.Ch. 289; 139 L.T. 261; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                                                       | 689, 690, 691, 692                               |
| Charlesworth (J. and J.), Ltd. and Briggs (Henry), Son & Co., Ltd., Re, (1926), 43 T.L.R. 100; 34 Digest 635, 324 .. .. .                                                                                                             | 519, 524                                         |
| Charlotte, The, (1848), 3 Wm. Rob. 68; 6 Notes of Cases 279; 11 L.T.O.S. 473; 41 Digest 862, 7310 .. .. .                                                                                                                             | 104, 108, 109                                    |
| Cheater v. CATER, [1918] 1 K.B. 247; 87 L.J.K.B. 449; 118 L.T. 203; 30 Digest 183, 508 .. .. .                                                                                                                                        | 737, 738, 741                                    |
| Chemische Fabrik vormals Sandoz v. Badische Anilin und Soda Fabriks, (1904), 90 L.T. 733; Digest Practice 340, 577; affg. , 88 L.T. 490 .. .. .                                                                                | 559, 564                                         |
| Chesterfield (Earl) v. Janssen, (1750), 1 Atk. 301; 1 Wils. 286; 2 Ves. Sen. 125; 7 Digest 175, 133 .. .. .                                                                                                                           | 689, 699                                         |
| Chillingworth v. Esche, [1924] 1 Ch. 97; 93 L.J.Ch. 129; 129 L.T. 808; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                                           | 857, 859, 863                                    |
| Chinchen v. Chinchen, [1950] W.N. 22 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                          | 1058                                             |
| Christie v. Lord Advocate, [1936] 1 All E.R. 443; [1936] A.C. 569; 105 L.J.P.C. 65; 154 L.T. 441; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                | 665, 667, 668, 669, 671, 675, 676                |
| Churchman v. Churchman, [1945] 2 All E.R. 190; [1945] P. 44; 114 L.J.P. 17; 173 L.T. 108; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                    | 41, 42, 607, 608, 609                            |
| Churchward v. Churchward and Holliday, [1895] P. 7; 64 L.J.P. 18; 71 L.T. 782; 27 Digest 334, 3143 .. .. .                                                                                                                            | 1000, 1004                                       |
| Civilian War Claimants Assoc., Ltd. v. R., [1932] A.C. 14; 101 L.J.K.B. 105; 146 L.T. 169; Digest Supp. 1941 .. .. .                                                                                                                  | 431, 434                                         |
| Clark, Re, Ex p. Pope and Owles, [1914] 3 K.B. 1095; 84 L.J.K.B. 89; 112 L.T. 873; 4 Digest 33, 271 .. .. .                                                                                                                    | 405, 406, 411                                    |
| Clark v. Fisherton-Angar, (1880), 6 Q.B.D. 139; sub nom. , Clark v. Alderbury Union Assessment Committee, 50 L.J.M.C. 33; 45 J.P. 358; 38 Digest 608, 1344 .. .. .                                                             | 155, 158, 161                                    |
| Clark v. Molyneux, (1877), 3 Q.B.D. 237; 47 L.J.Q.B. 230; 37 L.T. 694; 42 J.P. 277; 32 Digest 159, 1922 .. .. .                                                                                                                       | 450, 462                                         |
| Clarkson v. Musgrave, (1882), 9 Q.B.D. 386; 51 L.J.Q.B. 525; 13 Digest 527, 788 .. .. .                                                                                                                                               | 267, 269                                         |
| Coates v. Rawtenstall Borough Council, [1937] 3 All E.R. 602; 157 L.T. 415; 101 J.P. 483; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                        | 682, 685, 686, 687, 688                          |
| Cochrane, Re, [1906] 2 I.R. 200; 21 Digest 17, 831 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                            | 952, 962                                         |
| Cocking v. Ward, (1845), 1 C.B. 358; 15 L.J.C.P. 245; 12 Digest 164, 1195 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                     | 124, 127, 128, 131                               |
| Coldman v. Hill, [1919] 1 K.B. 443; 88 L.J.K.B. 491; 120 L.T. 412; 43 Digest 520, 581; .. .. .                                                                                                                                        | 1034, 1035, 1046, 1073, 1078, 1081               |
| Cole v. Harris, [1945] 2 All E.R. 146; [1945] K.B. 474; 114 L.J.K.B. 481; 173 L.T. 50; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                       | 835, 836, 839, 843, 849, 851                     |
| Coles & Ravenshear, Re, [1907] 1 K.B. 1; 76 L.J.K.B. 27; 95 L.T. 750; 2 Digest 561, 1937 .. .. .                                                                                                                                      | 659, 660, 661                                    |
| Colfar v. Cogging & Griffith (Liverpool), Ltd., [1945] 1 All E.R. 326; [1945] A.C. 197; 114 L.J.K.B. 143; 172 L.T. 205; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                      | 320, 824, 825, 826                               |
| Collen v. Wright, (1857), 8 E. & B. 647; 27 L.J.Q.B. 215; 30 L.T.O.S. 209; 120 E.R. 241; 1 Digest 665, 2795 .. .. .                                                                                                                   | 1034, 1042, 1043                                 |
| Coller's Deed Trusts, Re, [1937] 3 All E.R. 292; [1939] Ch. 277; 106 L.J.Ch. 326; 157 L.T. 84; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                   | 726, 727                                         |
| Collins v. Collins and Dove, [1947] 1 All E.R. 793; 177 L.T. 183; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                                            | 785, 788                                         |
| Comber v. Leyland, [1898] A.C. 524; 67 L.J.Q.B. 884; 79 L.T. 180; Digest Practice 346, 620 .. .. .                                                                                                                                    | 559, 572, 575                                    |

|                                                                                                                                                                                    | PAGE                                                                 |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Commercial Air Hire, Ltd. v. Wrightways, Ltd., [1938] 1 All E.R. 89; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                          | 125                                                                  |
| Compania Espanola de Navegacion Maritima, S.A. v. The Navemar, (1938), 303 U.S. 68 . . . . .                                                                                       | 749, 758, 761                                                        |
| Compania Naviera Vascongado v. Cristina S.S., [1938] 1 All E.R. 719; [1938] A.C. 485; 107 L.J.P. 1; 159 L.T. 394; Digest Supp. . . . .                                             | 743, 749, 750, 752, 753, 754, 756, 757, 758, 759, 762, 763, 765, 766 |
| Compton, Re, [1945] 1 All E.R. 198; [1945] Ch. 123; 114 L.J.Ch. 99; 172 L.T. 158; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                         | 143, 145, 147, 148                                                   |
| Conn v. Penn., (1818), Pet. C.C. 496 . . . . .                                                                                                                                     | 700, 705                                                             |
| Conyngnam, Re, [1921] 1 Ch. 491; 90 L.J.Ch. 364; 125 L.T. 300; 44 Digest 431, 2591 . . . . .                                                                                       | 582, 583, 585                                                        |
| Cooke v. Midland Great Western Ry. of Ireland, [1909] A.C. 229; 78 L.J.P.C. 76; 100 L.T. 626; 36 Digest 70, 450 . . . . .                                                          | 250, 252                                                             |
| Cooke v. Vogeler (Charles A.) Co., [1901] A.C. 102; 70 L.J.K.B. 181; 84 L.T. 10; 4 Digest 25, 199 . . . . .                                                                        | 405, 403, 409, 410                                                   |
| Cooper v. Cooper, [1936] 2 All E.R. 542; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                                                      | 700, 702                                                             |
| Corrie v. MacDermott, [1914] A.C. 1056; 83 L.J.P.C. 370; 111 L.T. 952; 11 Digest 124, 157 . . . . .                                                                                | 519, 526                                                             |
| Cossentine, Re, [1933] Ch. 119; 102 L.J.Ch. 78; 148 L.T. 261; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                                 | 316, 317, 318                                                        |
| Coupland v. Hardingham, (1813), 3 Camp. 398; 26 Digest 441, 1532 . . . . .                                                                                                         | 738, 745                                                             |
| Court v. Sheen, (1891), 7 T.L.R. 556; Digest, Practice, 290, 234 . . . . .                                                                                                         | 929, 932                                                             |
| Cow v. Casey, [1949] 1 All E.R. 197; [1949] 1 K.B. 474; [1949] L.J.R. 565 . . . . .                                                                                                | 577, 579, 885                                                        |
| Cowan v. Seymour, [1920] 1 K.B. 500; 89 L.J.K.B. 459; 122 L.T. 465; 7 Tax Cas. 372; 28 Digest 85, 490 . . . . .                                                                    | 912, 915                                                             |
| Cowen v. Cowen, [1945] 2 All E.R. 197; [1946] P. 36; 114 L.J.P. 57; 173 L.T. 176; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                         | 677, 679                                                             |
| Cowley (Earl) v. Inland Revenue Comrs., [1899] A.C. 198; 68 L.J.Q.B. 435; 80 L.T. 361; 63 J.P. 436; 21 Digest 7, 27 . . . . .                                                      | 674, 675                                                             |
| Cox v. Cox and Warde, [1906] P. 267; 75 L.J.P. 75; 95 L.T. 546; 27 Digest 304, 2515 . . . . .                                                                                      | 96, 99                                                               |
| Crane v. South Suburban Gas Co., [1916] 1 K.B. 33; 85 L.J.K.B. 172; 114 L.T. 71; 80 J.P. 51; 36 Digest 42, 255 . . . . .                                                           | 733, 745                                                             |
| Cranswick v. Pearson v. Cranswick, (1862), 31 Beav. 624; 9 L.T. 215; 9 Jur.N.S. 397; affd. (1863), 9 L.T. 275; 44 Digest 1214, 10497 . . . . .                                     | 121, 122                                                             |
| Crimdon, The, [1900] P. 171; 69 L.J.P. 103; 82 L.T. 660; 1 Digest 162, 709 . . . . .                                                                                               | 749, 760                                                             |
| Crispin, Ex p., Re Crispin, (1873), 8 Ch. App. 374; 42 L.J. Bey. 65; 23 L.T. 433; 37 J.P. 391; 4 Digest 25, 196 . . . . .                                                          | 405, 408                                                             |
| Cruise v. Terrell, [1922] 1 K.B. 664; 91 L.J.K.B. 499; 126 L.T. 750; 31 Digest 573, 7263 . . . . .                                                                                 | 166, 168                                                             |
| Cunliffe v. Goodman, [1950] 1 All E.R. 720 . . . . .                                                                                                                               | 857, 861                                                             |
| Curtis v. Williamson, (1874), L.R. 10 Q.B. 57; 44 L.J.Q.B. 27; 31 L.T. 678; 1 Digest 579, 2193 . . . . .                                                                           | 654, 656                                                             |
| Custance's Settlements, Re, [1945] 2 All E.R. 441; [1946] Ch. 42; 114 L.J.Ch. 293; 173 L.T. 195; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                          | 479, 480, 481, 483, 484                                              |
| Dagnall, Re, Ex p. Soan and Morley, [1896] 2 Q.B. 407; 65 L.J.Q.B. 666; 75 L.T. 142; 4 Digest 32, 267 . . . . .                                                                    | 405, 411, 412                                                        |
| Dale, Re, [1931] 1 Ch. 357; 100 L.J.Ch. 237; 145 L.T. 632; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                                    | 316, 317                                                             |
| Daniel, Re, [1917] 2 Ch. 405; 87 L.J.Ch. 69; 117 L.T. 472; 40 Digest 264, 2287 . . . . .                                                                                           | 895, 897                                                             |
| Darling v. Raeburn, [1907] 1 K.B. 846; 76 L.J.K.B. 570; 96 L.T. 437; 41 Digest 517, 3465 . . . . .                                                                                 | 985, 987                                                             |
| Darvey, Re, [1915] 1 Ch. 837; 84 L.J.Ch. 505; 113 L.T. 60; 37 Digest 105, 392 . . . . .                                                                                            | 790, 792                                                             |
| David v. Britannic Merthyr Coal Co., [1909] 2 K.B. 146; 78 L.J.K.B. 659; 100 L.T. 678; affd., [1910] A.C. 74; 79 L.J.K.B. 153; 101 L.T. 833; 34 Digest 740, 1168 . . . . .         | 172, 173, 176, 177, 178                                              |
| Davies, Re, (1888), 21 Q.B.D. 236; 16 Digest 116, 98 . . . . .                                                                                                                     | 495, 496                                                             |
| Davies v. Collins, [1945] 1 All E.R. 247; 114 L.J.K.B. 199; 172 L.T. 155; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                 | 1073, 1075                                                           |
| Davis, The, (1869), 10 Wallace, 15 . . . . .                                                                                                                                       | 749, 761                                                             |
| Davis v. Davis, [1950] 1 All E.R. 40; 114 J.P. 56 . . . . .                                                                                                                        | 804, 806                                                             |
| Davis v. Hedges, (1871), L.R. 6 Q.B. 687; 40 L.J.Q.B. 276; 25 L.T. 155; 40 Digest 387, 180 . . . . .                                                                               | 379, 383                                                             |
| Davison, Re, Ex p. Chandler, (1884), 13 Q.B.D. 50; sub nom., Re Davison, Ex p. Blenkiron's Executors, 50 L.T. 635; 30 Digest 163, 328 . . . . .                                    | 654, 656                                                             |
| Day v. William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd., [1949] 1 All E.R. 219; [1949] 1 K.B. 632; [1949] L.J.R. 689 . . . . .                                                                       | 125, 129, 130, 134                                                   |
| D—e v. A—g (falsely calling herself D—e), (1845), 1 Rob. Eccl. 279; 27 Digest 267, 2350 . . . . .                                                                                  | 677, 679, 680                                                        |
| Debtor (No. 975 of 1937), Re A Debtor v. Petitioning Creditor and Official Receiver, [1938] 2 All E.R. 530; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                   | 30, 33, 442, 447                                                     |
| Debtors (No. 836 of 1935), Re, [1936] 1 All E.R. 875; [1936] Ch. 622; 105 L.J.Ch. 265; 154 L.T. 592; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                          | 405, 409, 410                                                        |
| De Massa (otherwise Horveno) v. De Massa, [1939] 2 All E.R. 150, n.; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                          | 236, 238                                                             |
| De Reneville v. De Reneville, [1948] 1 All E.R. 56; [1948] P. 100; [1948] L.J.R. 1761; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                    | 237, 239                                                             |
| De Trafford v. A.-G., [1935] A.C. 280; 104 L.J.K.B. 396; 153 L.T. 17; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                         | 665, 670, 673, 676                                                   |
| Dexters, Ltd. v. Hill Crest Oil Co. (Bradford), Ltd., [1926] 1 K.B. 348; 95 L.J.K.B. 386; 134 L.T. 494; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                       | 139, 141, 142                                                        |
| Dilke, Re, [1921] 1 Ch. 34; 90 L.J.Ch. 89; 124 L.T. 229; 37 Digest 416, 256 . . . . .                                                                                              | 491, 492, 493, 494                                                   |
| Distinguishing Hematite Iron Co., Ltd. v. Posschl & Co., [1916] 1 K.B. 811; 85 L.J.K.B. 919; 115 L.T. 412; 2 Digest 175, 403 . . . . .                                             | 209, 228                                                             |
| Dodds v. South Shields Poor Law Union Assessment Committee, [1895] 2 Q.B. 133; 64 L.J.Q.B. 508; 72 L.T. 645; 59 J.P. 452; 38 Digest 565, 1041 . . . . .                            | 155, 158, 159, 161                                                   |
| Doe d. Baddeley v. Massey, [1917] 7 Q.B. 373; 20 L.J.Q.B. 434; 17 L.T.O.S. 221; 32 Digest 475, 1339 . . . . .                                                                      | 554                                                                  |
| Doe d. Croft & Skinner v. Tidbury, (1854), 14 C.B. 304; 23 L.J.C.P. 57; 11 Digest 56, 846 . . . . .                                                                                | 553                                                                  |
| Doe d. Knight v. Nepean, (1833), 5 B. & Ad. 86; 22 Digest 165, 1412 . . . . .                                                                                                      | 498, 499                                                             |
| Doe d. Lloyd v. Jones, (1846), 15 M. & W. 580; 16 L.J.Ex. 58; 11 Digest 57, 851 . . . . .                                                                                          | 553                                                                  |
| Donkin, Re, [1947] 2 All E.R. 690; [1948] (Ch. 74; [1948] L.J.R. 409; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                     | 643, 646, 647                                                        |
| Donoghue v. Stevenson, [1932] A.C. 562; 101 L.J.P.C. 119; 147 L.T. 281; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                       | 181, 186, 190, 1034, 1042                                            |
| Drury v. Victor Buckland, Ltd., [1941] 1 All E.R. 269; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                                    | 1102, 1103                                                           |
| Du Belloix v. Waterpark (Lond), (1822), 1 Dow. & Ry. K.B. 16; 6 Digest 329, 2178 . . . . .                                                                                         | 700, 704, 706, 707                                                   |
| Dyson v. A.-G., [1911] 1 K.B. 410; 81 L.J.K.B. 217; 105 L.T. 753; Digest, Pleading 75, 645 . . . . .                                                                               | 124, 126, 135                                                        |
| East Stonehouse Urban Council v. Willoughby Brothers, Ltd., [1902] 2 K.B. 318; 71 L.J.K.B. 873; 87 L.T. 366; 32 Digest 448, 1163 . . . . .                                         | 553, 556                                                             |
| Eaton v. Wimpey & Co., Ltd., [1937] 4 All E.R. 588; [1938] 1 K.B. 353; 107 L.J.K.B. 259; 155 L.T. 6; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                          | 149, 151, 152, 153                                                   |
| Ebbetts v. Conquest, [1895] 2 Ch. 377; 64 L.J.Ch. 702; 73 L.T. 69; affd. sub nom., Conquest v. Ebbetts, [1896] A.C. 490; 65 L.J.Ch. 808; 75 L.T. 36; 31 Digest 340, 4828 . . . . . | 530, 533, 534                                                        |

|                                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                  |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------|
| Ecclesiastical Comrs. for England v. Sackville Estates, Ltd., [1937] 2 All E.R. 720; [1937] 2 K.B. 600; 106 L.J.K.B. 798; 157 L.T. 555; Digest Supp.                                  | 385, 389                                         |
| Edgcombe, Re , Ex p. Edgcombe, [1902] 2 K.B. 403; 71 L.J.K.B. 722; 87 L.T. 108; 5 Digest 1022, 8340                                                                     | 30, 32                                           |
| Edinburgh Street Tramways Co. v. Edinburgh Corpn., [1894] A.C. 456; 63 L.J.Q.B. 769; 71 L.T. 301; 43 Digest 354, 113                                                                  | 155, 159                                         |
| Edwards, Re , [1906] 1 Ch. 570; 75 L.J.Ch. 321; 94 L.T. 593; 44 Digest 578, 3979                                                                                               | 338, 341                                         |
| Egerton v. Esplanade Hotels, London, Ltd., [1947] 2 All E.R. 88; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                     | 363, 366                                         |
| Elderton v. United Kingdom Totalisator Co., Ltd., [1945] 2 All E.R. 624; [1946] Ch. 57; 115 L.J.Ch. 81; 173 L.T. 384; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                | 290, 291, 294                                    |
| Elliott v. Boynton, [1924] 1 Ch. 236; 96 L.J.Ch. 122; 130 L.T. 497; 31 Digest 553, 7003                                                                                               | 628, 631                                         |
| Ellis v. Fulham Borough Council, [1937] 3 All E.R. 454; [1938] 1 K.B. 212; 107 L.J.K.B. 84; 157 L.T. 380; 101 J.P. 469; Digest Supp.                                                  | 683, 686, 687, 688                               |
| Ellis & Sons Amalgamated Properties, Ltd. v. Sisman, [1948] 1 All E.R. 44; [1948] 1 K.B. 653; [1948] L.J.R. 929; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                     | 331, 332, 333, 334                               |
| Emanuel v. Emanuel, [1945] 2 All E.R. 494; [1946] P. 115; 114 L.J.P. 60; 173 L.T. 118; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                               | 1000, 1003                                       |
| Embricos v. Reid (Sydney) & Co., [1914] 3 K.B. 45; 83 L.J.K.B. 1348; 111 L.T. 291; 41 Digest 409, 2548                                                                                | 202, 204                                         |
| Engvall v. Ideal Flats, Ltd., [1945] 1 All E.R. 230; [1945] K.B. 205; 114 L.J.K.B. 249; 172 L.T. 134; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                | 1019, 1025                                       |
| Epps v. Rothnie, [1946] 1 All E.R. 146; [1945] K.B. 562; 114 L.J.K.B. 511; 173 L.T. 358; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                             | 586, 587                                         |
| Epsom Grand Stand Assocn., Ltd. v. Clarke, [1919] W.N. 170; 31 Digest 581, 7296                                                                                                       | 885, 888, 889                                    |
| Erskine v. Adeane, (1873), 8 Ch. App. 756; 42 L.J.Ch. 849; 29 L.T. 234; 38 J.P. 20; 12 Digest 127, 841                                                                                | 738, 741                                         |
| Espir v. Basil Street Hotel, Ltd., [1936] 3 All E.R. 91; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                 | 531, 534                                         |
| Evans v. Bartlam, [1937] 2 All E.R. 646; [1937] A.C. 473; 106 L.J.K.B. 568; 157 L.T. 311; Digest Supp.                                                                                | 700, 702, 877, 881                               |
| Evans (Joseph) & Co. v. Heathcote, [1918] 1 K.B. 418; 87 L.J.K.B. 593; 118 L.T. 556; 12 Digest 289, 2375                                                                              | 124, 127, 128, 129, 131                          |
| Everitt v. Everitt, [1949] 1 All E.R. 908; [1949] P. 374; 113 J.P. 279                                                                                                                | 812, 813, 816                                    |
| Eyre v. Brumfield, [1936] 2 All E.R. 1; 100 J.P. 209; 154 L.T. 696; Digest Supp.                                                                                                      | 258, 260                                         |
| Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society, [1923] A.C. 74; 92 L.J.K.B. 50; 128 L.T. 386; 87 J.P. 21; 31 Digest 99, 2381; 36 Digest 37, 213                                     | 632, 684, 737, 738, 740, 741, 742, 743           |
| Fassbender v. Fassbender, [1938] 3 All E.R. 389; 107 L.J.P. 128; Digest Supp.                                                                                                         | 832, 833                                         |
| Fenn v. Bittleston, (1851), 7 Exch. 152; 21 L.J.Ex. 41; 18 L.T.O.S. 197; 3 Digest 106, 317                                                                                            | 780, 784                                         |
| Ferrard v. Mugnier, (1865), 18 C.B.N.S. 286; 5 New Rep. 307; 34 L.J.C.P. 126; 11 L.T. 635; 12 Digest 452, 3656                                                                        | 559, 574                                         |
| Fife's (Duke) Trustees v. George Wimpey & Co., 1943, S.C. 377; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                       | 384, 385, 389                                    |
| First National Housing Trust, Ltd. v. Chesterfield R.D.C., [1948] 2 All E.R. 658; [1948] 2 K.B. 351; 112 J.P. 413; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                   | 1018, 1019, 1026, 1027                           |
| Fisher v. Fisher, (1878), 4 P.D. 231; 48 L.J.P. 69; 23 Digest 274, 3379                                                                                                               | 485, 487                                         |
| Flint, Re , [1927] 1 Ch. 570; 96 L.J.Ch. 248; 137 L.T. 178; 40 Digest 783, 3140                                                                                                | 502, 506                                         |
| Flower v. Adam, (1810), 2 Taunt. 314; 36 Digest 28, 144                                                                                                                               | 738, 745                                         |
| Flower v. Ebbw Vale Steel, Iron & Coal Co., [1934] 2 K.B. 132; 103 L.J.K.B. 465; 151 L.T. 87; Digest Supp.                                                                            | 559, 573                                         |
| Flureau v. Thornhill, (1776), 2 Wm. Bl. 1078; 96 E.R. 635; 40 Digest 262, 2273                                                                                                        | 895, 897                                         |
| Folkes v. King, [1923] 1 K.B. 282; 92 L.J.K.B. 125; 128 L.T. 405; Digest Supp.                                                                                                        | 738, 741                                         |
| Foot Clinics (1943), Ltd. v. Cooper's Gowns, Ltd., [1947] K.B. 506; [1947] L.J.R. 938; 177 L.T. 330; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                 | 421, 425                                         |
| Forster v. Forster, (1790), 1 Hag. Con. 144; 27 Digest 355, 3403                                                                                                                      | 602, 605                                         |
| Foveaux, Re , [1895] 2 Ch. 501; 64 L.J.Ch. 856; 73 L.T. 202; 8 Digest 259, 206                                                                                                 | 690, 692                                         |
| Fowle v. Bell, [1946] 2 All E.R. 668; 140 L.R. 242; [1947] L.J.R. 115; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                               | 586, 587, 589                                    |
| Fowler v. Barstow, (1881), 20 Ch.D. 190; 51 L.J.Ch. 103; 45 L.T. 603; Digest, Practice, 369, 796                                                                                      | 559, 562                                         |
| Foxcraft v. Nagle, (1791), 2 Dallas 132                                                                                                                                               | 700, 705                                         |
| Francis v. Dodsworth, (1847), 4 C.B. 202; 17 L.J.C.P. 185; 8 L.T.O.S. 391                                                                                                             | 442, 446                                         |
| Fry v. Lane, (1888), 40 Ch.D. 312; 58 L.J.Ch. 113; 60 L.T. 12; 12 Digest 110, 691                                                                                                     | 698                                              |
| Fytche v. Fytche, (1868), L.R. 7 Eq. 494; 19 L.T. 343; 20 Digest 441, 1666                                                                                                            | 655, 657                                         |
| G—v. G—, (1871), L.R. 2 P. & D. 287; 40 L.J.P. & M. 83; 25 L.T. 510; 27 Digest 265, 2330                                                                                              | 677, 679, 681                                    |
| Gaisberg v. Storr, [1949] 2 All E.R. 411; [1950] 1 K.B. 107                                                                                                                           | 655, 657                                         |
| Galene v. Galene (otherwise Galice), [1939] 2 All E.R. 148; [1939] P. 237; 108 L.J.P. 82; Digest Supp.                                                                                | 236, 238                                         |
| Garnett v. Bradley, (1878), 3 App. Cas. 944; 48 L.J.Q.B. 186; 39 L.T. 261; 43 J.P. 20; 42 Digest 770, 1968                                                                            | 898, 901                                         |
| Gatti v. Shoosmith, [1939] 3 All E.R. 916; [1939] Ch. 841; 108 L.J.Ch. 380; 161 L.T. 208; Digest Supp.                                                                                | 659, 660, 661                                    |
| Gazelle, The, (1844), 2 Wm. Rob. 279; 3 Notes of Cases, 75; 41 Digest 804, 6648                                                                                                       | 700, 702                                         |
| Gibson v. South American Stores (Gath & Chaves), Ltd., [1949] 2 All E.R. 18; [1949] Ch. 572; [1949] L.J.R. 1228; affirmed in part and reversed in part , [1949] 2 All E.R. 985 | 143, 147                                         |
| Gidden v. Mills, [1925] 2 K.B. 713; 134 L.T. 31; 31 Digest 559, 7063                                                                                                                  | 885, 888                                         |
| Giddys v. Horsfall, [1947] 1 All E.R. 460; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                           | 857, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 866, 920, 925 |
| Gillam v. Taylor, (1873), L.R. 16 Eq. 581; 42 L.J.Ch. 674; 28 L.T. 833; 8 Digest 242, 14                                                                                              | 143, 146                                         |
| Ginesi v. Ginesi, [1948] 1 All E.R. 373; [1948] P. 179; [1948] L.J.R. 892; 112 J.P. 194; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                             | 41, 42, 43, 804, 806                             |
| Ginn v. Robey, [1911] W.N. 28; Digest, Practice, 955, 4956                                                                                                                            | 435                                              |
| Gipps v. Gipps and Hume, (1864), 11 H.L. Cas. 1; 4 New Rep. 303; 33 L.J.P.M. & A. 161; 10 L.T. 735; 27 Digest 327, 3064                                                               | 602, 604                                         |
| Given v. Massey, (1892), 31 L.R. Ir. 126; 44 Digest 211, 3881                                                                                                                         | 502, 513, 514, 515                               |
| Gladstone v. Musurus Bey, (1862), 1 Hem. & M. 495; 1 New Rep. 178; 32 L.J.Ch. 155; 7 L.T. 477; 11 Digest 537, 392                                                                     | 749, 759                                         |
| Glasgow Corpn. v. Taylor, [1922] 1 A.C. 44; 91 L.J.P.C. 49; 126 L.T. 262; 86 J.P. 89; 36 Digest 70, 453                                                                               | 250, 252, 683, 688                               |
| Glaucus, The, (1948), 81 Ll.L. Rep. 262                                                                                                                                               | 104, 106, 107, 109, 114                          |
| Glennie v. Glennie and Bowles, (1862), 32 L.J.P.M. & A. 17; 27 Digest 329, 3087                                                                                                       | 602, 605                                         |
| Glennie v. Imiri, (1839), 3 Y. & C. Ex. 436; 3 Jur. 432; 160 E.R. 773; 6 Digest 165, 1050                                                                                             | 929, 931                                         |
| Glynn v. Margetson & Co., [1893] A.C. 351; 62 L.J.Q.B. 466; 69 L.T. 1; affg. S.C. sub nom. , Margetson v. Glynn , [1892] 1 Q.B. 337; 41 Digest 311, 1715         | 769, 772                                         |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | PAGE                              |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------|
| Godfrey Phillips, Ltd. v. Investment Trust Corp., Ltd. unrep. Feb. 23, 1949 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                     | 632, 633, 635                     |
| Gosling, Re , (1900), 48 W.R. 300; 8 Digest 244, 27 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                      | 143, 147                          |
| Gout v. Zimmermann, (1847), 5 Notes of Cases, 440; 9 L.T.O.S. 412; 11 Digest 332, 212 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                           | 199, 200                          |
| Graham & Scott (Southgate), Ltd. v. Oxlade, [1950] 1 All E.R. 856 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                               | 864, 866, 919, 920, 925, 927, 928 |
| Grampian S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Carver & Co., (1893), 9 T.L.R. 210; 41 Digest 442, 2807 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                              | 985, 988                          |
| Grant & Co. v. Coverdale, Todd & Co., (1884), 9 App. Cas. 470; 53 L.J.Q.B. 462; 51 L.T. 472; 41 Digest 436, 2735 .. .. .                                                                                                                                | 769, 777                          |
| Green v. Berliner, [1936] 1 All E.R. 199; [1936] 2 K.B. 477; 105 L.J.K.B. 662; 155 L.T. 486; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                                       | 639, 642                          |
| Green v. Kursaal (Southend-on-Sea) Estates, Ltd., [1937] 1 All E.R. 732; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                                                           | 639, 640                          |
| Green v. Palmer, [1944] 1 All E.R. 670; [1944] Ch. 325; 113 L.J.Ch. 223; 171 L.T. 49; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                                          | 436, 439, 440, 441                |
| Greenwood, Re , [1901] 1 Ch. 887; 70 L.J.Ch. 326; 84 L.T. 118; 44 Digest 1234, 10665 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                     | 479, 482                          |
| Griffiths v. Smith, [1941] 1 All E.R. 66; [1941] A.C. 170; 110 L.J.K.B. 156; 164 L.T. 386; 105 J.P. 63; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                        | 181, 185                          |
| Grimes (otherwise Edwards) v. Grimes, [1948] 2 All E.R. 147; [1948] P. 323; [1948] L.J.R. 1471; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                                | 677, 678                          |
| Grimwood v. Moss, (1872), L.R. 7 C.P. 360; 41 L.J.C.P. 239; 27 L.T. 268; 36 J.P. 663; 31 Digest 506, 6537 .. .. .                                                                                                                                       | 166, 168                          |
| Groves, Maclean & Co. v. Volkart Bros., (1884), 1 Cab. & El. 309 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                | 985, 986                          |
| Gugenheim v. Ladbrooke & Co., Ltd., [1947] 1 All E.R. 292; 177 L.T. 74; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                                                        | 124, 127, 128, 130, 134           |
| Hagen, The, [1908] P. 189; 77 L.J.P. 124; 98 L.T. 891; Digest, Practice, 340, 679 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                               | 356, 359, 559, 567                |
| Haile Selassie v. Cable and Wireless, Ltd., [1938] 3 All E.R. 384; [1938] Ch. 839; 107 L.J.Ch. 380; 159 L.T. 385; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                  | 748, 749, 752, 762                |
| Hain Steamship Co., Ltd. v. Tate & Lytle, Ltd., [1936] 2 All E.R. 597; 155 L.T. 177; Digest Supp. 769, 774, 776 .. .. .                                                                                                                                 | 867, 868, 869, 871                |
| Hales v. Bolton Leathers, Ltd., [1950] 1 All E.R. 149 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                           | 317, 318                          |
| Hall, Re , [1948] Ch. 437; [1948] L.J.R. 1430; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                          | 202, 205, 206                     |
| Hall Brothers S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Paul (R. & W.), Ltd., (1914), 111 L.T. 811; 41 Digest 523, 3515 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                 | 304, 306                          |
| Hance v. Harding, (1888), 20 Q.B.D. 732; 57 L.J.Q.B. 403; 59 L.T. 659; 5 Digest 843, 7109 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                       | 303, 311                          |
| Hands, Ex p. , Re Hands , (1867), 15 W.R. 1089; 4 Digest 29, 226 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                  | 311, 312, 315                     |
| Hanson v. Newman [1934] Ch. 298; 103 L.J.Ch. 124; 150 L.T. 345; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                    | 323, 327, 329, 330, 530, 533, 535 |
| Hardcastle v. South Yorkshire Ry. & River Dun Co., (1859), 4 H. & N. 67; 28 L.J.Ex. 139; 32 L.T.O.S. 297; 23 J.P. 183; 7 Digest 286, 157 .. .. .                                                                                                        | 738, 745                          |
| Hare v. Burges, (1857), 4 K. & J. 45; 27 L.J.Ch. 86; 30 L.T.O.S. 255; 22 J.P. 84; 31 Digest 80, 2245 .. .. .                                                                                                                                            | 436, 437, 439, 440, 441           |
| Harper, Re , [1914] 1 Ch. 70; 83 L.J.Ch. 157; 109 L.T. 925; 44 Digest 991, 8495 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                          | 317, 318                          |
| Harris, Ex p. , Re Lewis , (1876), 2 Ch. D. 423; 45 L.J.Bey. 71; 34 L.T. 261; 4 Digest 87, 789 .. .. .                                                                                                                                    | 30, 33                            |
| Harris v. Taylor, (1914), 111 L.T. 564; [1915] 2 K.B. 580; 84 L.J.K.B. 1839; 113 L.T. 221; 27 Digest 306, 2827 .. .. .                                                                                                                                  | 96, 99, 100                       |
| Harrison v. Knowles and Foster, [1918] 1 K.B. 608; 87 L.J.K.B. 680; 118 L.T. 566; 39 Digest 420, 627 .. .. .                                                                                                                                            | 693, 695                          |
| Harrison v. National Coal Board, [1950] 1 All E.R. 171 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                          | 182, 189                          |
| Harrold v. Watney, [1938] 2 Q.B. 320; 67 L.J.Q.B. 771; 78 L.T. 788; 36 Digest 69, 443 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                           | 739, 746                          |
| Hartham v. Hartham, [1948] 2 All E.R. 639; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                     | 619, 622, 623                     |
| Hartley v. Hymans, [1920] 3 K.B. 475; 90 L.J.K.B. 14; 124 L.T. 31; 12 Digest 357, 2969 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                          | 421, 423                          |
| Haseeldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd., [1941] 3 All E.R. 156; [1941] 2 K.B. 343; 111 L.J.K.B. 45; 165 L.T. 185; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                        | 182, 183, 738, 740, 743           |
| Hawksworth v. Hawksworth, (1871), 6 Ch. App. 539; 40 L.J.Ch. 534; 25 L.T. 1.5; 35 J.P. 788; 28 Digest 279, 1302 .. .. .                                                                                                                                 | 1058, 1060                        |
| Hay v. London Tower Division Justices, (1890), 24 Q.B.D. 561; 59 L.J.M.C. 79; 62 L.T. 290; 54 J.P. 500; 14 Digest 495, 5457 .. .. .                                                                                                                     | 807                               |
| Heaven v. Pender, (1883), 11 Q.B.D. 503; 52 L.J.Q.B. 702; 49 L.T. 357; 47 J.P. 709; 36 Digest 8, 9 .. .. .                                                                                                                                              | 181, 186, 190                     |
| Hebe, The, (1847), 2 Wm. Rob. 530; 5 Notes of Cases, 176; 5 L.T. 121; 41 Digest 812, 6741 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                       | 700, 702                          |
| Hemelryck v. Lyall Shipbuilding Co., [1921] 1 A.C. 698; 125 L.T. 133; sub nom. Van Hemelryck .. .. .                                                                                                                                             | 559, 566, 572                     |
| v. William Lyall Shipbuilding Co., Ltd., 90 L.J.P.C. 96; Digest Practice 345, 613 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                               | 624, 626                          |
| Henderson v. Henderson's Trustees, (1900), 2 F. (Ct. of Sess.) 1295; 37 Sc. L.R. 976; 8 S.L.T. 164; 43 Digest 947 e .. .. .                                                                                                                             | 912, 915                          |
| Henley v. Murray, [1950] 1 All E.R. 903 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 718, 719                          |
| Henry v. Foster (A.), Henry v. Foster (J.), Hunter v. Dewhurst, (1932), 145 L.T. 225; 16 Tax Cas. 605; sub nom. Dewhurst v. Hunter, 146 L.T. 510; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                           | 908, 911, 912, 914, 915           |
| Herbert, Re , [1926] P. 109; sub nom. In the goods of Herbert, 95 L.J.P. 53; 135 L.T. 123; Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                           | 1100, 1101, 1102                  |
| Hewitt v. Taylor, [1896] 1 Q.B. 287; 65 L.J.M.C. 68; 74 L.T. 51; 60 J.P. 311; 25 Digest 78, 75 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                  | 1082, 1084                        |
| Heydon's Case, (1584), 3 Co. Rep. 7a; 76 E.R. 637; 42 Digest 614, 143 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                           | 420, 423                          |
| Hick v. Raymond & Reid, (1893) A.C. 22; 62 L.J.Q.B. 98; 68 L.T. 175; 12 Digest 308, 2547 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                        | 45, 48, 49                        |
| Hill v. Clifford, Clifford v. Timms, Clifford v. Phillips, [1907] 2 Ch. 236; 76 L.J.Ch. 627; 97 L.T. 266; 23 T.L.R. 601, C.A.; affmd. , [1908] A.C. 12, 15; 33 Digest 161, 450 .. .. .                                                           | 133                               |
| Hill v. Hill William (Park Lane), Ltd., [1949] 2 All E.R. 452; [1949] A.C. 530; [1949] L.J.R. 1333 .. .. .                                                                                                                                              | 125, 131, 132, 133, 135           |
| Hill (R.A.) v. Permanent Trustee Co. of New South Wales, Ltd., [1930] A.C. 720; 144 L.T. 65; sub nom. , Re Hill (Richard), Hill v. Permanent Trustee Co. of New South Wales, 99 L.J.P.C. 191; Digest Supp. .. .. .                        | 417, 419                          |
| Hill (William) (Park Lane), Ltd. v. Rose, [1948] 2 All E.R. 1107; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                                                              | 125, 129, 130, 135                |
| Hillen v. I.C.I. (Alkali), Ltd., [1934] 1 K.B. 455; 103 L.J.K.B. 163; 150 L.T. 147; affmd. , on other grounds, sub nom. Hillen & Pettigrew v. I.C.I. (Alkali), Ltd., [1936] A.C. 65; 104 L.J.K.B. 473; 153 L.T. 403; Digest Supp. .. .. . | 181, 187                          |
| Hillman, Ex p. , Re Pumfrey , (1879), 10 Ch.D. 622; 48 L.J.Bey. 77; 40 L.T. 177; 6 Digest 842, 7117 .. .. .                                                                                                                               | 304, 306                          |
| Hilton v. Sutton Steam Laundry, [1945] 2 All E.R. 425; [1946] K.B. 65; 115 L.J.K.B. 33; 174 L.T. 31; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                                           | 427, 429                          |
| H.M. Advocate v. Heywood-Lonsdale's Trustees, (1906), 43 Sc. L.R. 529; 21 Digest 10, k .. .. .                                                                                                                                                          | 192, 196                          |
| Hoani Te Heuheu Tukino v. Aotea District Maori Land Board, [1941] 2 All E.R. 93; [1941] A.C. 308; 110 L.J.P.C. 17; 2nd Digest Supp. .. .. .                                                                                                             | 431, 434                          |
| Hoare v. Allen, (1789), 2 Dallas 102 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 700, 704, 705, 706                |
| Hobson, Re , [1912] 1 Ch. 626; 106 L.T. 507; 44 Digest 1205, 10426 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                       | 121, 122                          |
| Hodgkinson v. Fernie, (1857), 3 C.B.N.S. 189; 27 L.J.C.P. 66; 140 E.R. 712; 2 Digest 562, 1943 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                  | 890, 893                          |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                         |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Hoerler v. Hanover Caoutchouc, Gutta Percha and Telegraph Works, (1893), 10 T.L.R. 103;Digest, Practice, 349, 647                                                                                               | 355, 356, 360, 361908, 909                                                          |
| Hofman v. Wadman, (1946), 27 Tax Cas. 192; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                         |                                                                                         |
| Home & Colonial Insurance Co., Ltd., Re , [1930] 1 Ch. 102; sub nom. , Re Home & ColonialInsurance Co., May v. Barham, 99 L.J.Ch. 113; 142 L.T. 207; Digest Supp.                          | 124, 127, 130, 135                                                                      |
| Horne v. Midland Ry. Co., (1873), L.R. 8 C.P. 131; 42 L.J.C.P. 59; 28 L.T. 312; 8 Digest140, 918                                                                                                                | 1034, 1035, 1049                                                                        |
| Howard v. Walker, [1947] 2 All E.R. 197; [1947] K.B. 860; [1947] L.J.R. 1366; 177 L.T. 326;2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                     | 738, 745, 74622, 24                                                                 |
| Howard (Sunbury), Ltd. (Application of A. J. Newman), (1948), unreported                                                                                                                                            |                                                                                         |
| Howells v. Landore Steel Co., (1874), L.R. 10 Q.B. 62; 44 L.J.Q.B. 25; 31 L.T. 433; 32 L.T.19; 38 J.P. 806; 34 Digest 214, 1767                                                                                 | 172, 174                                                                                |
| Huddersfield Police Authority v. Watson, [1947] 2 All E.R. 193; [1947] K.B. 842; [1948]L.J.R. 182; 177 L.T. 114; 111 J.P. 463; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                 | 30, 34                                                                                  |
| Hue v. Whiteley, [1929] 1 Ch. 440; 98 L.J.Ch. 227; 140 L.T. 531; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                       | 116, 117                                                                                |
| Hunter, Re , (1879), 3 L.R. Ir. 465; 4 Digest 114, 10280                                                                                                                                                     | 30, 33, 442, 448                                                                        |
| Hutchinson v. Hutchinson, [1947] 2 All E.R. 792; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                   | 708, 714                                                                                |
| Hutchinson v. Jauncey, [1950] 1 All E.R. 165                                                                                                                                                                        | 297, 299                                                                                |
| Hyams v. Stuart King, [1908] 2 K.B. 696; 77 L.J.K.B. 794; 99 L.T. 424; 25 Digest 401, 53                                                                                                                            | 125, 129, 131, 135654, 655, 657                                                     |
| Hyman v. Hyman, [1929] A.C. 601; 98 L.J.P. 81; 141 L.T. 329; 93 J.P. 209; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                              |                                                                                         |
| Idomeneus, The, (1925), 22 L.L. Rep. 299                                                                                                                                                                            | 104, 112                                                                                |
| Indermaur v. Dames, (1866), L.R. 1 C.P. 274; Har. & Ruth. 243; 35 L.J.C.P. 184; 14 L.T.484; affmd. , (1867), L.R. 2 C.P. 311; 36 L.J.C.P. 181; 16 L.T. 293; 31 J.P. 390; 36Digest 35, 208            | 181, 184, 185, 187, 188, 189, 682, 684                                                  |
| Industry, The, (1835), 3 Hag. Adm. 203; 41 Digest, p. 1928; and SHIPPING AND MERCANTILEGAZETTE, July 7, 1874, 840, 7021                                                                                         | 104, 112                                                                                |
| Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Crossman, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Mann, [1936] 1 All E.R. 762;[1937] A.C. 26; sub nom. , Re Crossman, Re Paulin, 105 L.J.K.B. 450; 154 L.T. 570; DigestSupp. | 665, 669, 676                                                                           |
| Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Raphael, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Ezra, [1935] A.C. 96; sub nom. ,Re Sassoon, 104 L.J.Ch. 24; 152 L.T. 217; Digest Supp.                                                 | 209, 218                                                                                |
| Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Sansom, [1921] 2 K.B. 492; 90 L.J.K.B. 627; 125 L.T. 37; 8 TaxCas. 20; 28 Digest 101, 612                                                                                              | 969, 970                                                                                |
| Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Von Glehn, [1920] 2 K.B. 553; 89 L.J.K.B. 590; 123 L.T. 338;12 Tax Cas. 232; 28 Digest 46, 236                                                                                         | 969, 974                                                                                |
| Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Wesleyan and General Assce. Society, [1948] 1 All E.R. 555; [1948]L.J.R. 948; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                         | 952, 965                                                                                |
| Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Westminster (Duke), [1936] A.C. 1; 104 L.J.K.B. 383; 153 L.T.223; sub nom. , Westminster (Duke) v. Inland Revenue Comrs., 19 Tax Cas. 490; DigestSupp.                      | 908, 910, 952, 958                                                                      |
| Inverkip S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Bunge & Co., [1917] 2 K.B. 193; 86 L.J.K.B. 1042; 117 L.T. 102;41 Digest 580, 4037                                                                                                   | 768, 770, 778, 779                                                                      |
| Isaac v. Defriez, (1754), Amb. 595; 17 Ves. 373, n.; 44 Digest 890, 7479                                                                                                                                            | 143, 145, 146                                                                           |
| Isherwood v. Oldknow, (1815), 3 M. & S. 382; 105 E.R. 654; 31 Digest 422, 5681                                                                                                                                      | 1095, 1096                                                                              |
| Jackson v. Murphy, (1888), 4 T.L.R. 92                                                                                                                                                                              | 929, 932                                                                                |
| Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd., (1874), L.R. 10 C.P. 125; 44 L.J.C.P. 27; 31 L.T.789; aff. , (1878), L.R. 8 C.P. 572; 12 L.J.C.P. 284; 12 Digest 386, 3175                                  | 208, 209, 217, 221, 222, 228, 229, 769, 776539, 541, 542, 543, 544, 546531, 534 |
| Jackson Stansfield & Sons v. Butterworth, [1948] 2 All E.R. 558; 112 J.P. 377; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                     |                                                                                         |
| James v. Hutton, [1949] 2 All E.R. 243; [1950] 1 K.B. 9                                                                                                                                                             |                                                                                         |
| James v. Smith, (1921), [1931] 2 K.B. 317, n.; 100 L.J.K.B. 585, n.; 145 L.T. 457, n.; DigestSupp.                                                                                                              | 920, 923, 927289, 290                                                               |
| James & Daniel Provan, Ltd. v. Croydon Corp., (1938), 29 R. & I.T. 277                                                                                                                                              |                                                                                         |
| Jardine, Matheson & Co. v. Clyde Shipping Co., [1910] 1 K.B. 627; 79 L.J.K.B. 634; 102 L.T.462; 41 Digest 645, 4764                                                                                             | 985, 987                                                                                |
| Jarvin (Inhabitants), Ex p. , (1840), 9 Dowl. 120; Woll. 67; 33 Digest 437, 1465                                                                                                                             | 264, 265, 266                                                                           |
| Jebson v. East and West India Dock Co., (1875), L.R. 10 C.P. 300; 44 L.J.C.P. 181; 32 L.T.321; 17 Digest 125, 340                                                                                               | 976, 978, 979                                                                           |
| Jeeves, Re , [1948] 2 All E.R. 961; [1949] Ch. 49; [1949] L.J.R. 317; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                       | 317, 318                                                                                |
| Jeffrey, Re , [1945] 2 All E.R. 131; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                        | 317, 318                                                                                |
| Jelks v. Hayward [1905] 2 K.B. 460; 74 L.J.K.B. 717; 92 L.T. 692; 3 Digest 96, 259                                                                                                                                  | 780, 782, 784                                                                           |
| Jestice v. Jestice, (1945), 114 L.J.P. 29 (n); 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                     | 812, 813, 815                                                                           |
| Joannis Vatis (No. 2), The, [1922] P. 213; 91 L.J.P. 196; 127 L.T. 494; 41 Digest 813, 6742                                                                                                                         | 700, 702                                                                                |
| Johnston Brothers v. Saxon Queen S.S. Co., (1913), 103 L.T. 564; 41 Digest 523, 3516                                                                                                                                | 202, 203, 204                                                                           |
| Johnstone v. Johnstone, [1929] P. 165; 98 L.J.P. 76; 140 L.T. 451; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                     | 27, 28                                                                                  |
| Jolley, Re , (1901), 17 T.L.R. 244; 21 Digest 33, 199                                                                                                                                                        | 502, 511, 513, 515                                                                      |
| Jones, Re , [1945] Ch. 105; 115 L.J.Ch. 33; 173 L.T. 357; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                   | 491, 492, 493, 494                                                                      |
| Jones, Ex p. , Re Jones, (1881), 18 Ch.D. 109; 50 L.J.Ch. 673; 45 L.T. 193; 4 Digest 29, 235                                                                                                          | 30, 33, 308, 311, 312, 313116, 117, 118                                             |
| Jones v. Bates, [1938] 2 All E.R. 237; 158 L.T. 507; 102 J.P. 291; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                     |                                                                                         |
| Jones v. Herxheimer, [1950] 1 All E.R. 323                                                                                                                                                                          | 531, 534                                                                                |
| Jones v. Lowe, [1945] 1 All E.R. 194; [1945] K.B. 73; 114 L.J.K.B. 164; 172 L.T. 18; 2ndDigest Supp.                                                                                                            | 662, 663                                                                                |
| Joyner v. Weeks, [1891] 2 Q.B. 31; 60 L.J.Q.B. 510; 65 L.T. 16; 55 J.P. 725; 31 Digest 341,4841                                                                                                                 | 323, 326, 330, 530, 532                                                                 |
| Julius v. Oxford (Bp.), (1880), 5 App. Cas. 214; 49 L.J.Q.B. 577; 42 L.T. 546; 44 J.P. 600;42 Digest 716, 1351                                                                                                  | 370, 377                                                                                |
| Keeves v. Dean, Nunn v. Pellegrini, [1924] 1 K.B. 685; 93 L.J.K.B. 203; 130 L.T. 593; 31Digest 576, 7254                                                                                                        | 836, 840, 853643, 648                                                               |
| Kempthorne, Re , [1930] 1 Ch. 268; 99 L.J.Ch. 177; 142 L.T. 111; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                |                                                                                         |
| Kent v. Atkinson, [1923] P. 142; 92 L.J.P. 54; 129 L.T. 473; 27 Digest 305, 2326                                                                                                                                    | 96, 99                                                                                  |
| Kenyon v. Walker, Stevenson v. Kenyon, [1946] 2 All E.R. 595; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                      | 836, 839                                                                                |
| Kerry, Re , [1889] W.N. 3; 44 Digest 212, 393                                                                                                                                                                | 501, 502, 505, 506, 507                                                                 |
| Kershaw v. Sievier, (1904), 21 T.L.R. 40; 25 Digest 409, 128                                                                                                                                                        | 124, 12793, 94                                                                      |
| Kerwin v. Hines, (1886), 50 J.P. 230                                                                                                                                                                                |                                                                                         |
| Kilford, [1947] 2 All E.R. 381; [1947] P. 100; [1948] L.J.R. 447; 111 J.P. 495;2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                 | 654, 655, 658                                                                           |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                      |                                                                      |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------|
| King v. King, [1943] 2 All E.R. 253; [1943] P. 91; 112 L.J.P. 89; 169 L.T. 251; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                                             | 27, 28                                                               |
| Kingalock, The, (1854), 1 Ecc. & Ad. 263; 41 Digest 838, 6993 . . . . .                                                                                                                                              | 104, 108                                                             |
| Kingsmill v. Millard, (1855), 11 Exch. 313; 19 J.P. 661; 11 Digest 56, 847 . . . . .                                                                                                                                 | 553                                                                  |
| Kingston Union v. Metropolitan Water Board, [1926] A.C. 331; 95 L.J.K.B. 605; 134 L.T. 483; 90 J.P. 69; 38 Digest 547, 901 . . . . .                                                                                 | 155, 157, 161, 255, 284                                              |
| Kong Magnus, The, [1891] P. 223; 65 L.T. 231; 41 Digest 812, 6740 . . . . .                                                                                                                                          | 700, 702                                                             |
| Laidlaw's (Sir Robert) Will Trusts, Re , (1935), unreported . . . . .                                                                                                                                         | 143, 147                                                             |
| Laidler v. Laidler, (1920), 90 L.J.P. 28; 123 L.T. 208; 27 Digest 336, 3155 . . . . .                                                                                                                                | 1000, 1004                                                           |
| Landeau v. Marchbank, [1949] 2 All E.R. 172 . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                | 323, 326, 328, 329, 531, 537, 538                                    |
| Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Batten, [1949] 2 All E.R. 422 . . . . .                                                                                                                                               | 885, 886, 889                                                        |
| Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Goldrich, [1949] 1 All E.R. 402; [1949] 1 K.B. 511; [1949] L.J.R. 663 . . . . .                                                                                                       | 884, 885, 886, 887, 889                                              |
| Langton v. Hughes, (1813), 1 M. & S. 593; 12 Digest 270, 2214 . . . . .                                                                                                                                              | 539, 543                                                             |
| Laomedon, The, (1925), 23 Ll.L. Rep. 230 . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                   | 104, 112                                                             |
| Larsen v. Sylvester & Co., [1908] A.C. 295; 77 L.J.K.B. 993; 99 L.T. 94; 41 Digest 306, 1682 . . . . .                                                                                                               | 769, 772                                                             |
| Lassence v. Tierney, (1849), 1 Mac. & G. 551; 2 H. & Tw. 115; 15 L.T.O.S. 557; 37 Digest 99, 346 . . . . .                                                                                                           | 790, 792                                                             |
| Latham v. Johnson (R.) & Nephew, Ltd., [1913] 1 K.B. 398; 82 L.J.K.B. 258; 108 L.T. 4; 77 J.P. 137; 36 Digest 38, 223 . . . . .                                                                                      | 738, 744                                                             |
| Lauder v. Lauder, [1949] 1 All E.R. 76; [1949] P. 277 . . . . .                                                                                                                                                      | 41, 42                                                               |
| Lawrance v. Norreys (Lord), (1890), 15 App. Cas. 210; 59 L.J.Ch. 681; 62 L.T. 706; 54 J.P. 708; Digest, Pleading 85, 710 . . . . .                                                                                   | 124, 126                                                             |
| Lawrence v. Sinclair, [1949] 1 All E.R. 418; [1949] 2 K.B. 77; [1949] L.J.R. 1003 . . . . .                                                                                                                          | 60, 64                                                               |
| Laycock v. Pickles, Re , (1863), 4 B. & S. 497; 3 New Rep. 73; 33 L.J.Q.B. 43; 9 L.T. 378; 12 Digest 165, 1207 . . . . .                                                                                      | 125, 130, 136                                                        |
| Ledwith v. Roberts, [1936] 3 All E.R. 570; [1937] 1 K.B. 232; 106 L.J.K.B. 20; 155 L.T. 602; 101 J.P. 23; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                       | 547, 548, 549, 1006, 1007                                            |
| Lee John & Son (Grantham), Ltd. v. Railway Executive, [1949] 2 All E.R. 581 . . . . .                                                                                                                                | 864, 866, 920, 923                                                   |
| Leeds & Batley Breweries & Bradbury's Lease, Re , [1920] 2 Ch. 548; 89 L.J.Ch. 645; 124 L.T. 189; 30 Digest 472, 1355 . . . . .                                                                               | 613, 616, 617                                                        |
| Le Lievre v. Gould, [1893] 1 Q.B. 491; 62 L.J.Q.B. 353; 68 L.T. 626; 57 JP. 484; 35 Digest 28, 187; 36 Digest 10, 26 . . . . .                                                                                       | 181, 186, 1034, 1042, 1045                                           |
| Lensen Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Anglo-Soviet Shipping Co., Ltd., (1934), 50 Ll.L. Rep. 62; affmd. (1935) 52 Ll.L. Rep. 141; 40 Com. Cas. 320; Digest Supp. . . . .                                               | 202, 205, 206                                                        |
| Leroux v. Brown, (1852), 12 C.B. 801; 22 L.J.C.P. 1; 20 L.T.O.S. 68; 11 Digest 393, 672 . . . . .                                                                                                                    | 559, 576                                                             |
| Leslie & Co. v. Cumming, [1926] 2 K.B. 417; 95 L.J.K.B. 1007; 135 L.T. 443; 31 Digest 557, 7041 . . . . .                                                                                                            | 166, 170, 836, 841                                                   |
| L'Estrange v. Graucob (F.), Ltd., [1934] 2 K.B. 394; 103 L.J.K.B. 730; 152 L.T. 164; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                                            | 559, 575, 693, 695                                                   |
| Letang v. Ottawa Electric Ry. Co., [1926] A.C. 725; 95 L.J.P.C. 153; 135 L.T. 421; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                                              | 181, 185, 190                                                        |
| Lever Bros., Ltd. v. Masbro' Equitable Pioneers Society, Ltd., (1912), 106 L.T. 472; Digest, Practice, 925, 4677 . . . . .                                                                                           | 813, 817                                                             |
| Lewis v. Baker, [1905] 1 Ch. 46; 74 L.J.Ch. 39; 91 L.T. 744; 30 Digest 484, 1444 . . . . .                                                                                                                           | 60, 63                                                               |
| Lewis v. Ronald, (1909), 101 L.T. 534; 31 Digest 101, 2387 . . . . .                                                                                                                                                 | 476, 477, 478                                                        |
| Lewis and Lewis v. Durnford, (1907), 24 T.L.R. 64; 43 Digest 56, 571 . . . . .                                                                                                                                       | 427, 429                                                             |
| Liddle v. North Riding of Yorkshire County Council, [1934] 2 K.B. 101; 103 L.J.K.B. 527; 151 L.T. 202; 98 J.P. 319; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                             | 250, 251, 253                                                        |
| Liffen v. Watson, [1940] 2 All E.R. 213; [1940] 1 K.B. 556; 109 L.J.K.B. 367; 162 L.T. 398; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                                     | 976, 978                                                             |
| Lilley v. Doubleday, (1881), 7 Q.B.D. 510; 51 L.J.Q.B. 310; 44 L.T. 814; 46 J.P. 708; 3 Digest 77, 163 . . . . .                                                                                                     | 1073, 1081                                                           |
| Limerick S.S. Co. v. Stott, [1921] 2 K.B. 613; 90 L.J.K.B. 865; 125 L.T. 516; affm. , [1921] 1 K.B. 568; 41 Digest 521, 3496 . . . . .                                                                        | 202, 205, 206, 207                                                   |
| Littlechild v. Holt, [1949] 1 All E.R. 933; [1950] 1 K.B. 1; [1949] L.J.R. 1299 . . . . .                                                                                                                            | 586, 588, 589, 590                                                   |
| Liverpool Corp'n. v. Hope, [1938] 1 All E.R. 492; [1938] 1 K.B. 751; 107 L.J.K.B. 694; 158 L.T. 215; 102 J.P. 205; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                              | 30, 32, 442, 444, 447, 448                                           |
| Llewellyn v. Hinson, Llewellyn v. Christmas, [1948] 2 All E.R. 95; [1948] 2 K.B. 385; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                                       | 836, 839, 843, 846, 849, 854                                         |
| Lloyd v. Heathcote, (1820), 2 Brod. & Bing. 388; 5 Moore, C.P. 129; 4 Digest 114, 1029 . . . . .                                                                                                                     | 30, 34, 442, 445, 448                                                |
| London Jewellers, Ltd. v. Attenborough, London Jewellers, Ltd. v. Robertsons (London), Ltd., [1934] 2 K.B. 206; 103 L.J.K.B. 429; 151 L.T. 124; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                 | 737, 738, 741                                                        |
| London Joint Stock Bank v. MacMillan and Arthur, [1918] A.C. 777; 119 L.T. 387; 3 Digest 172, 293 . . . . .                                                                                                          | 1034, 1042                                                           |
| London Passenger Transport Board v. Upson, [1949] 1 All E.R. 60; [1949] A.C. 155; [1949] L.J.R. 238 . . . . .                                                                                                        | 231, 232                                                             |
| Long v. Millar, (1879), 4 C.P.D. 450; 48 L.J.Q.B. 596; 41 L.T. 306; 43 J.P. 797; 1 Digest 627, 2516 . . . . .                                                                                                        | 662                                                                  |
| Long v. The Tampico, (1883), 16 Federal Reporter 491 . . . . .                                                                                                                                                       | 749, 757, 761, 762                                                   |
| Longhead v. Phelps, (1770), 2 Wm. Bl. 704; 37 Digest 102, 376 . . . . .                                                                                                                                              | 790, 793, 794                                                        |
| Loveden v. Loveden, (1810), 2 Hag. Con. 1; 27 Digest 296, 2730 . . . . .                                                                                                                                             | 41, 43                                                               |
| Lovell and Christmas v. Beauchamp, [1894] A.C. 607; 63 L.J.Q.B. 802; 71 L.T. 587; varying, Re Beauchamp Brothers, Ex p. Beauchamp , [1894] 1 Q.B. 1; 63 L.J.Q.B. 101; 69 L.T. 646; 4 Digest 29, 230 . . . . . | 308, 313                                                             |
| Lovibond (John) & Sons, Ltd. v. Vincent, [1929] 1 K.B. 687; 98 L.J.K.B. 402; 141 L.T. 116; 93 J.P. 161; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                         | 836, 840                                                             |
| Lucas & Chesterfield Gas & Water Board, Re , [1909] 1 K.B. 16; 77 L.J.K.B. 1009; 99 L.T. 767; 72 J.P. 437; 11 Digest 127, 169 . . . . .                                                                       | 519, 526, 527                                                        |
| Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper, [1941] 1 All E.R. 33; [1941] A.C. 108; 110 L.J.K.B. 131; 164 L.T. 313; 2nd Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                  | 662, 663, 857, 858, 859, 862, 864, 866, 867, 919, 920, 923, 925, 926 |
| Lynch, Ex p. , Re Lynch , (1876), 2 Ch.D. 227; 45 L.J.Bcy. 48; 34 L.T. 34; 4 Digest 28, 223 . . . . .                                                                                                  | 308, 312                                                             |
| Maatschappij Voor Fondsenbezit v. Shell Transport & Trading Co., [1923] 2 K.B. 166; 92 L.J.K.B. 685; 129 L.T. 257; Digest, Practice, 904, 4451 . . . . .                                                             | 65, 66                                                               |
| Macadam, Re , [1950] 1 All E.R. 303 . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                 | 659, 661                                                             |
| McCallum v. Hicks, [1950] 1 All E.R. 864 . . . . .                                                                                                                                                                   | 920, 923                                                             |
| McEacharn's Settlement Trusts, Re , [1939] Ch. 858; 108 L.J.Ch. 326; 161 L.T. 263; Digest Supp. . . . .                                                                                                       | 624, 625                                                             |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                |                                             |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------|
| McGowan v. McGowan, [1948] 2 All E.R. 1032; [1949] L.J.R. 197; 113 J.P. 27; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 832, 833                                    |
| McHenry v. Lewis, (1882), 22 Ch.D. 397; 52 L.J.Ch. 325; 47 L.T. 549; 11 Digest 477, 1313                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 655, 656                                    |
| Macoun, Re , [1904] 2 K.B. 700; 73 L.J.K.B. 892; 91 L.T. 276; 4 Digest 112, 1013                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 30, 33                                      |
| McQuire v. Western Morning News Co., [1903] 2 K.B. 100; 72 L.J.K.B. 612; 88 L.T. 757; 32 Digest 151, 1826                                                                                                                                                                                      | 450, 461                                    |
| McTaggart v. McTaggart, [1948] 2 All E.R. 754; [1949] P. 94; [1949] L.J.R. 82                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 25, 26                                      |
| Maddison v. Chapman, (1858), 4 K. & J. 709; on appeal , (1859) 3 De G. & J. 536; 44 Digest 555, 4078                                                                                                                                                                                    | 690, 692                                    |
| Maddock, In the Goods of , (1874), L.R. 3 P. & D. 169; 43 L.J.P. & M. 29; 30 L.T. 696; 38 J.P. 631; 44 Digest 272, 1037                                                                                                                                                                 | 1009, 1012                                  |
| Magnhild (Owners) v. McIntyre Brothers & Co., [1920] 3 K.B. 321; 89 L.J.K.B. 1110; 124 L.T. 160; on appeal , [1921] 2 K.B. 97; 90 L.J.K.B. 527; 124 L.T. 771; 17 Digest 275, 896                                                                                                        | 769, 771                                    |
| Makin v. A.-G. for New South Wales, [1894] A.C. 57; 63 L.J.P.C. 41; 69 L.T. 778; 58 J.P. 148; 14 Digest 371, 3924                                                                                                                                                                              | 610                                         |
| Maley v. Fearn, [1946] 2 All E.R. 583; [1947] L.J.R. 276; 176 L.T. 203; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 627, 628, 629, 630                          |
| Malik v. Narodni Banka Ceskoslovenska, [1946] 2 All E.R. 663; 176 L.T. 136; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 558, 559, 563, 566, 568, 572, 573, 574, 575 |
| Malley v. Malley, (1909), 25 T.L.R. 662; 27 Digest 334, 3139                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 1000, 1004                                  |
| Mandel v. Steel, (1841), 8 M. & W. 558; 1 Dowl. N.S. 1; 10 L.J. Ex. 426; 39 Digest 472, 961                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 379, 383                                    |
| Manders v. Williams, (1849), 4 Exch. 339; 18 L.J. Ex. 437; 13 L.T.O.S. 325; 3 Digest 111, 350                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 780, 782                                    |
| Marshall, Re , [1920] 1 Ch. 284; 89 L.J.Ch. 204; 122 L.T. 673; 39 Digest 50, 618                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 479, 483                                    |
| Marshall & Dresser, Re , (1843), 3 Q.B. 878; 3 Gal. & Dav. 253; 12 L.J.Q.B. 104; 114 E.R. 746; 2 Digest 490, 1319                                                                                                                                                                       | 890, 892                                    |
| Martin v. Perry & Daw, [1931] 2 K.B. 310; 100 L.J.K.B. 582; 145 L.T. 455; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 920, 923                                    |
| Mason v. Mason, (1816), 1 Mer. 308; 35 E.R. 688; 44 Digest 222, 469                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 498, 500                                    |
| Matthey v. Curling, [1922] 2 A.C. 180; 91 L.J.K.B. 593; 127 L.T. 247; 31 Digest 342, 4857                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 580, 531                                    |
| Mediana (Owners) v. Comet (Owners, etc.), The Mediana , [1900] A.C. 113; 69 L.J.P. 35; 82 L.T. 95; 17 Digest 79, 9                                                                                                                                                                      | 976, 979                                    |
| Medlicot's Case, (1731), 2 Stra. 899; 4 Digest 110, 985                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 442, 446                                    |
| Merivale v. Carson, (1887), 20 Q.B.D. 275; 58 L.T. 331; 52 J.P. 261; 32 Digest 152, 1837                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 450, 461                                    |
| Mersey Docks v. Liverpool Overseers, (1873), L.R. 9 Q.B. 84; 43 L.J.M.C. 33; 29 L.T. 454; 38 J.P. 21; 38 Digest 563, 1016                                                                                                                                                                      | 155, 157, 158                               |
| Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v. Lucas, (1881), 51 L.J.Q.B. 114; 46 J.P. 388; 1 Tax Cas. 385; on appeal , (1883), 8 App. Cas. 891; 53 L.J.Q.B. 4; 49 L.T. 781; 48 J.P. 212; 2 Tax Cas. 25; 42 Digest 691, 1058                                                                           | 155, 162                                    |
| Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v. Proctor, [1923] A.C. 253; 92 L.J.K.B. 479; 129 L.T. 34; 36 Digest 15, 59                                                                                                                                                                                       | 738, 742                                    |
| Merstham Manor, Ltd. v. Coulsdon and Purley Urban District Council, [1936] 2 All E.R. 422; [1937] 2 K.B. 77; 106 L.J.K.B. 603; 100 J.P. 381; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                      | 116, 117                                    |
| Messiano, The , (1916), 32 T.L.R. 319; 1 Digest 162, 706                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 749, 760                                    |
| Metropolitan Real and General Property Trust, Ltd. v. Slaters & Bodega, Ltd., Regal Property Trust, Ltd. v. Same , Freehold &amp; Leasehold Investment Co., Ltd. v. Same , [1941] 1 All E.R. 310; 110 L.J.K.B. 246; 2nd Digest Supp.                                             | 835, 836, 838                               |
| Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr & Co., [1918] A.C. 119; 87 L.J.K.B. 370; 117 L.T. 766; 82 J.P. 61; affg. , [1917] 2 K.B. 1; 86 L.J.K.B. 675; 116 L.T. 201; 81 J.P. 181; 12 Digest 399, 3233                                                                                      | 209, 228, 769 772                           |
| Millard v. Wastall, [1898] 1 Q.B. 342; 67 L.J.Q.B. 277; 77 L.T. 692; 62 J.P. 135; 36 Digest 232, 725                                                                                                                                                                                           | 942, 945                                    |
| Miller v. Hancock, [1893] 2 Q.B. 177; 69 L.T. 214; 57 J.P. 758; 31 Digest 99, 2380                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 738, 742                                    |
| Miller v. Miller, (1869), L.R. 2 P. & D. 13; 39 L.J.P. & M. 4; 21 L.T. 471; subsequent proceedings , (1870), L.R. 2 P. & D. 54; 39 L.J.P. & M. 38; 22 L.T. 47; 27 Digest 470, 4925                                                                                                      | 813 817                                     |
| Miller v. Minister of Pensions, [1947] 2 All E.R. 372; [1948] L.J.R. 203; 177 L.T. 536; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                       | 41, 42                                      |
| Mills' Will Trusts, Re , [1937] 1 All E.R. 142; 106 L.J.Ch. 159; 156 L.T. 190; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                             | 338, 339, 341                               |
| Millward v. Millward and Andrews, (1887), 57 L.T. 569; 51 J.P. 616; 27 Digest 470, 4924                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 812, 813, 814, 817                          |
| Milne v. Milne and Fowler, (1871), L.R. 2 P. & D. 202; 40 L.J.P. & M. 13; 23 L.T. 877; 27 Digest 470, 4926                                                                                                                                                                                     | 812, 813, 814 817                           |
| Minister of Pensions v. Chennell, [1946] 2 All E.R. 719; [1947] K.B. 250; [1947] L.J.R. 700; 176 L.T. 164; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                    | 1035, 1047                                  |
| Minnehaha, The , (1861), 1 Lush. 335; sub nom. , Ward v. McKorkill , The Minnehaha , 15 Moo. P.C.C. 133; 4 L.T. 810; sub nom. , The Storm King and The United Kingdom (Owners) v. The Minnehaha (Owners) , 30 L.J.P.M. & A. 211; 41 Digest 676, 5056 | 104, 106                                    |
| Monarch S.S. Co., Ltd. v. A/B Karishamns Oljefabriker, [1949] 1 All E.R. 1; [1949] A.C. 196; [1949] L.J.R. 772                                                                                                                                                                                 | 1035, 1047, 1048, 1049                      |
| Monk v. Redwing Aircraft Co., Ltd., [1942] 1 All E.R. 133; [1942] 1 K.B. 182; 111 L.J.K.B. 277; 166 L.T. 42; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                  | 581                                         |
| Monk v. Warbey, [1935] 1 K.B. 75; 104 L.J.K.B. 153; 152 L.T. 194; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 488, 489, 490                               |
| Monypenny v. Dering, (1852), 2 De G., M. & G. 145; 22 L.J.Ch. 313; 19 L.T.O.S. 320; 37 Digest 123, 548                                                                                                                                                                                         | 789, 790, 792, 795                          |
| Moorcock, The , (1889), 14 P.D. 64; 58 L.J.P. 73; 60 L.T. 654; 12 Digest 611, 5048                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 52, 56                                      |
| Moore v. Moore, [1892] P. 382; 62 L.J.P. 10; 67 L.T. 530; 27 Digest 366, 3517                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 827, 828, 829                               |
| Mordaunt v. Moncreiffe, (1874), L.R. 2 Sc. & Div. 374; 43 L.J.P. & M. 49; 30 L.T. 649; 39 J.P. 4; 27 Digest 334, 3770                                                                                                                                                                          | 41, 42, 804, 806                            |
| Morgan v. Ashcroft, [1937] 3 All E.R. 92; [1938] 1 K.B. 49; 106 L.J.K.B. 544; 157 L.T. 87; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                        | 125, 131                                    |
| Morgan v. Richardson, (1806), cited 7 East 482, n.; 1 Camp. 40, n.; 3 Smith K.B. 487, n.; 103 E.R. 187; 6 Digest 163, 1044                                                                                                                                                                     | 929, 932                                    |
| Morgan & Son, Ltd. v. S. Martin Johnson & Co., Ltd., [1948] 2 All E.R. 196; [1948] L.J.R. 1530; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                               | 929, 931                                    |
| Morison, Pollexfen & Blair v. Walton, (1909), cited [1915] 1 K.B. at p. 90; 3 Digest 74, 143                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 1073, 1081                                  |
| Morley v. Staffordshire County Council, [1939] 4 All E.R. 92; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 250, 252                                    |
| Morrice v. Aymer, (1875), L.R. 7 H.L. 717; 45 L.J.Ch. 614; 34 L.T. 218; affg. , (1874), 10 Ch. App. 148; 44 L.J.Ch. 212; 31 L.T. 660; 44 Digest 704, 5465                                                                                                                               | 624, 626                                    |
| Morrow v. Morrow, [1914] 2 I.R. 183; 27 Digest 301, 2780v                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 619, 620                                    |
| Morton v. William Dixon, Ltd., 1909, S.C. 807                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 893, 402                                    |
| Moser v. Ambleside Urban District Council, (1924), 89 J.P. Jo. 59; affmd. , (1925), 89 J.P. 118; 26 Digest 294, 266                                                                                                                                                                     | 116, 119                                    |
| Muirhead, Ex p. , Re Muirhead , (1876), 2 Ch.D. 22; 45 L.J.Bcy. 65; 34 L.T. 303; 4 Digest 124, 1127                                                                                                                                                                              | 30, 33, 442, 447                            |
| Munro v. Stamp Duties Comr., [1934] A.C. 61; 103 L.J.P.C. 18; 150 L.T. 145; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 952, 962                                    |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |                         |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------|
| Murdoch Lowrie, Ltd. v. Newman, [1949] 2 All E.R. 783                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 662, 663                |
| Murgatroyd v. Tresarden, [1946] 2 All E.R. 723; [1947] K.B. 316; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 885                     |
| N. V. Ledeboter & Van der Held's Textiel-Handel v. Hibbert, [1947] K.B. 964; 177 L.T. 603; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                               | 700, 703, 707           |
| National Anti-Vivisection Society v. Inland Revenue Comrs., [1947] 2 All E.R. 217; [1948] A.C. 31; [1947] L.J.R. 1112; 177 L.T. 226; 28 Tax Cas. 311; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                    | 689, 690                |
| Naylor, Benzon & Co. v. Krahnische Industrie Gesellschaft & Co., [1918] 2 K.B. 486; 87 L.J.K.B. 1066; 118 L.T. 783; affd. , [1918] 1 K.B. 331; 118 L.T. 442; 12 Digest 242, 1975; 12 Digest 395, 3212                                                                              | 209, 223, 769, 772      |
| Neale v. Del Soto, [1945] 1 All E.R. 191; [1945] K.B. 144; 114 L.J.K.B. 138; 172 L.T. 65; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                | 209, 223, 769, 772      |
| 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 835, 836, 837, 839, 840, 842, 843, 844, 846, 849, 850, 851, 852, 854                                                                                                                                                                                        |                         |
| Nelson (E.P.) & Co. v. Rolfe, [1949] 2 All E.R. 584; [1950] 1 K.B. 139                                                                                                                                                                                                                    |                         |
| 662, 857, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 866, 919, 920, 924, 925, 927                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |                         |
| Nepean v. Doe d. Knight, (1837), 2 M. & W. 594; 7 L.J. Ex. 335; 2 Digest 165, 1412                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 498, 499                |
| Nevill v. Fine Art and General Insurance Co., [1895] 2 Q.B. 156; 64 L.J.Q.B. 681; 72 L.T. 525; 59 J.P. 371; affmd. , [1897] A.C. 68; 66 L.J.Q.B. 195; 75 L.T. 606; 61 J.P. 500; 32 Digest 154, 1868                                                                                | 450, 453, 458           |
| New South Wales Stamp Duties Comm. v. Perpetual Trustee Co., Ltd., [1943] 1 All E.R. 525; [1943] A.C. 425; 112 L.J.P.C. 55; 169 L.T. 414; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                | 952, 962                |
| New Zealand Shipping Co. v. Societ  des Ateliers et Chantiers de France, [1919] A.C. 1; 87 L.J.K.B. 746; 118 L.T. 731; 7 Digest 375, 20                                                                                                                                                   | 139, 142                |
| Nickell v. City of Windsor, [1927] 1 D.L.R. 379; 50 O.L.R. 618; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 683, 688                |
| Nightingale v. Parsons, [1914] 2 K.B. 621; 83 L.J.K.B. 742; 110 L.T. 806; 1 Digest 505, 1741                                                                                                                                                                                              | 920, 923                |
| Norman v. Great Western Ry. Co., [1915] 1 K.B. 584; 84 L.J.K.B. 598; 112 L.T. 266; 38 Digest 352, 580                                                                                                                                                                                     | 181, 184, 187           |
| Norman v. Simpson, [1946] 1 All E.R. 74; [1946] K.B. 158; 115 L.J.K.B. 107; 174 L.T. 279; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                | 627, 629, 630           |
| North Bucks Furniture Depositories, Ltd., Re , [1939] 2 All E.R. 549; [1939] Ch. 690; 108 L.J.Ch. 275; 160 L.T. 523; 103 J.P. 207; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                    | 30, 34, 442, 448        |
| Northampton Corp. v. Ellen, [1904] 1 K.B. 299; 73 L.J.K.B. 329; 90 L.T. 71; 68 J.P. 197; 43 Digest 1091, 227                                                                                                                                                                              | 370, 375                |
| Northcliffe, Re , [1929] 1 Ch. 327; 98 L.J.Ch. 65; 140 L.T. 300; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 665, 668, 671, 675, 676 |
| Northumbria, The , (1869), L.R. 3 A. & E. 8; 39 L.J. Adm. 3; 41 Digest 812, 6739                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 700, 702                |
| Nummery Colliery Co.'s Application, Re , (1924), 69 Sol. Jo. 52; 34 Digest 635, 321                                                                                                                                                                                                | 519, 524                |
| Oak Property Co., Ltd. v. Chapman, [1947] 2 All E.R. 1; [1947] K.B. 886; [1947] L.J.R. 1327; 177 L.T. 364; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                               | 627, 628, 630           |
| Ocean S.S. Co. v. Liverpool and London War Risks Insurance Association, Ltd., [1946] 2 All E.R. 355; [1946] K.B. 561; 115 L.J.K.B. 437; 175 L.T. 313; varied in part and affd. in part , [1947] 2 All E.R. 586; [1948] A.C. 243; [1948] L.J.R. 304; 177 L.T. 623; 2nd Digest Supp. | 1035, 1048              |
| Odium v. Vancouver City, (1915), 85 L.J.P.C. 95; 113 L.T. 795; 16 Digest 159, 608                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 891, 893                |
| Ogden v. Ogden, [1908] P. 46; 77 L.J.P. 34; 97 L.T. 827; 11 Digest 834, 228                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 237, 240                |
| Ogilvie, Re , [1910] P. 243; 79 L.J.P. 113; 103 L.T. 154; 42 Digest 216, 2430                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 435                     |
| O'Gorman, Re , Ex p. Bale, [1899] 2 Q.B. 62; 68 L.J.Q.B. 650; 80 L.T. 501; 4 Digest 124, 1128                                                                                                                                                                               | 30, 33                  |
| Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Alexander, [1949] 2 All E.R. 822                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 708, 712, 714, 715      |
| Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Toplis & Harding & Russell, [1939] 3 All E.R. 209; 161 L.T. 227; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                   | 1034, 1042              |
| Olds v. Olds, [1948] 2 All E.R. 61; [1948] P. 283; [1948] L.J.R. 1385; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 785, 786, 787           |
| Oliver v. Bank of England, [1902] 1 Ch. 610; 71 L.J.Ch. 888; 86 L.T. 248; affd. sub nom. , Starkey v. Bank of England, [1903] A.C. 114; 72 L.J.Ch. 402; 88 L.T. 244; 26 Digest 228, 1784                                                                                           | 1034, 1042, 1043        |
| Oliver v. Saddler & Co., [1929] A.C. 584; 98 L.J.P.C. 87; 141 L.T. 305; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 182, 190                |
| Ormond Investment Co. v. Betts, [1928] A.C. 143; 97 L.J.K.B. 342; 138 L.T. 600; 13 Tax Cas. 400; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                             | 192, 197, 198           |
| Orpen v. Haymarket Capitol, Ltd., (1931), 145 L.T. 614; 95 J.P. 199; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 639, 640, 641           |
| Owens v. Scott & Sons (Bakers), Ltd. & Wastall, [1939] 3 All E.R. 603; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 738, 739, 746           |
| Palace Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Gans S.S. Line, [1916] 1 K.B. 138; 85 L.J.K.B. 415; 115 L.T. 414; 41 Digest 522, 3503                                                                                                                                                                        | 201, 202, 203           |
| Panoutsos v. Raymond Hadley Corp. of New York, [1917] 2 K.B. 473; 86 L.J.K.B. 1325; 117 L.T. 330; 12 Digest 434, 3516                                                                                                                                                                     | 421, 423                |
| Park Ward & Co., Ltd., Re , [1926] Ch. 828; 95 L.J.Ch. 584; 135 L.T. 575; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                             | 21, 22, 24, 25          |
| Parkinson v. Hanbury, (1865), 12 L.T. 624; 29 J.P. 692; Digest, Practice, 933, 4728                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 435                     |
| Parkinson (Sir Lindsay) & Co., Ltd. v. Commissioners of Works and Public Buildings, [1950] 1 All E.R. 208; [1949] 2 K.B. 632                                                                                                                                                              | 769, 772, 775, 776      |
| Parlement Belge, The , (1880), 5 P.D. 197; 42 L.T. 273; 11 Digest 537, 394                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 749, 754                |
| Parry, Re , Ex p. Salaman, [1904] 1 K.B. 129; 73 L.J.K.B. 83; 89 L.T. 612; 5 Digest 845, 7117                                                                                                                                                                               | 304, 306                |
| Pass of Leny, The , (1936), 155 L.T. 421; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 202, 205                |
| Patrick v. Russo-British Grain Export Co., [1927] 2 K.B. 535; 137 L.T. 815; 39 Digest 670, 2575                                                                                                                                                                                           | 1035, 1049              |
| Pearce v. Edmcades, (1838), 3 Y. & C. Ex. 246; 8 L.J. Ex.   . 61; 3 Jur. 245; 41 Digest 994, 8524                                                                                                                                                                                         | 120, 122, 123           |
| Pearl v. Pearl and Lees, [1943] 4 D.L.R. 387; O.R. 720; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 607, 609                |
| Person, Re , Ex p. Pearson, [1892] 2 Q.B. 263; 61 L.J.Q.B. 585; 67 L.T. 367; 4 Digest 25, 202                                                                                                                                                                               | 405, 409                |
| Pepper's Case, (1704), 6 Mod. Rep. 238                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 264, 266                |
| Pepper v. Burland, (1791), Peake, 379; 7 Digest 371, 155                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 209, 225                |
| Phene's Trusts, Re , (1870), 5 Ch. App. 139; 39 L.J.Ch. 316; 22 L.T. 111; 22 Digest 164, 1402                                                                                                                                                                                      | 498, 500                |
| Phillips v. Batho, [1913] 3 K.B. 25; 82 L.J.K.B. 882; 109 L.T. 315; 11 Digest 458, 1749                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 96, 98, 99, 100         |
| Plevins v. Downing, (1876), 1 C.P.D. 220; 45 L.J.Q.B. 695; 35 L.T. 263; 40 J.P. 791; 12 Digest 357, 2968                                                                                                                                                                                  | 420, 423                |
| Podar Trading Co., Ltd., Bombay v. Francois Tagher, Barcelona, [1949] 2 All E.R. 62; [1949] 2 K.B. 277; [1949] L.J.R. 1470                                                                                                                                                                | 769, 770                |
| Poole v. Huskinson, (1843), 11 M. & W. 827; 26 Digest 286, 194                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 116, 119                |
| Pope, Re , Ex p. Dicksee, [1908] 2 K.B. 169; 77 L.J.K.B. 767; 98 L.T. 755; 5 Digest 843, 7106                                                                                                                                                                               | 304, 306                |
| Portman v. Latta, [1942] W.N. 97; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 323, 324, 328, 329      |
| Portsmouth Steamship Co. v. Liverpool Salvage Co., (1929), 34 Ll.L. Rep. 450                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 202, 207                |
| Potts v. Hickman, [1940] 4 All E.R. 491; [1941] A.C. 212; 110 L.J.K.B. 101; 164 L.T. 846; 105 J.P. 26; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                   | 442, 447                |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  |                         |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------|
| Potts v. Reid, [1942] 2 All E.R. 161; [1943] A.C. 1; 111 L.J.P.C. 65; 167 L.T. 301; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                             | 172, 178                |
| Poulden v. Poulden, [1938] 1 All E.R. 508; [1938] P. 63; 107 L.J.P. 27; 158 L.T. 231; 102 J.P. 155; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                 | 1000, 1003              |
| Powell v. Cleland, [1947] 2 All E.R. 672; [1948] 1 K.B. 262; [1948] L.J.R. 250; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                 | 586, 588                |
| Pratt v. Pratt, [1939] 3 All E.R. 437; [1939] A.C. 417; 108 L.J.P. 97; 161 L.T. 49; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                 | 812, 813, 816           |
| Price, Re , [1928] Ch. 579; 97 L.J.Ch. 423; 139 L.T. 339; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                    | 643, 648                |
| Price, Re , Ex parte Foreman, (1884), 13 Q.B.D. 466; 5 Digest 939, 7672                                                                                                                                                                            | 1086, 1089              |
| Price v. Gould, (1930), 143 L.T. 333; 94 J.P. 210; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 71                      |
| Prickett v. Badger, (1856), 1 C.B.N.S. 296; 26 L.J.C.P. 33; 140 E.R. 123; 1 Digest 509, 1754                                                                                                                                                                     | 864, 866, 920, 923      |
| Priestley v. Fowler, (1837), 3 M. & W. 1; 7 L.J.Ex. 42; 34 Digest 202, 1647                                                                                                                                                                                      | 819, 822                |
| Princess Alice, The, (1849), 3 Wm. Rob. 138; 6 Notes of Cases, 584; 41 Digest 836, 6972                                                                                                                                                                          | 104, 107, 108, 114      |
| Proctor v. Harris, (1830), 4 C. & P. 337; 36 Digest 50, 311                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 788, 745                |
| Property Holding Co., Ltd. v. Clark, [1948] 1 All E.R. 165; [1948] 1 K.B. 630; [1948] L.J.R. 1066; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                              | 1019, 1025, 1026, 1027  |
| Prout v. Hunter, [1924] 2 K.B. 736; 93 L.J.K.B. 993; 132 L.T. 193; 31 Digest 557, 7040                                                                                                                                                                           | 166, 170, 836, 841, 842 |
| Provincial Bill Posting Co. v. Low Moor Iron Co., [1909] 2 K.B. 344; 78 L.J.K.B. 702; 109 L.T. 726; 40 Digest 431, 533                                                                                                                                           | 378, 380, 381           |
| R. v. Barlow, (1693), 2 Salk. 609; Carth. 293; 42 Digest 717, 1363                                                                                                                                                                                               | 370, 377                |
| R. v. Birdseye, (1830), 4 C. & P. 386; 14 Digest 368, 3393                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 619                     |
| R. v. Bodmin Justices, Ex p. McEwen, [1947] 1 All E.R. 109; [1947] K.B. 321; [1947] L.J.R. 388; 111 J.P. 47; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                             | 38, 636, 638            |
| R. v. Bond, [1906] 2 K.B. 389; 75 L.J.K.B. 693; 95 L.T. 296; 70 J.P. 424; 14 Digest 371, 3921                                                                                                                                                                    | 610                     |
| R. v. Brixton Prison (Governor), Ex p. Waite, (1921), The Times , Feb. 22                                                                                                                                                                          | 284, 236                |
| R. v. Carpenter, (1911), 76 J.P. 158; 15 Digest 1006, 11267                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 831                     |
| R. v. Davis, [1937] 3 All E.R. 537; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 610                     |
| R. v. Dunne, (1929), 99 L.J.K.B. 117; 143 L.T. 120; 21 Cr. App. Rep. 176; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                           | 335, 363, 337           |
| R. v. Effingham (Earl), (1871), 2 B. & Ad. 391 n                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 264, 265, 266           |
| R. v. Fairbairn, [1949] 2 K.B. 690                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 547, 548                |
| R. v. Grant, [1936] 2 All E.R. 1156; 106 L.J.K.B. 9; 155 L.T. 209; 100 J.P. 324; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                    | 916, 917                |
| R. v. Green, [1950] 1 All E.R. 38; 114 J.P. 60                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 636, 638                |
| R. v. Harborne (Inhabitants), (1835), 2 Ad. & El. 540; 4 L.J.M.C. 49; 111 E.R. 209; 22 Digest 164, 1339                                                                                                                                                          | 498, 499, 500           |
| R. v. Horrocks, etc., JJ., Ex parte Boustead, (1900), 69 L.J.Q.B. 688; 82 L.T. 767; 64 J.P. 661; 36 Digest 237, 757                                                                                                                                       | 942                     |
| R. v. Hunter, (1867), 17 L.T. 321; 32 J.P. 357; 15 Digest 992, 11102                                                                                                                                                                                             | 831                     |
| R. v. Mellor, (1858), Dears & B. 468; 27 L.J. M.C. 121; 30 L.T. O.S. 309; 22 J.P. 191; 30 Digest 232, 280                                                                                                                                                        | 807, 811                |
| R. v. Millis, (1844), 10 Cl. & Fin. 534; 27 Digest 49, 222                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 619, 623                |
| R. v. Minister of Health, Ex parte Villiers, [1936] 1 All E.R. 817; [1936] 2 K.B. 29; 105 L.J.K.B. 792; 154 L.T. 630; 100 J.P. 212; Digest Supp.                                                                                                          | 898, 901                |
| R. v. Neal, [1949] 2 All E.R. 438; [1949] 2 K.B. 590; 113 J.P. 468                                                                                                                                                                                               | 636, 637                |
| R. v. Newmarket Income Tax Commissioners, Ex p. Huxley, [1916] 1 K.B. 788; 85 L.J.K.B. 925; 114 L.T. 963; 7 Tax Cas. 49; 23 Digest 96, 575                                                                                                                | 308, 309                |
| R. v. Norman, (1922), 17 Cr. App. Rep. 29; 14 Digest 242, 2316                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 93, 94                  |
| R. v. Olivo, [1942] 2 All E.R. 494; 168 L.T. 112; 106 J.P. 284; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                 | 807                     |
| R. v. Pembrokeshire J.J., (1832), 2 B. & Ad. 391; 1 L.J.M.C. 92; 33 Digest 449, 1598                                                                                                                                                                             | 264, 265, 266           |
| R. v. Pimley, (1853), Dears. C. 149; 22 L.J.M.C. 48; 20 L.T.O.S. 228; 17 J.P. 69; 15 Digest 878, 9634                                                                                                                                                            | 137, 138                |
| R. v. Rodley, [1913] 3 K.B. 468; 82 L.J.K.B. 1070; 109 L.T. 476; 77 J.P. 465; 14 Digest 373, 3935                                                                                                                                                                | 610                     |
| R. v. Sheridan, [1936] 2 All E.R. 883; [1937] 1 K.B. 223; 106 L.J.K.B. 6; 155 L.T. 207; 100 J.P. 319; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                               | 916, 917                |
| R. v. Sowerby, [1894] 2 Q.B. 173; 63 L.J.M.C. 136; 71 L.T. 300; 58 J.P. 577; 15 Digest 1009, 11335                                                                                                                                                               | 830, 831                |
| R. v. Sutton, (1828), 8 B. & C. 417; sub nom. , R. v. Despard, 6 L.J. O.S. M.C. 102; 14 Digest 221, 104                                                                                                                                                   | 807, 810                |
| R. v. Tremearne, (1826), 5 B. & C. 254; 4 L.J. O.S. K.B. 157; 30 Digest 233, 287                                                                                                                                                                                 | 807, 810, 811           |
| R. v. Turner, [1910] 1 K.B. 346; 79 L.J.K.B. 176; 102 L.T. 367; 74 J.P. 81; 14 Digest 482, 5258                                                                                                                                                                  | 37                      |
| R. v. Twynning, Gloucestershire (Inhabitants), (1819), 2 B. & Ald. 386; 15 Digest 740, 7992                                                                                                                                                                      | 498, 499, 500           |
| R. v. Verrall, (1875), 1 Q.B.D. 9; 45 L.J.M.C. 29; sub nom. , Verrall v. Croydon Union, 33 L.T. 379; sub nom. , Croydon Union v. Verrall, 40 J.P. 550; 38 Digest 526, 732                                                                          | 155, 158                |
| R. v. Wakefield, [1918] 1 K.B. 216; 87 L.J.K.B. 319; 118 L.T. 576; 82 J.P. 136; 14 Digest 539, 6100                                                                                                                                                              | 807, 811                |
| R. v. Walsall Overseers, (1878), 3 Q.B.D. 457; 47 L.J.Q.B. 711; 38 L.T. 665; 42 J.P. 644; on appeal , sub nom. , Walsall Poor Overseers v. London & North Western Ry. Co., (1878), 4 App. Cas. 30; 33 Digest 449, 1600                             | 264, 265                |
| R. v. Westminster Assessment Committee, Ex parte Grosvenor House (Park Lane), Ltd., [1940] 4 All E.R. 132; [1941] 1 K.B. 53; 110 L.J.K.B. 6; 165 L.T. 43; 104 J.P. 428; Digest Supp.                                                                      | 947, 950                |
| R. v. Wheatley, Ex parte Cowburn, (1885), 16 Q.B.D. 34; 55 L.J.M.C. 11; 54 L.T. 680; 50 J.P. 424; 36 Digest 236, 756                                                                                                                                      | 942, 945                |
| Racecourse Betting Control Board v. Brighton Corp., [1941] 2 All E.R. 595; [1941] 2 K.B. 287; 111 L.J.K.B. 9; 165 L.T. 230; 105 J.P. 365; affd. , [1942] 1 All E.R. 611; [1942] 2 K.B. 90; 111 L.J.K.B. 542; 167 L.T. 250; 106 J.P. 177; 2nd Digest Supp. | 155, 159, 161           |
| Radnor (Earl) v. Shafto, (1805), 11 Ves. 448; 44 Digest 211, 333                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 502, 510, 514, 515      |
| Raffelen, In the goods of , (1863), 3 Sw. & Tr. 49; 1 New Rep. 569; 32 L.J.P.M. & A. 203; 8 L.T. 211; 11 Digest 331, 192                                                                                                                                  | 199, 200                |
| Randell, Re , (1888), 38 Ch.D. 213; 57 L.J.Ch. 899; 58 L.T. 626; 8 Digest 323, 1054                                                                                                                                                                       | 690, 692                |
| Ranson v. Platt, [1911] 2 K.B. 291; 80 L.J.K.B. 1138; 104 L.T. 881; 3 Digest 77, 164                                                                                                                                                                             | 1034, 1035, 1046        |
| Ras Behari Lal v. Regem, (1933), 102 L.J.P.C. 144; 150 L.T. 3; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                      | 807, 811                |
| Rawley v. Rawley, (1876), 1 Q.B.D. 460; 45 L.J.Q.B. 675; 35 L.T. 191; 28 Digest 162, 198                                                                                                                                                                         | 442, 445                |
| Rawlings v. Smith, [1938] 1 All E.R. 11; [1938] 1 K.B. 675; 107 L.J.K.B. 151; 158 L.T. 274; 102 J.P. 181; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                           | 1006, 1008              |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        |                                                                 |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------|
| Rayment v. Rayment and Stuart, Chapman v. Chapman and Buist , [1910] P. 271; 79 L.J.P. 115; 103 L.T. 430; 27 Digest 392, 3684                                                                                                   | 96, 98                                                          |
| Read v. Goater , [1921] 1 K.B. 611; 90 L.J.K.B. 580; 125 L.T. 87; 31 Digest 561, 7088                                                                                                                                           | 885, 889                                                        |
| Reed (Dennis), Ltd. v. Nicholls , [1948] 2 All E.R. 914; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                       | 857, 860, 920, 925, 927                                         |
| Rees v. Cambrian Wagon Works, Ltd. , (1946), 175 L.T. 220; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                     | 820, 825                                                        |
| Regional Properties, Ltd. v. Oxley , [1945] 2 All E.R. 418; [1945] A.C. 347; 114 L.J.K.B. 473; 173 L.T. 201; affg. , [1944] 2 All E.R. 510; [1944] K.B. 733; 171 L.T. 129; 2nd Digest Supp.                              | 1019, 1025                                                      |
| Reid v. Wilson and Ward, Reid v. Wilson and King , [1895] 1 Q.B. 315; 64 L.J.M.C. 60; 71 L.T. 739; 59 J.P. 516; 15 Digest 759, 8177                                                                                             | 639, 641                                                        |
| Rein v. Stein , [1892] 1 Q.B. 753; 61 L.J.Q.B. 401; 66 L.T. 469; Digest, Practice 349, 646                                                                                                                                      | 559, 575                                                        |
| Reischer v. Borwick , [1894] 2 Q.B. 543; 63 L.J.Q.B. 753; 71 L.T. 238; 29 Digest 206, 1650                                                                                                                                      | 1034, 1035, 1048                                                |
| Remon v. City of London Real Property Co. , [1921] 1 K.B. 49; 89 L.J.K.B. 1105; 123 L.T. 617; 31 Digest 556, 7032                                                                                                               | 166, 168, 169, 170, 171, 836, 839                               |
| Reward, The , (1841), 1 Wm. Rob. 174; 8 L.T. 704; 41 Digest 833, 6937                                                                                                                                                           | 104, 107, 114                                                   |
| Reynolds, Re, Ex p. White Bros., Ltd. , [1915] 2 K.B. 186; 84 L.J.K.B. 1346; 112 L.T. 1049; 4 Digest 33, 274                                                                                                                    | 405, 406, 411, 412                                              |
| Rhodes v. Liverpool Commercial Investment Co. , (1879), 4 C.P.D. 425; 13 Digest 538, 901                                                                                                                                        | 267, 269                                                        |
| Richardson v. Williamson and Lawson , (1871), L.R. 6 Q.B. 276; 40 L.J.Q.B. 145; 35 J.P. 728; 1 Digest 663, 2784                                                                                                                 | 1035, 1043                                                      |
| Richerson, Re (No. 2) , [1893] 3 Ch. 146; 62 L.J.Ch. 708; 69 L.T. 590; 44 Digest 983, 8393                                                                                                                                      | 121, 123                                                        |
| Rider v. Rollit , [1920], 36 T.L.R. 687; 31 Digest 557, 7038                                                                                                                                                                    | 885                                                             |
| Ritter v. Godfrey , [1920] 2 K.B. 47; 89 L.J.K.B. 467; 122 L.T. 396; Digest, Practice, 871, 4129                                                                                                                                | 813, 816                                                        |
| Roberts v. Bury Improvement Comrs. , (1870), L.R. 5 C.P. 310; 39 L.J.C.P. 129; 22 L.T. 132; 34 J.P. 821; 7 Digest 346, 59                                                                                                       | 920, 923                                                        |
| Robertson v. Robertson and Favagrossa , (1881), 6 P.D. 119; 51 L.J.P. 5; 45 L.T. 237; 27 Digest 472, 4960                                                                                                                       | 27, 28                                                          |
| Robertson v. Minister of Pensions , [1948] 2 All E.R. 767; [1949] 1 K.B. 227; [1949] L.J.R. 323                                                                                                                                 | 539, 452                                                        |
| Robinson v. Robinson and Lane , (1859), 1 Sw. & Tr. 362; 29 L.J.P.M. & A. 178; 31 L.T.O.S. 268; 33 L.T.O.S. 96; 27 Digest 300, 2777                                                                                             | 619, 620, 621                                                   |
| Robson v. Drummond , (1831), 2 B. & Ad. 303; 9 L.J.O.S.K.B. 187; 109 E.R. 1156; 12 Digest 589, 4909                                                                                                                             | 1073, 1075                                                      |
| Roe v. Russell , [1928] 2 K.B. 117; 97 L.J.K.B. 290; 138 L.T. 253; 92 J.P. 81; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                     | 836, 845, 851                                                   |
| Rogers v. Rogers , (1830), 3 Hag. Ecc. 57; 27 Digest 327, 3061                                                                                                                                                                  | 602, 605, 607, 608                                              |
| Rogers v. Rogers , [1894] P. 161; 63 L.J.P. 97; 70 L.T. 699; 27 Digest 486, 5172                                                                                                                                                | 827, 828, 829                                                   |
| Royal Greek Government v. Minister of Transport (unreported)                                                                                                                                                                    | 202, 203                                                        |
| Ruse v. Read , [1949] 1 All E.R. 398; [1949] 1 K.B. 377                                                                                                                                                                         | 137, 138                                                        |
| Russell v. Scott , [1948] 2 All E.R. 1; [1948] A.C. 422; [1948] L.J.R. 1265; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                   | 385, 387, 388, 390                                              |
| Sacker, Re, Ex p. Sacker , (1888), 22 Q.B.D. 179; 58 L.J.Q.B. 4; 60 L.T. 344; 4 Digest 113, 1019                                                                                                                                | 30, 33                                                          |
| St. Pierre v. South American Stores (Gath &amp; Chaves), Ltd. &amp; Chilean Stores (Gath &amp; Chaves), Ltd. , [1937] 3 All E.R. 349; Digest Supp.                                                                              | 559, 575, 576                                                   |
| Salaman v. Secretary of State for India , [1906] 1 K.B. 613; 75 L.J.K.B. 418; 94 L.T. 858; 1 Digest 655, 2731                                                                                                                   | 431, 434                                                        |
| Salisbury (Marquis) v. Gilmore , [1942] 1 All E.R. 457; [1942] 2 K.B. 38; 111 L.J.K.B. 593; 166 L.T. 329; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                      | 323, 324, 327, 329, 531, 534, 720, 721, 722, 723, 725, 857, 861 |
| Salmon v. Duncombe , (1886), 11 App. Cas. 627; 55 L.J.P.C. 69; 55 L.T. 446; 42 Digest 676, 874                                                                                                                                  | 969, 973                                                        |
| Salvesen (or von Lorange) v. Austrian Property Administrator , [1927] A.C. 641; 96 L.J.P.C. 105; 137 L.T. 571; Digest Supp.                                                                                                     | 236, 238, 239, 240                                              |
| Samuel, Re, Trustee v. Kerman (No. 2) , [1945] 2 All E.R. 319; [1945] Ch. 364; 114 L.J.Ch. 337; 173 L.T. 278; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                  | 342, 343                                                        |
| Saunders, Ex parte , (1883), 11 Q.B.D. 191; 52 L.J.M.C. 89; 47 J.P. 584; 36 Digest 236, 752                                                                                                                                     | 942                                                             |
| Savoy Estate, Ltd., Re , [1949] 2 All E.R. 286; [1949] Ch. 622; [1949] L.J.R. 1549                                                                                                                                              | 139, 141                                                        |
| Scarff v. Jardine , (1882), 7 App. Cas. 345; 51 L.J.Q.B. 612; 47 L.T. 258; 21 Digest 224, 577; 36 Digest 382, 581                                                                                                               | 654, 656, 657, 1035, 1044                                       |
| Schintz, Re , [1926] Ch. 710; 95 L.J.Ch. 393; 135 L.T. 350; Digest, Practice, 358, 716                                                                                                                                          | 356, 359                                                        |
| Schloss Brothers v. Stevens , [1906] 2 K.B. 665; 75 L.J.K.B. 927; 96 L.T. 205; 29 Digest 226, 1832                                                                                                                              | 769, 772                                                        |
| Schofield v. Londesborough (Earl) , [1896] A.C. 514; 65 L.J.Q.B. 593; 75 L.T. 254; 6 Digest 384, 2518                                                                                                                           | 1034, 1042                                                      |
| Scott v. London Dock Co. , (1865), 3 H. & C. 596; 5 New Rep. 420; 34 L.J. Ex. 220; 13 L.T. 148; 36 Digest 14, 48                                                                                                                | 393, 394                                                        |
| Seaford Court Estates, Ltd. v. Asher , [1949] 2 All E.R. 155; [1949] 2 K.B. 481                                                                                                                                                 | 1082, 1084                                                      |
| Seaman v. Burley , [1896] 2 Q.B. 344; 65 L.J.M.C. 208; 75 L.T. 91; 60 J.P. 772; 18 Digest 422, 1603                                                                                                                             | 442, 447                                                        |
| Seddon v. North Eastern Salt Co., Ltd. , [1905] 1 Ch. 326; 74 L.J.Ch. 199; 91 L.T. 793; 39 Digest 686, 2719                                                                                                                     | 693, 695, 696, 697                                              |
| Sedgwick v. Watney, Combe, Reid &amp; Co. , [1931] A.C. 447; 100 L.J.K.B. 271; 145 L.T. 73; 95 J.P. 115; Digest Supp.                                                                                                           | 937, 938                                                        |
| Seward v. Vera Cruz, The Vera Cruz , (1884), 10 App. Cas. 59; 54 L.J.P. 9; 52 L.T. 474; 49 J.P. 324; 42 Digest 769, 1959                                                                                                        | 898, 901                                                        |
| Shymour v. Coulson , (1880), 5 Q.B.D. 359; 49 L.J.Q.B. 604; 13 Digest 538, 902                                                                                                                                                  | 267, 269                                                        |
| Sharman, In the Goods of , (1869), L.R. 1 P. & D. 661; 38 L.J.P. & M. 47; 20 L.T. 683; 33 J.P. 695; 44 Digest 276, 1091                                                                                                         | 1009, 1012                                                      |
| Sharpe v. Nicholls , [1945] 2 All E.R. 55; [1945] K.B. 382; 114 L.J.K.B. 409; 172 L.T. 363; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                    | 836, 849                                                        |
| Shears v. Matthews , [1948] 2 All E.R. 1064; 113 J.P. 36; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                      | 101                                                             |
| Sheppard v. Sheppard , [1905] P. 185; 74 L.J.P. 102; 93 L.T. 443; 27 Digest 423, 4297                                                                                                                                           | 27, 29                                                          |
| Shirlaw v. Southern Foundries, (1926), Ltd. , [1939] 2 All E.R. 113; [1939] 2 K.B. 206; 108 L.J.K.B. 747; 160 L.T. 353; affd. , [1940] 2 All E.R. 445; [1940] A.C. 701; 109 L.J.K.B. 461; 164 L.T. 251; 2nd Digest Supp. | 209, 219                                                        |
| Shuckburgh's Settlement, Re , [1901] 2 Ch. 794; 71 L.J.Ch. 32; 85 L.T. 406; 37 Digest 447, 510                                                                                                                                  | 690, 692                                                        |
| Simpson v. Lamb , (1856), 17 C.B. 603; 25 L.J.C.P. 113; 26 L.T.O.S. 203; 139 E.R. 1213; 1 Digest 494, 1697                                                                                                                      | 920, 923                                                        |
| Simpson v. Thomson , (1877), 3 App. Cas. 279; 38 L.T. 1; 29 Digest 290, 2355                                                                                                                                                    | 976, 978                                                        |
| Sinclair v. Brougham , [1914] A.C. 398; 83 L.J.Ch. 465; 111 L.T. 1; 12 Digest 282, 2317                                                                                                                                         | 729, 734                                                        |
| Siqueria v. Noronha , [1934] A.C. 332; 103 L.J.P.C. 63; 151 L.T. 6; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                | 124, 127                                                        |

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |                         |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------|
| Skinner v. Geary, [1931] 2 K.B. 546; 100 L.J.K.B. 718; 145 L.T. 675; 95 J.P. 194; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                        | 73, 74, 75, 885         |
| Slater v. Hoyle & Smith, [1920] 2 K.B. 11; 89 L.J.K.B. 401; 122 L.T. 611; 39 Digest 481, 1026                                                                                                                                                                                         | 530, 533                |
| Smedley, Re , (1864), 10 L.T. 432; 4 Digest 29, 224                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 308, 311, 312, 315      |
| Smith v. Baker & Sons, [1891] A.C. 325; 60 L.J.Q.B. 683; 65 L.T. 467; 55 J.P. 660; 13 Digest 527, 739                                                                                                                                                                                 | 267, 269                |
| Smith v. Mather, [1948] 1 All E.R. 704; [1948] 2 K.B. 212; [1948] L.J.R. 1209; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                       | 139, 141                |
| Smith, Hogg & Co., Ltd. v. Black Sea and Baltic General Insurance Co., Ltd., [1940] 3 All E.R. 405; [1940] A.C. 997; 109 L.J.K.B. 848; 163 L.T. 261; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                     | 1035, 1047              |
| Smith's Estate, Re , (1887), 35 Ch.D. 589; 56 L.J.Ch. 726; 56 L.T. 850; 51 J.P. 692; 42 Digest 769, 1963                                                                                                                                                                       | 898, 901                |
| Smith's Potato Estates, Ltd. v. Bolland, Smith's Potato Crisps, (1929), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs., [1948] 2 All E.R. 367; [1948] A.C. 508; [1948] L.J.R. 1557; 30 Tax Cas. 267; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                  | 969, 974                |
| Sociedad Anonima Commercial de Esportacion e Importacion (Dreyfus (Louis) & Co.) v. National S.S. Co., [1935] 2 K.B. 313; 104 L.J.K.B. 529; 153 L.T. 180; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                | 985, 986, 987           |
| Societe Generale de Paris v. Dreyfus Bros., (1887), 37 Ch.D. 215; 57 L.J.Ch. 276; 58 L.T. 573; Digest, Practice, 339, 574; revers , (1885), 29 Ch.D. 239; 54 L.J.Ch. 893; 53 L.T. 463                                                                                          | 356, 359                |
| Solle v. Butcher, [1949] 2 All E.R. 1107                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 693, 694, 695, 696, 697 |
| Somerville v. Hawkins, (1851), 10 C.B. 583; 20 L.J.C.P. 131; 16 L.T.O.S. 283; 32 Digest 112, 1437                                                                                                                                                                                     | 450, 455                |
| Somerville v. Lethbridge, (1795), 6 Term Rep. 213; 37 Digest 126, 581                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 790, 793                |
| South Eastern Ry. Co. & London County Council's Contract, Re , [1915] 2 Ch. 252; 84 L.J.Ch. 756; 113 L.T. 392; 79 J.P. 545; 11 Digest 124, 156                                                                                                                                 | 519, 526, 527           |
| Spanish Prospecting Co., Ltd., Re , [1911] 1 Ch. 92; 80 L.J.Ch. 210; 103 L.T. 609; 36 Digest 447, 1127                                                                                                                                                                         | 155, 162                |
| Speed v. Thomas Swift & Co., Ltd., [1943] 1 All E.R. 539; [1943] K.B. 557; 112 L.J.K.B. 487; 169 L.T. 67; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                            | 820, 824, 825, 826      |
| Spiller v. Maude, (1881), 32 Ch.D. 158, n. ; 8 Digest 262, 245                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 143, 147                |
| Stanley's Settlement, Re , [1916] 2 Ch. 50; 85 L.J.Ch. 809; 114 L.T. 933; 40 Digest 563, 1016                                                                                                                                                                                  | 120, 121, 123           |
| S.S. Knutsford, Ltd. v. Tillmans & Co., [1908] A.C. 406; 77 L.J.K.B. 977; 99 L.T. 399; 41 Digest 522, 3504                                                                                                                                                                            | 202, 204                |
| Stelfox v. Sugden, (1859), John. 234; 39 Digest 153, 456                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 726, 728                |
| Stephens v. Junior Army and Navy Stores, Ltd., [1914] 2 Ch. 516; 84 L.J.Ch. 56; 111 L.T. 1055; 31 Digest 94, 2350                                                                                                                                                                     | 1035, 1045              |
| Steven v. Bromley & Son, [1919] 2 K.B. 722; 88 L.J.K.B. 1147; 121 L.T. 354; 41 Digest 654, 4370                                                                                                                                                                                       | 769, 775                |
| Stevens v. Durban-Roodepoort Gold Mining Co., (1909), 100 L.T. 481; 5 Tax Cas. 402; 28 Digest 54, 277                                                                                                                                                                                 | 969, 971, 972           |
| Stevenson, Ex p. , Re Purser, (1868), 19 L.T. 23; 4 Digest 29, 225                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 308, 311, 312, 315      |
| Stevenson (Hugh) & Sons v. Akt. fur Cartonnagen Industrie, [1918] A.C. 239; 87 L.J.K.B. 416; 118 L.T. 126; 2 Digest 177, 416                                                                                                                                                          | 699, 700, 705, 707      |
| Stickney v. Keeble, [1915] A.C. 386; 84 L.J.Ch. 259; 112 L.T. 664; 40 Digest 113, 912                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 420, 421, 424           |
| Stoeck v. Public Trustee, [1921] 2 Ch. 67; 80 L.J.Ch. 386; 125 L.T. 851; 11 Digest 543, 474                                                                                                                                                                                           | 431, 434                |
| Stokes v. Whicher, [1920] 1 Ch. 411; 89 L.J.Ch. 198; 123 L.T. 23; 12 Digest 143, 967                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 662                     |
| Stooke v. Taylor, (1880), 5 Q.B.D. 569; 49 L.J.Q.B. 857; 43 L.T. 200; 44 J.P. 748; 40 Digest 369, 2                                                                                                                                                                                   | 378, 380, 383           |
| Stovell v. Jameson, [1939] 4 All E.R. 76; [1940] 1 K.B. 92; 109 L.J.K.B. 259; 161 L.T. 355; 103 J.P. 369; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                | 291                     |
| Stowell v. Railway Executive, [1949] 2 All E.R. 193; [1949] 2 K.B. 519; [1949] L.J.R. 1482                                                                                                                                                                                            | 683, 688                |
| Strathnaver, The, (1875), 1 App. Cas. 58; 34 L.T. 143; 41 Digest 828, 6875                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 104, 109                |
| Stroms Bruks Akt v. Hutchison, [1905] A.C. 515; 74 L.J.P.C. 130; 93 L.T. 562; 17 Digest 78, 4                                                                                                                                                                                         | 1035, 1048              |
| Sturgis v. Morse (No. 2), (1859), 26 Beav. 562; 33 L.T.O.S. 5                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 550                     |
| Suche (Joseph) & Co., Ltd., Re , (1875), 1 Ch.D. 48; 45 L.J.Ch. 12; 33 L.T. 774; 42 Digest 706, 1236                                                                                                                                                                           | 166, 167, 168           |
| Sudeley (Lord) v. A.-G., [1897] A.C. 11; 66 L.J.Q.B. 21; 75 L.T. 398; 61 J.P. 420; 21 Digest 122, 917                                                                                                                                                                                 | 81, 89                  |
| Summers v. Donohue, [1945] 1 All E.R. 599; [1945] K.B. 376; 114 L.J.K.B. 401; 172 L.T. 310; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                          | 139, 141, 627, 628, 629 |
| Summers v. Salford Corp., [1943] 1 All E.R. 68; [1943] A.C. 283; 112 L.J.K.B. 65; 168 L.T. 97; 107 J.P. 35; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                          | 202, 207                |
| Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada v. Jervis, [1944] 1 All E.R. 469; [1944] A.C. 111; 113 L.J.K.B. 174; 170 L.T. 345; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                  | 835, 836, 838, 848      |
| Surrey County Valuation Committee v. Chessington Zoo, Ltd., [1950] 1 All E.R. 154                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 254, 255                |
| Sutherland v. Glasgow Corp., [1949] Sc.L.T. 358                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 367, 368, 369           |
| Sydenham v. Sydenham & Illingworth, [1949] 2 All E.R. 196; [1949] L.J.R. 1424                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 618                     |
| Syria, The, (1874), see PRITCHARD'S ADMIRALTY DIGEST, 3rd ed., vol. II, p. 1928; and SHIPPING AND MERCANTILE GAZETTE, July 7, 1874                                                                                                                                                    | 104, 111, 112, 114      |
| Tancred's Settlement, Re , [1903] 1 Ch. 715; 72 L.J.Ch. 324; 88 L.T. 164; 40 Digest 561, 1005                                                                                                                                                                                  | 479, 483                |
| Tatam v. Reeve, [1893] 1 Q.B. 44; 67 L.T. 683; 57 J.P. 118; sub nom. , Tatham v. Reeve , 62 L.J.Q.B. 30; 25 Digest 41, 146                                                                                                                                              | 125, 133                |
| Tate, Re , [1914] 2 Ch. 182; 83 L.J.Ch. 593; 109 L.T. 621; 44 Digest 1215, 10505                                                                                                                                                                                               | 120, 121, 122           |
| Terroni & Necchi v. Corsini, [1931] 1 Ch. 515; 100 L.J.Ch. 289; 145 L.T. 95; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                             | 60, 63, 530, 533        |
| Thain, Re , [1926] Ch. 676; 95 L.J.Ch. 292; 135 L.T. 99; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 1057, 1058, 1060        |
| Thames & Mersey Marine Insurance Co. v. Hamilton, Fraser & Co., (1887), 12 App. Cas. 484; 56 L.J.Q.B. 626; 57 L.T. 695; revers , S.C. sub nom. , Hamilton v. Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Co. , (1886), 17 Q.B.D. 195; 55 L.J.Q.B. 390; 17 Digest 257, 697 | 769, 771, 773           |
| Thatcher's Trusts, Re , (1859), 26 Beav. 365; 37 Digest 103, 385                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 789, 790, 792, 794      |
| Thomas v. Hamilton (Duchess Dowager), (1886), 17 Q.B.D. 592; 55 L.J.Q.B. 555; 55 L.T. 385; Digest, Practice, 371, 816                                                                                                                                                                 | 559, 563, 572, 576      |
| Thompson, Re , [1936] 2 All E.R. 141; [1936] Ch. 676; 105 L.J.Ch. 289; 155 L.T. 474; Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                                              | 802, 803                |
| Thompson v. Rolls, [1926] 2 K.B. 426; 135 L.T. 446; 31 Digest 580, 7291                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 872, 873                |
| Thomson, In the Goods of , (1846), 4 Notes of Cases, 643; 44 Digest 264, 926                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 1009, 1012              |
| Thomson v. Clanmorris (Lord), [1900] 1 Ch. 718; 69 L.J.Ch. 337; 82 L.T. 277; 9 Digest 132, 703                                                                                                                                                                                        | 291, 292                |
| Thomson v. Knights, [1947] 1 All E.R. 112; [1947] K.B. 336; [1947] L.J.R. 445; 176 L.T. 367; 111 J.P. 43; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                                                                            | 1095, 1096              |
| Thorman v. Dowgate S.S. Co., Ltd., [1910] 1 K.B. 410; 79 L.J.K.B. 287; 102 L.T. 242; 41 Digest 307, 1685                                                                                                                                                                              | 769, 771, 772           |

- Thorne v. Smith, [1947] 1 All E.R. 39; [1947] K.B. 307; [1947] L.J.R. 596; 2nd Digest Supp. 708, 710, 715
 Thynne v. Salmon, [1948] 1 All E.R. 49; [1948] 1 K.B. 482; [1948] L.J.R. 506; 2nd Digest Supp. 139, 140, 141
 Tickle v. Tickle, (1945), 114 L.J.P. 29; 2nd Digest Supp. 812, 813, 815, 817
 Tillmanns & Co. v. S.S. Knutsford, Ltd., [1908] 2 K.B. 385; 77 L.J.K.B. 778; 99 L.T. 399; on appeal, sub nom., S.S. Knutsford, Ltd. v. Tillmanns & Co., [1908] A.C. 406; 77 L.J.K.B. 877; 99 L.T. 399; 41 Digest 522, 3504 769, 771, 772
 Tolhurst v. Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers (1900), Ltd., Tolhurst v. Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers (1900) & Imperial Portland Cement Co., [1903] A.C. 414; 72 L.J.K.B. 834; 89 L.T. 196; 12 Digest 588, 4907 1073, 1075
 Tomlinson v. Land and Finance Corp., (1884), 14 Q.B.D. 539; 53 L.J.Q.B. 561; 29 Digest 482, 316 65, 66
 Toogood v. Spryng, (1834), 1 Cr. M. & R. 181; 4 Tyr. 582; 3 L.J.Ex. 347; 32 Digest 117, 1439 450, 470
 Townley v. Watson, (1844), 3 Curt. 761; 3 Notes of Cases, 17; 2 L.T.O.S. 376; 44 Digest 306, 1374 68, 69
 Trickey v. Larne, (1840), 6 M. & W. 278; 9 L.J.Ex. 141; 151 E.R. 414; 6 Digest 151, 990 929, 932
 Trollope (George) & Sons v. Martyn Bros., [1934] 2 K.B. 436; 103 L.J.K.B. 634; 152 L.T. 88; Digest Supp. 662, 663, 857, 858
 Tuckerman v. Jefferies, (1706), 11 Mod. Rep. 108; sub nom., Turkerman v. Jeffries, Holt K.B. 370; 44 Digest 974, 8290 120, 122, 123
 Turner v. Baker, [1949] 1 All E.R. 560; [1949] 1 K.B. 605 166, 170, 297, 298, 299
 Tyne Improvement Comrs. v. Armement Anversoire Societe Anonyme, The Brabo, [1949] 1 All E.R. 294; [1949] A.C. 326; [1949] L.J.R. 435 559, 565, 566, 567, 571, 573
 U. (falsely called J.) v. J., (1867), L.R. 1 P. & D. 460; 37 L.J.P. & M. 7; 27 Digest 271, 2398 619, 621, 622
 Udney v. Udney, (1869), L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. 441; 11 Digest 309, 19 199, 200
 United Australia, Ltd. v. Barclays Bank, Ltd., [1940] 4 All E.R. 20; [1941] A.C. 1; 109 L.J.K.B. 919; 164 L.T. 139; 2nd Digest Supp. 139 142
 Universal Aircraft, Ltd. v. Hickey, (1943) (unreported), see ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1948, p. 1530 65, 66
 Usmar v. Usmar, [1949] P. 1; [1948] L.J.R. 1418; 2nd Digest Supp. 618
 Van Grutten v. Foxwell, Foxwell v. Van Grutten, [1897] A.C. 658; 66 L.J.Q.B. 745; 77 L.T. 170; 33 Digest 161, 447 45, 49
 Vaughan v. Campbell, Heatley & Co., (1885), 2 T.L.R. 33; 41 Digest 448, 2805 985, 988
 Vickery v. Martin, [1944] 2 All E.R. 167; [1944] K.B. 679; 113 L.J.K.B. 552; 171 L.T. 89; 2nd Digest Supp. 836, 854
 Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd., [1949] 1 All E.R. 997; [1949] 2 K.B. 528 1035, 1048, 1049
 Vsesojuznoje Objediheni Sovfracht v. Temple S.S. Co., Ltd., (1945), 173 L.T. 373; 79 I.L.L. Rep. 1; 2nd Digest Supp. 202, 206
 Wade v. Beadle, [1948] W.N. 337; 112 J.P. 364; 2nd Digest Supp. 1100, 1101, 1102
 Wakefield, Re, [1943] 2 All E.R. 29; 2nd Digest Supp. 502, 509
 Wales v. Tilley, [1942] 2 All E.R. 22; [1942] 2 K.L. 169; 111 L.J.K.B. 558; 167 L.T. 54; sub nom., Tilley v. Wales, [1943] 1 All E.R. 280; [1943] A.C. 386; 112 L.J.K.B. 186; 169 L.T. 49; sub nom., Wales v. Tilley, 25 Tax Cas. 136; 2nd Digest Supp. 908, 909
 Walker v. Walker, (1796), cited 3 Hag. Ecc. 59 607, 608
 Wallis, Son and Wells v. Pratt and Haynes, [1911] A.C. 394; 80 L.J.K.B. 1058; 105 L.T. 146; 39 Digest 477, 996 693, 694, 789, 776
 Ward v. Baugh, (1799), 4 Ves. 623; 20 Digest 439, 1657 655, 657
 Warren, Re, [1932] 1 Ch. 42; 101 L.J.Ch. 85; 144 L.T. 224; Digest Supp. 643, 648
 Warwick v. Naim, (1855), 10 Exch. 762; 156 E.R. 648; 6 Digest 164, 1048 920, 931
 Watcham v. A.-G. of East Africa Protectorate, [1919] A.C. 533; 87 L.J.P.C. 150; 120 L.T. 258; 17 Digest 51, 557 539, 543
 Watkins v. Naval Colliery Co., (1897), Ltd., [1912] A.C. 693; 81 L.J.K.B. 1056; 107 L.T. 321; 34 Digest 741, 1173 172, 177, 178
 Watson v. Cave (No. 2), (1881), 17 Ch.D. 23; 50 L.J.Ch. 561; 44 L.T. 117; Digest, Practice, 796, 3339 342, 343
 Watson v. Saunders-Roe, Ltd., [1947] K.B. 437; [1947] L.J.R. 563; 176 L.T. 521; 2nd Digest Supp. 577, 580, 628, 629
 Weigall v. Westminster Hospital, [1936] 1 All E.R. 232; 2nd Digest Supp. 182, 187, 633, 638
 Weighman v. Weighman, [1947] 2 All E.R. 852; 2nd Digest Supp. 877
 Wessel v. Carter Paterson and Pickfords Carriers, Ltd., [1947] 2 All E.R. 280; [1947] L.J.R. 1370; 111 J.P. 474; sub nom., Carter Paterson and Pickfords Carriers, Ltd. v. Wessel, [1947] K.B. 849; 177 L.T. 448; 2nd Digest Supp. 933, 936
 West v. Lawday, (1865), 11 H.L. Cas. 375; 13 L.T. 171; 44 Digest 906, 7665 349, 351
 West Derby Union v. Metropolitan Life Assurance Society, [1897] A.C. 647; 66 L.J.Ch. 726; 77 L.T. 284; 61 J.P. 820; affg., S.C. sub nom., West Derby Union Guardians v. Metropolitan Life Assurance Society, West Derby Union Guardians v. Priestman, [1897] 1 Ch. 335; 42 Digest 650, 680 2, 16
 West (Samuel), Ltd. v. Wright's (Colchester), Ltd., (1935), 40 Com. Cas. 186; Digest Supp. 202, 205, 206
 Westminster Corp. v. Gordon Hotels, Ltd., [1906] 2 K.B. 39; 75 L.J.K.B. 439; 94 L.T. 521; 70 J.P. 253; on appeal, [1907] 1 K.B. 910; 76 L.J.K.B. 482; 96 L.T. 535; 71 J.P. 200; affd., [1908] A.C. 142; 77 L.J.K.B. 520; 98 L.T. 681; 72 J.P. 201; 38 Digest 235, 645 994, 995
 Whitting v. Rees, (1914), 84 L.J.K.B. 1122; 112 L.T. 512; 79 J.P. 209; 36 Digest 333, 726 942, 946
 Whitaker v. Derby Urban Sanitary Authority, (1885), 55 L.J.M.C. 8; 50 J.P. 357; 36 Digest 236, 755 942
 Whitechurch, Ex parte, (1881), 6 Q.B.D. 545; sub nom., Re Nottingham J.J., ex parte Whitechurch, 50 L.J.M.C. 41; sub nom., Whitechurch v. Nottingham J.J., 45 J.P. 392; 36 Digest 236, 751 942
 White, Re, [1928] P. 75; 96 L.J.P. 157; 138 L.T. 68; Digest Supp. 718, 719
 White v. White, (1802), 7 Ves. 423; 3 Digest 242, 10 143, 145, 146
 White (otherwise Bennett) v. White, [1937] 1 All E.R. 708; [1937] P. 111; 106 L.J.P. 49; 156 L.T. 422; Digest Supp. 236, 237, 239
 White (otherwise Berry) v. White, [1948] 2 All E.R. 151; [1948] P. 330; [1948] L.J.R. 1476; 2nd Digest Supp. 677, 678, 680
 Whitmore v. Humphries, (1871), L.R. 7 C.P. 1; 41 L.J.C.P. 43; 25 L.T. 496; 35 J.P. 807; 11 Digest 56, 849 554
 Wilde v. Gibson, (1848), 1 H.L. Cas. 605; 40 Digest 350, 2926 693, 695
 Wilhelmine, The, (1842), 1 Notes of Cases, 376; 7 L.T. 441; 41 Digest 827, 6859 104, 109
 Williams v. Williams, [1929] P. 114; 98 L.J.P. 40; 140 L.T. 383; Digest Supp. 27, 29
 Willis, Re, [1911] 2 Ch. 563; 81 L.J.Ch. 8; 105 L.T. 295; 43 Digest 936, 3747 625, 626

|                                                                                                                                                                                                              | PAGE                               |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------|
| Wilson, Re , [1908] 1 Ch. 839; 77 L.J.Ch. 564; 98 L.T. 828; 44 Digest 212, 389                                                                                                                        |                                    |
| Wilson v. United Counties Bank, Ltd., [1920] A.C. 102; 88 L.J.K.B. 1033; 5 Digest 974, 7971                                                                                                                  | 502, 507, 512, 514, 515            |
| Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. v. English, [1937] 3 All E.R. 628; [1938] A.C. 57; 106 L.J.P.C. 117; 157 L.T. 406; Digest Supp.                                                                               | 40                                 |
| Wimbush, Re , [1940] 1 All E.R. 229; [1940] Ch. 92; 109 L.J.Ch. 71; 162 L.T. 133; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                    | 819, 822, 823                      |
| Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller, [1944] 2 All E.R. 106; [1944] K.B. 734; 114 L.J.K.B. 152; 171 L.T. 150; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                   | 502, 515                           |
| Winkfield, The, [1902] P. 42; 71 L.J.P. 21; 85 L.T. 668; 3 Digest 113, 373                                                                                                                                   | 1018, 1019, 1021, 1025, 1026, 1027 |
| Winterfield v. Bradnum, (1878), 3 Q.B.D. 324; 38 L.T. 250; 40 Digest 433, 545                                                                                                                                | 749, 757                           |
| Wolfe v. Hogan, [1949] 1 All E.R. 570; [1949] 2 K.B. 194                                                                                                                                                     | 379, 380                           |
| Wolff v. Oxholm, (1817), 6 M. & S. 92; 2 Digest 160, 303                                                                                                                                                     | 836, 844, 884, 885, 887, 888, 889  |
| Woodall v. Clifton, [1905] 2 Ch. 257; 74 L.J.Ch. 555; 93 L.T. 257; 30 Digest 473, 1357                                                                                                                       | 700, 704, 706                      |
| Woodward v. Mayor of Hastings, [1944] 2 All E.R. 565; [1945] K.B. 174; 114 L.J.K.B. 211; 172 L.T. 16; 109 J.P. 41; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                          | 613, 616                           |
| Worsley, Re , [1901] 1 Q.B. 309; 70 L.J.Q.B. 93; 84 L.T. 100; 4 Digest 32, 268                                                                                                                        | 413, 416                           |
| Wright v. Arnold, [1946] 2 All E.R. 616; [1947] K.B. 280; [1947] L.J.R. 341; 176 L.T. 45; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                   | 405, 406, 411                      |
| Wright v. Hale, (1860), 6 H. & N. 227; 30 L.J.Ex. 40; 3 L.T. 444; 42 Digest 706, 1231                                                                                                                        | 577, 579, 627, 629                 |
| Wright v. Wright, (1943), 77 C.L.R. (2) 191                                                                                                                                                                  | 166, 168                           |
| Wringe v. Cohen, [1939] 4 All E.R. 241; [1940] 1 K.B. 229; 109 L.J.K.B. 227; 161 L.T. 366; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                                                                  | 41, 42, 804, 806                   |
| Wynn v. Conway Corpn., [1914] 2 Ch. 705; 84 L.J.Ch. 203; 111 L.T. 1016; 78 J.P. 380; 31 Digest 81, 2261                                                                                                      | 738, 743                           |
|                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 437, 440                           |
| Yates v. Thomson, (1835), 3 Cl. & Fin. 544; sub nom. , Yeats v. Thomson, 1 Sh. & Macl. 795; 11 Digest 372, 522                                                                                        | 559, 576                           |
| Yelland v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd., [1941] 1 All E.R. 278; [1941] 1 K.B. 154; 110 L.J.K.B. 401; 164 L.T. 401; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                            | 172, 173, 175, 176, 178, 179, 180  |
| Yeovil Rural District Council v. South Somerset and District Electricity Co., Ltd., [1947] 1 All E.R. 669; [1948] 1 K.B. 130; [1948] L.J.R. 746; 177 L.T. 319; 111 J.P. 287; 2nd Digest Supp.                | 155, 161                           |
| Yorkshire Dale S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Minister of War Transport, [1942] 2 All E.R. 6; [1942] A.C. 691; 111 L.J.K.B. 512; 167 L.T. 349; 2nd Digest Supp.                                                           | 1034, 1035, 1048                   |
| Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co., [1944] 2 All E.R. 293; [1944] K.B. 718; 113 L.J.K.B. 513; 171 L.T. 113; affd. , [1946] 1 All E.R. 98; [1946] A.C. 163; 115 L.J.K.B. 63; 174 L.T. 39; 2nd Digest Supp. | 804, 806                           |
| Zamora (No. 2), The, [1921] 1 A.C. 801; 90 L.J.P. 259; 125 L.T. 204; 37 Digest 640, 926                                                                                                                      | 363, 365                           |

STATUTES, ETC., REFERRED TO

| PUBLIC GENERAL STATUTES                                                                            | PAGE          |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------|
| Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946 (c. 49), s. 2 (2), (3) .. .. .             | 1062          |
| Administration of Estates Act, 1925 (c. 23), s. 51 (2) .. .. .                                     | 643           |
| Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923 (c. 9), s. 12, (6) .. .. .                                         | 344           |
| Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 2 (1) (2) .. .. .                                      | 276           |
| Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59)—                                                                      |               |
| s. 1 (1) (a), (2) (c) .. .. .                                                                      | 405           |
| s. 3 .. .. .                                                                                       | 308           |
| s. 4 (1) .. .. .                                                                                   | 30            |
| (b) .. .. .                                                                                        | 442           |
| (c) .. .. .                                                                                        | 405           |
| s. 33 (1) .. .. .                                                                                  | 30            |
| (a) .. .. .                                                                                        | 442           |
| s. 38 (a) .. .. .                                                                                  | 39            |
| s. 42 (1) .. .. .                                                                                  | 303           |
| ss. 54 (1) (7), 109 (4) .. .. .                                                                    | 1085          |
| Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934 (c. 58), s. 3 (2) .. .. .                                          | 290           |
| Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945 (c. 20), ss. 7 (1), 7 (5) .. .. .                         | 300           |
| Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 (c. 22), sched. , art. IV, r. 6 .. .. .    | 768           |
| Children and Young Persons Act, 1933 (c. 12), s. 38 (1) .. .. .                                    | 335           |
| Civil Aviation Act, 1946 (c. 70), s. 23 (1) (2) .. .. .                                            | 933           |
| Companies Act, 1948 (c. 38), s. 227 .. .. .                                                        | 21            |
| Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939 (c. 75), s. 3 (2) .. .. .                                         | 280           |
| County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), s. 105 .. .. .                                                    | 853, 788      |
| Criminal Justice Act, 1925 (c. 86)—                                                                |               |
| s. 20 .. .. .                                                                                      | 264           |
| ss. 21 (1), 22 (1), 23 (1) .. .. .                                                                 | 37            |
| Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58)—                                                                |               |
| s. 21 (1) .. .. .                                                                                  | 1104          |
| s. 29 (3) (a) .. .. .                                                                              | 916           |
| Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (c. 69), s. 13 (1) .. .. .                                        | 93            |
| Crown Proceedings Act, 1947 (c. 44), s. 21 (1) (a) .. .. .                                         | 591           |
| Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 151 (1) .. .. .                                                    | 716           |
| Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (c. 22), s. 149 (1) (c) (iii) .. .. .                               | 937           |
| Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30)—                                                                         |               |
| s. 1 .. .. .                                                                                       | 664           |
| s. 2 (1) (b) .. .. .                                                                               | 664           |
| (c) .. .. .                                                                                        | 191           |
| s. 3 (1) .. .. .                                                                                   | 191           |
| Finance Act, 1921 (c. 32), s. 32 (1) .. .. .                                                       | 982           |
| Finance Act, 1934 (c. 32), s. 21 (1) (a) .. .. .                                                   | 384           |
| Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109)—                                                                |               |
| s. 14 (1) .. .. .                                                                                  | 969           |
| ss. 15 (2), 18 (1) .. .. .                                                                         | 1             |
| Finance Act, 1940 (c. 29)—                                                                         |               |
| s. 15 (1) .. .. .                                                                                  | 384           |
| s. 43 (1) (2) .. .. .                                                                              | 79, 951       |
| s. 44 (1) .. .. .                                                                                  | 191           |
| s. 56 (1) (2) .. .. .                                                                              | 79, 951       |
| Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56)—                                                                  |               |
| s. 3 (1) .. .. .                                                                                   | 234, 1095     |
| s. 81 (1) .. .. .                                                                                  | 1099          |
| s. 33 (3) .. .. .                                                                                  | 234           |
| Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (c. 25), s. 55 (2) .. .. .                                            | 993           |
| Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881 (c. 69), s. 10 .. .. .                                                | 233           |
| Gaming Act, 1835 (c. 41), s. 1 .. .. .                                                             | 1013          |
| Gaming Act, 1845 (c. 109), ss. 3, 8 .. .. .                                                        | 257           |
| Gaming Act, 1892 (c. 9), s. 1 .. .. .                                                              | 124           |
| Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925 (c. 45), s. 1 .. .. .                                            | 1057          |
| Highway Act, 1835 (c. 50)—                                                                         |               |
| s. 72 .. .. .                                                                                      | 1016          |
| s. 78 .. .. .                                                                                      | 100           |
| Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40)—                                                                      |               |
| sched. D, Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, r. 3 (a) .. .. .                       | 969           |
| sched. E, r. 1 .. .. .                                                               | 908, 912      |
| All Schedules Rules, r. 22 (1) (a) .. .. .                                                  | 384           |
| Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17)—                           |               |
| s. 2 (3) .. .. .                                                                                   | 1018          |
| s. 12 (1) (g) .. .. .                                                                              | 71, 139       |
| s. 12 (7) .. .. .                                                                                  | 577           |
| s. 15 (3) .. .. .                                                                                  | 577, 627      |
| Indictments Act, 1915 (c. 90), s. 3 (2), sched. I, appendix , form 12 .. .. . | 830           |
| Interpretation Act, 1889 (c. 63), s. 37 .. .. .                                                    | 163           |
| Juries Act, 1870 (c. 77), s. 10 .. .. .                                                            | 806           |
| Juries Act, 1922 (c. 11), s. 2 (1) .. .. .                                                         | 806           |
| Land Drainage Act, 1930 (c. 44), s. 9 (i) .. .. .                                                  | 996           |
| Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 18 (1) .. .. .                                           | 323, 530, 720 |
| Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40) —                                             |               |
| s. 1 (1) .. .. .                                                                                   | 946           |
| s. 9 .. .. .                                                                                       | 165           |
| s. 10 .. .. .                                                                                      | 165, 296      |
| Larceny Act, 1916 (c. 50), s. 32 (1) .. .. .                                                       | 830           |
| Law of Property Act, 1922 (c. 16), s. 145, sched. XV, para. 5 .. .. .                | 436           |
| Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 146 (2) .. .. .                                              | 362, 798      |
| Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935 (c. 30), s. 1 .. .. .                         | 812           |
| Legitimacy Act, 1926 (c. 60), s. 1 (2) .. .. .                                                     | 497           |
| Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1941 (c. 24), s. 3 (1) (2) .. .. .                          | 266           |
| Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1944 (c. 40), s. 2 (2) .. .. .                              | 266           |
| Licensing Act, 1921, s. 4 (b) .. .. .                                                              | 966           |
| Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 17 .. .. .                                                        | 266           |

|                                                                                                                                                                                       | PAGE      |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------|
| Local Government Act, 1929 (c. 17), s. 67 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                                 | 288, 939  |
| Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937 (c. 68), s. 35 .. .. .                                                                                                                      | 796       |
| Lunacy Act, 1890 (c. 5) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                       | 35        |
| s. 148 (3) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                    | 479       |
| Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1949 (c. 99), s. 2 (2) .. .. .                                                                                                                       | 1082      |
| Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 3 (a) .. .. .                                                                                                                                | 35        |
| Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923 (c. 20), ss. 8 (1), 9 (2), 11 .. .. .                                                                                                | 518       |
| Motor Spirit (Regulation) Act, 1948 (c. 34), s. 2 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                         | 319       |
| National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81)—                                                                                                                                            |           |
| s. 6 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                          | 1097      |
| (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                           | 1050      |
| s. 7 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                          | 1097      |
| (4) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                           | 1050      |
| s. 36 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                     | 875, 904  |
| National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946 (c. 62), s. 89 (1) (a) .. .. .                                                                                                     | 149, 867  |
| Patents, Designs, Copyright and Trade Marks (Emergency) Act, 1939 (c. 107), s. 2 (1) (5) .. .. .                                                                                      | 44        |
| Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906 (c. 34), ss. 1, 2 .. .. .                                                                                                                          | 916       |
| Public Health Act, 1936 (c. 49)—                                                                                                                                                      |           |
| ss. 93, 94 (1) (2), 95 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                    | 942       |
| s. 126 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                    | 370       |
| s. 269 (1), (2) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                               | 76        |
| Public Order Act, 1936 (c. 6), s. 3 (4) .. .. .                                                                                                                                       | 1091      |
| Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (c. 20), ss. 47, 75 .. .. .                                                                                                                   | 246       |
| Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928 (c. 44)—                                                                                                                               |           |
| s. 2 (2) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                      | 288, 939  |
| s. 3 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                      | 937       |
| Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32)—                                                                                                                |           |
| s. 3 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                      | 73        |
| (a) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                           | 941       |
| (b) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                           | 872       |
| s. 16 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                     | 834, 884  |
| sched. I, para. (b) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                    | 941       |
| para. (d) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                              | 834       |
| para. (h) (as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1) and sched. I ) .. .. .                                                         | 586       |
| Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71)—                                                                                                                            |           |
| s. 3 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                      | 884       |
| (2) (b) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                       | 834       |
| (3) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                           | 884       |
| Requisitioned Land and War Works Act, 1948 (c. 17), s. 11 (2) .. .. .                                                                                                                 | 280       |
| Rights of Way Act, 1932 (c. 45), s. 1 (1), (2) .. .. .                                                                                                                                | 116       |
| Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43)—                                                                                                                                                       |           |
| s. 2 (1) (b) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                  | 261       |
| s. 35 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                     | 294, 488  |
| Solicitors Act, 1932 (c. 37), s. 47 (1) (as amended by Solicitors Act, 1941 (c. 46), s. 23 (1)) .. .. .                                                                               | 320       |
| Sunday Observance Act, 1780 (c. 49), ss. 1, 2 .. .. .                                                                                                                                 | 638       |
| Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49)—                                                                                                                        |           |
| ss. 160 (1), 162 (1) (as amended by the Administration of Justice Act, 1928 (c. 26), s. 9) .. .. .                                                                                    | 718       |
| s. 176 (d) (as amended by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 2) .. .. .                                                                                                     | 35        |
| s. 173 (2) (iii) (as substituted by Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 4) .. .. .                                                                                               | 999       |
| s. 190 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                    | 618       |
| (2) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                           | 654       |
| Tithe Act, 1936 (c. 43), s. 7 (1), sched. I, pt. I, para. 5 .. .. .                                                                                                            | 349       |
| Town and Country Planning Act, 1944 (c. 47), s. 1 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                         | 163       |
| Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51)—                                                                                                                                          |           |
| s. 37 (2) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                     | 1062      |
| ss. 49 (1), 118 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                           | 898       |
| sched. X, para. 16 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                     | 163       |
| Vagrancy Act, 1824 (c. 83), s. 4 (as amended by Penal Servitude Act, 1891 (c. 69), s. 7) .. .. .                                                                                      | 546, 1006 |
| War Damage Act, 1943 (c. 21)—                                                                                                                                                         |           |
| s. 12 (3) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                     | 613       |
| s. 123 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                        | 59        |
| Water Act, 1945 (c. 42), sched. III , s. 30 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                        | 990       |
| Wills Act, 1837 (c. 26)—                                                                                                                                                              |           |
| s. 9 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                          | 1009      |
| s. 21 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                         | 68        |
| Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (c. 84), s. 43 (1), (2) .. .. .                                                                                                                      | 867       |
| LOCAL STATUTE                                                                                                                                                                         |           |
| London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1947 (c. xlv), s. 16 .. .. .                                                                                                              | 1069      |
| RULES.                                                                                                                                                                                |           |
| Bankruptcy Rules, 1915 (S.R. & O., 1914, No. 1824), rr. 130, 134 .. .. .                                                                                                              | 659       |
| County Courts Rules, 1936, Ord. 37, r. 1 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                           | 353       |
| Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947—                                                                                                                                                       |           |
| rr. 8 (1) (2) (3), 10 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                         | 877       |
| r. 40 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                         | 826       |
| r. 74 (2) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                     | 27        |
| Mental Treatment Rules, 1930 (S.R. & O., 1930, No. 1083), r. 126 (1), (3) (as amended by the Mental Treatment (Emergency Provisions) Rules, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 1095)) .. .. . | 35        |
| R.S.C.—                                                                                                                                                                               |           |
| Ord. 11, r. 1 (e) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                      | 355, 558  |
| r. 4 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                                          | 558       |
| Ord. 14, r. 1 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                          | 929       |
| Ord. 16, r. 28 (1) and r. 31B (1) (2) .. .. .                                                                                                                                  | 785       |
| Ord. 25, r. 4 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                          | 124       |
| Ord. 55, r. 5A .. .. .                                                                                                                                                         | 1013      |
| Ord. 67, rr. 10, 16 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                                                | 241       |
| Ord. 68, r. 15 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                         | 659       |
| Ord. 64, r. 11 .. .. .                                                                                                                                                         | 594       |

REGULATIONS.

|                                                                                                                                                           |     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Defence (Evacuated Areas) Regulations, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 1209) (as amended by S.R. & O., 1945, No. 1453), reg. 4 (1), reg. 4A (1) .. .. . | 266 |
| Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 950), reg. 2 (1) .. .. .                                                                 | 728 |
| General Regulations, 1913 (S.R. & O., 1913, No. 748), reg. 1 , made under Coal Mines Act, 1911 (c. 60), s. 86 (1) .. .. .                          | 171 |
| Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Regulations, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 1096), regs. 4, 5, 8 (1) .. .. .                                              | 946 |
| Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations, 1941 (S.R. & O., 1941, No. 398), reg. 71 .. .. .                                                | 392 |
| National Health Service (Medical Practices Compensation) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1506)—                                                         |     |
| reg. 2 (1) .. .. .                                                                                                                                 | 875 |
| reg. 7 (2) .. .. .                                                                                                                                 | 875 |
| (a) .. .. .                                                                                                                                               | 904 |
| Regulations dated Nov. 10, 1921 (S.R. & O., 1921, No. 1699), reg. 5 .. .. .                                                                        | 982 |

ORDERS.

|                                                                                               |     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 6), cl. 2 (e) .. .. .              | 171 |
| Restriction of Repairs of Ships Order, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 142), art. 1 .. .. . | 538 |

MISCELLANEOUS.

|                                                                                                                 |     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Financial Agreement, Apr. 17, 1947 (Treaty Series, No. 31 (1947), Annex to No. 6), arts. 1, 2, 5 .. .. . | 430 |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|

WORDS AND PHRASES

|                                                                                                                   |           |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------|
| Accommodation for the use of relatives who come from a distance of patients who are critically ill .. .. . | 882       |
| Acids, explosives, arms, ammunition, or other dangerous cargo .. .. .                                      | 768       |
| Actual knowledge .. .. .                                                                                   | 682       |
| All my belongings .. .. .                                                                                  | 338       |
| Anything done .. .. .                                                                                      | 296       |
| Apparent .. .. .                                                                                           | 68        |
| Arrived .. .. .                                                                                            | 516, 1105 |
| At par value .. .. .                                                                                       | 501       |
| Attainted of felony .. .. .                                                                                | 806       |
| Authority concerned .. .. .                                                                                | 796       |
| Beneficial interest in estate .. .. .                                                                      | 643       |
| By contract or otherwise .. .. .                                                                           | 951       |
| Calculated by reference to the last two accounting years immediately preceding the appointed day .. .. .   | 904       |
| Care and treatment .. .. .                                                                                 | 35        |
| Carrying on business .. .. .                                                                               | 405       |
| Conduct which is a nuisance or annoyance to adjoining occupiers .. .. .                                    | 941       |
| Debt .. .. .                                                                                               | 30, 442   |
| Debtor .. .. .                                                                                             | 405       |
| Development .. .. .                                                                                        | 898       |
| Difference . . . with regard to the deduction .. .. .                                                      | 384       |
| Dwelling-house .. .. .                                                                                     | 884       |
| Equally between the children of my deceased sister T. and the said F.H. .. .. .                            | 816       |
| Expectation of . . . gain or reward .. .. .                                                                | 320       |
| Fair and reasonable between a willing grantor and a willing grantee .. .. .                                | 518       |
| Final and conclusive .. .. .                                                                               | 993       |
| For any loss or damage through disturbance .. .. .                                                         | 344       |
| Free pardon .. .. .                                                                                        | 806       |
| Good and safe port .. .. .                                                                                 | 201       |
| Held by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital .. .. .                                          | 1050      |
| In trust for such persons or person not being her husband .. .. .                                          | 491       |
| Incident .. .. .                                                                                           | 613       |
| Including the present covenant for renewal .. .. .                                                         | 436       |
| Issue .. .. .                                                                                              | 789       |
| Land .. .. .                                                                                               | 349       |
| Last two accounting years immediately preceding the appointed day .. .. .                                  | 875       |
| Lawfully sub-let .. .. .                                                                                   | 627       |
| Member of tenant's family .. .. .                                                                          | 71        |
| Minor adjustments .. .. .                                                                                  | 716       |
| Non-corporation .. .. .                                                                                    | 933       |
| Not of the nature or not of the substance or not of the quality demanded .. .. .                           | 1095      |
| Nursery grounds .. .. .                                                                                    | 288       |
| Ordinary annual contribution .. .. .                                                                       | 982       |
| Organising .. .. .                                                                                         | 1091      |
| Owners may terminate hiring .. .. .                                                                        | 780       |
| Passive acquiescence .. .. .                                                                               | 607       |
| Pay the income arising to my children in equal shares and after the death of all my children .. .. .       | 120       |
| Person who had interest .. .. .                                                                            | 79        |
| Place .. .. .                                                                                              | 516, 1105 |
| Premises .. .. .                                                                                           | 990       |
| Premises as a private dwelling-house only .. .. .                                                          | 884       |
| Property in which the interest subsisted .. .. .                                                           | 951       |
| Proposer or his paid driver .. .. .                                                                        | 294       |
| Proprietary interest .. .. .                                                                               | 59        |
| Purchaser .. .. .                                                                                          | 662       |
| Ready, able and willing to purchase .. .. .                                                                | 919       |
| Ready to load .. .. .                                                                                      | 985       |
| Return home to the petitioner and render to her conjugal rights .. .. .                                    | 832       |
| Running repairs .. .. .                                                                                    | 716       |
| Separate dwelling .. .. .                                                                                  | 834       |
| Shares of public company .. .. .                                                                           | 624       |
| Short tenancy .. .. .                                                                                      | 59        |

|                                                                                                                          | PAGE      |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------|
| Special circumstances .. .. .                                                                                     | 785       |
| Statutory hypothesis .. .. .                                                                                      | 951       |
| Subject to contract .. .. .                                                                                       | 856       |
| Subject to formal contract .. .. .                                                                                | 864       |
| Subject to satisfactory survey .. .. .                                                                            | 856       |
| Subject to survey .. .. .                                                                                         | 91        |
| Subscribed their names as witnesses .. .. .                                                                       | 1009      |
| To pay the income of the residuary trust fund up to the sum of £1,000 per annum to L. for her life .. .. .        | 726       |
| To proceed to one or two safe ports East Canada or Newfoundland, place or places as ordered by charterers .. .. . | 516, 1105 |
| Unjust or oppressive or too severe a punishment to return the fugitive .. .. .                                    | 283       |
| Unlawful sub-letting .. .. .                                                                                      | 627       |
| Until vivisection shall be made a punishable offence .. .. .                                                      | 689       |
| Unusual danger .. .. .                                                                                            | 180       |
| Wilful obstruction .. .. .                                                                                        | 1016      |
| Willing and able to purchase .. .. .                                                                              | 91, 856   |

CORRIGENDA

- [1948] Vol. 2.
P. 914. DENNIS REED, LTD. v. NICHOLLS. Line F.1: for "introduction to the purchaser" read "introduction to the vendor."
P. 1065. HUNT v. MORGAN. Case Referred to: for "[1942]" read "[1947]."
[1949] Vol. 1.
P. 975. MALLETT v. DUNN. Line E.6: for "a tort done by his wife" read "a tort done to his wife."
[1949] Vol. 2.
P. 871. WELCH v. NAGY. Lines C.1 and 2: for "the present landlord" read "the present tenant."
[1950] Vol. 1.
P. 71. JONES v. WHITEHILL. Counsel: read "Blennerhassett for the landlord. C. G. Heron for the niece of the deceased tenant's wife" instead of as printed. P. 72. Solicitors: read "Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for Bailey, Cox, Bosworth & Co., Birmingham (for the landlord); Underwood & Co., agents for J. Foley Egginton & Co., Sutton Coldfield (for the niece)" instead of as printed.
P. 264. R. v. SOMERSET, JJ. Lines A.3, E.6, H.1: for "Town and Country Planning Act, 1944," read "Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 23."
P. 428. HARRIES v. ASHFORD. Counsel: for "H. W. Springer" read "T. Springer."
P. 922. DENNIS REED, LTD. v. GOODY. Line C.2: for "plaintiffs" read "defendants."
P. 1099. Re MORGAN'S WILL TRUSTS. Solicitors: after "Ravenscroft, Woodward & Co." read "agents for Woolcombe & Yonge, Plymouth." After "Gibson & Weldon" read "agents for Edwin Broad & Spencer, Devonport."

THE ALL ENGLAND LAW REPORTS

INCORPORATING THE
LAW TIMES REPORTS
AND THE
LAW JOURNAL REPORTS

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. JOHN DOW STUART, LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Normand, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord MacDermott and Lord Reid), October 18, 19, December 14, 1949.]

Income Tax—Deduction—Excess profits tax—Adjustment of excess profits tax over five years—Right of taxpayer to deduct excess profits tax payable in each year and not merely the adjusted figure—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109), s. 15 (2), s. 18 (1).

The Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, by which excess profits tax was imposed, provides by s. 15 : “(2) Where a deficiency of profits occurs in any chargeable accounting period in any trade or business, the profits chargeable with excess profits tax arising from the trade or business shall be deemed to be reduced, and relief shall be granted in accordance with the following provisions :—(a) the aggregate amount of the profits so chargeable for the previous chargeable accounting periods shall be deemed to be reduced by the amount of the deficiency, and the amount of excess profits tax payable in respect thereof shall be deemed to be reduced accordingly, and the relief necessary to give effect to the reduction shall be given by repayment or otherwise ; (b) where the amount of the deficiency exceeds the aggregate amount of the profits so chargeable for the previous chargeable accounting periods, the balance of the deficiency shall be applied in reducing any profits so chargeable for the next subsequent chargeable accounting period, and, if and so far as it exceeds the amount of those profits, any profits so chargeable for the next subsequent chargeable accounting period, and so on.” By s. 18 : “(1) The amount of the excess profits tax payable in respect of a trade or business for any chargeable accounting period shall, in computing for the purposes of income tax the profits and gains arising from that trade or business, be allowed to be deducted as an expense incurred in that period : Provided that where, under the provisions of this Act relating to deficiencies of profits, relief is given by way of repayment from excess profits tax chargeable for any chargeable accounting period previous to that in which the deficiency occurs, the amount of the deduction allowed under this section shall not be altered but the amount repayable shall be taken into account in computing the profits and gains of the trade or business for the purposes of income tax as if it were a profit of the trade or business accruing in the chargeable accounting period in which the deficiency occurs.”

The amounts of the profits of a company chargeable to income tax before making adjustments in respect of excess profits tax payable and repayable were : in 1940, a profit of £4,838 ; in 1941, profit and interest £2,477 ; in 1942, a profit of £5,783 ; in 1943, a loss of £7,645 ; and in 1944, a profit of £550. There were deficiencies of profits in 1943 and 1944. In 1943 the company made a payment of £1,000 on account of excess profits tax, and, as its total net liability over the whole period for which the tax was imposed was found to be £517, in 1946 £483 was repaid. In arriving at the adjustments to be made in respect of excess profits tax for the purposes of income tax, the company claimed to deduct as an expense incurred in each year the amount of excess profits tax finally agreed to be payable in respect of that year, notwithstanding that the aggregate amount of profits were deemed to be reduced by subsequent deficiencies under s. 15 (2). The Revenue contended that the effect of s. 15 (2) was to cause deficiencies to be deemed to be set off year by year against the excess profits which would otherwise be chargeable to tax, and that, when the aggregate amount of the profits chargeable for the previous accounting periods had been so deemed to be reduced under s. 15 (2), the amounts of excess profits tax agreed in respect of those periods were not "payable" within s. 18 (1) and so not deductible as expenses. A

HELD (LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON dissenting) : there was no indication in s. 15 (2) that the computation of excess profits for any chargeable accounting period before that in which the deficiency occurred was to be re-opened, and the reduction which, under that sub-section, was to be deemed to be made was to be against "the aggregate amount of the profits . . . for the previous chargeable accounting periods." In the first part of s. 18 (1), on the other hand, each chargeable accounting period was treated as a separate entity, and the actual figures were under consideration and not those deemed to exist for the purpose of deficiency deductions. This view was supported by the proviso to s. 18 (1), the effect of which was that, though the amount of a subsequent deficiency might reduce the previous excess profits, the reduction was to affect the total sum of those profits, and was not to be regarded as altering the actual periodic profits of any previous chargeable accounting period, and, therefore (LORD MACDERMOTT dissenting as to the years 1943 and 1944) the company's method of arriving at the adjustments to be made was the right one. B
C
D

[FOR THE FINANCE (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 15 (2) and s. 18 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 32, pp. 1199, 1203, 1204.]

Case referred to :

- (1) West Derby Union v. Metropolitan Life Assurance Society, [1897] A.C. 647 ; 66 L.J.Ch. 726 ; 77 L.T. 284 ; 61 J.P. 820 ; affg., S.C. sub nom., West Derby Union Guardians v. Metropolitan Life Assurance Society, West Derby Union Guardians v. Priestman, [1897] 1 Ch. 335 ; 42 Digest 659, 680. E

APPEAL by the Crown against an interlocutor pronounced by the First Division of the Court of Session as the Court of Exchequer in Scotland on a Case Stated under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149. F

The respondents, a limited company, were assessed to income tax under sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the years 1941 to 1946 in certain sums, and they appealed against those assessments to the General Commissioners of Income Tax for the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire. They contended that they were entitled, on the true construction of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 18 (1), to deduct as an expense for income tax purposes the amount of the excess profits tax agreed to be payable in respect of the relevant chargeable accounting period, notwithstanding the fact that, by reason of subsequent deficiencies of profits, that amount was, by virtue of s. 15 (2) of that Act, deemed to be reduced. The General Commissioners accepted the submission of the company, and the First Division affirmed their decision. The House of Lords, by a majority, now dismissed the Crown's appeal. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON. G
H

The Solicitor-General (Sir Frank Soskice, K.C.), the Solicitor-General for Scotland (Douglas Johnston, K.C.), H. A. Shewan, K.C. (of the Scottish Bar), and R. P. Hills for the Crown.

R. P. Morison, K.C., and J. G. Wilson (of the Scottish Bar) for the company.

The House took time for consideration.

Dec. 14. LORD PORTER : My Lords, this is an appeal from a decision of the First Division of the Court of Session upon a Case Stated under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149. It is concerned with the proper method of ascertaining what the liability to income tax is where there has been a reduction and repayment of excess profits tax. The facts are succinctly stated in the Special Case, have been set out by LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, and need not be repeated. As appears from the case, two opposing methods have been suggested for computing the profit of the respondents for income tax purposes where repayment or deduction of excess profits tax comes into question. One is that adopted by the subject and the other that adopted by the Crown. The commissioners accepted that put forward by the subject and asked whether they were right in so doing. The Court of Session upheld their view and the Crown now appeal from that decision.

In substance, the solution of this controversy depends upon the true construction of the terms of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 15 and s. 18. Excess profits tax is imposed by s. 12 of that Act; under s. 14 the profits of the standard period or of any chargeable accounting period are to be separately computed; and s. 21 makes excess profits tax payable one month after assessment; but these provisions have at best only an indirect bearing on the point at issue. Your Lordships are concerned not with profits themselves, but with the method by which relief is given to the taxpayer where profits and excess profits have been earned in one or more years and a deficiency of profit has occurred in a later year or years. Section 15 (1) merely provides the method by which the amount of a deficiency is to be ascertained. Sub-section (2) is concerned with the manner in which that deficiency is to be treated. It begins by asserting that in case of deficiency in any chargeable accounting period the profits chargeable with excess profits tax shall be deemed to be reduced. Read without any further explanatory words, I should myself understand that statement to mean that the totality of that portion of the profits which is so chargeable and has been earned before a deficiency occurs is to be diminished by the amount of the deficiency occurring in any subsequent chargeable accounting period, not that any particular accounting period was to suffer such reduction. This view is supported by the statement in para. (a) of that sub-section which provides that the aggregate of profits so chargeable for the previous accounting periods is to be deemed to be reduced, and as a consequence the amount of excess profits tax payable is to be reduced accordingly. It is the aggregate of the excess profits of previous accounting periods which is to be reduced, not those of each separate period; and this expression must, I think, mean that whereas each deficiency is to be written off against previous excess profits as it occurs, the excess profits are not to be divided into their constituent parts but treated as a lump sum regardless of when they have been obtained. Therefore, no provision is made in the sub-section for attributing the deficiency to any particular past year—the whole deficiency is to be written off against the totality of excess profits previously made. It may wipe them completely out, it may only reduce them in part. It may however happen that the deficiency exceeds the excess profits earned in former years, and this last case is dealt with in s. 15 (2) (b) which enacts that if the deficiency exceeds the aggregate amount of the profits chargeable to excess profits tax, the balance is to be applied in reduction of such profits in future years, the profits of each year in turn being reduced by the amount of the deficiency remaining unrelieved until the whole of the deficiency has been made up. It is not unnatural that, where there has first been the incidence of excess profits and then a deficiency, those profits should be added together and the deficiency treated as a reduction of the aggregated sum. But this method of procedure gives no ground for implying that the deficiency is to be written off each year's excess profits as a separate entity, starting with the first and continuing year after year until the whole has been wiped out. Where the law adopts the last-mentioned method it can say so in plain terms and does so in s. 15 (2) (b) where future years are being dealt with.

I find nothing in these provisions to say that the whole accounts are to be re-opened for the purpose of calculating to what sum profits, whether subject to excess profits tax or not, amount or what sum is deductible from the excess profits of any particular period, nor do I see any reason why the true figures should not continue to prevail. The actual profits and the actual sums chargeable with excess profits tax for each period remain constant and can be accurately set out, and those figures are unaffected by the circumstance that the aggregate sum due for excess profits tax may have to be reduced. Section 15 is not concerned with individual chargeable accounting periods where the past is concerned. It aggregates past gains until there is a deficiency, and then deducts this deficiency from the aggregate sum. When this has been done, the section provides that relief shall be given by repayment or otherwise, and this must, I think, mean that it can be given either by a cash payment or in any other way in which a debt can be discharged, e.g., by set off against a debt due to the Crown.

Section 18 deals with a different question. By reason of its terms and by them alone, excess profits due in respect of any chargeable accounting period are deductible from the total profits earned for the purpose of ascertaining the profits chargeable to income tax for that period. The first portion of that section is not to my mind confined to cases where a deduction is claimable. It is applicable to all cases and primarily to a case where there has been no deficiency. Moreover, it treats each chargeable accounting period as a separate entity, and, prima facie at any rate, has under consideration the actual figures, not those deemed to exist for the purpose of deficiency deductions. In my opinion, the proviso which follows supports this view. As I read it, though the amount of a subsequent deficiency may reduce the previous excess profits in whole or in part, the reduction is to, or is to be deemed to, affect the total sum of those profits, and is not to be regarded as altering the actual periodic profits of any previous chargeable accounting period which have already been or may thereafter be ascertained. The amount of the deduction allowed to be subtracted from profits because they were subject to payment of excess profits tax, is not to be altered, but the sum deducted is to be attributed as a profit to the chargeable accounting period in which the deficiency occurs. For myself I find it difficult to understand what "the deduction allowed under this section shall not be altered" means, or what deduction is referred to, unless it refers to the deduction given after ascertaining what the actual profits were for the relevant period and what the consequent sum originally subjected to excess profits tax amounts to. I do not know why it should be contemplated that the reduced sum on which excess profits tax is imposed should be subsequently altered, or what state of facts would make it desirable to alter it. The section is concerned with the question of excess profits tax payable over the whole period during which the Act is in force, and is not meant to alter the income tax already assessed or assessable in respect of each separate accounting period. The aggregate amount of excess profits tax alone is to be diminished. Indeed that is all with which the opening words of s. 15 (2) (a) deal. In my opinion, this construction provides a coherent and comprehensive scheme requiring as little alteration as possible in figures already ascertained, and is in accordance with the provision in s. 21 which contemplates an ascertainment of the excess profits tax due in respect of each period and its payment one month after assessment.

The Crown, however, say that such a construction gives the go by to two vital considerations, and neglects the express wording of the sections. In the first place they contend that s. 15 and s. 18 appear in the same fasciculus of the Act, and each must be read in the light of the other. Section 15 (2), they say, provides that profits shall be deemed to be reduced by the amount of the deficiency, and that result cannot be attained without also reducing to that extent the sums chargeable with excess profits tax in each chargeable accounting period, and it is this latter sum so reduced which is ultimately to be deducted from the total profits attributable to each accounting period. If, then, the sum chargeable with excess profits tax be reduced by the amount of the deficiencies, and the result is to reduce it to nothing, there is no excess profits tax payable and therefore none deductible under s. 18 (1). It is, they maintain, the ultimate sum on which excess profits tax is payable which is deductible from the profits liable to pay income tax, not the provisional sum which is arrived at by taking account of an individual year's working. I doubt if this interpretation gives enough weight to the use of the word "deemed" or to the fact that the relief granted is confined to a reduction in the aggregate amount of profits over all the years. Both seem to me to point to an inference that the deduction is to give relief in respect of overpaid or over-payable excess profits tax, and nothing more, but any doubt which might exist is, in my opinion, set at rest by the enactment in the proviso to s. 18 (1) that the amount of the deduction allowed under the section shall not be altered. The Revenue representatives meet this argument by contending that the words "the amount of excess profits tax payable" in s. 15 (2) and s. 18 (1) must be read as meaning ultimately payable, i.e., the sum payable after the appropriate deduction for deficiency has been made. Even, however, in s. 15 (2), "payable" appears to me to refer to the actual and not the reduced figure. The sum payable remains what it previously was, but it is to be deemed to be reduced for the purpose of giving relief, and for that purpose only. Nor do I see any reason for construing the wording of s. 18 (1) as meaning ultimately payable. The phraseology might indeed be capable of meaning either the excess profits tax payable on the actual figures appertaining to the particular period, or the reduced amount after deducting the permissible deficiencies. The provision that the deduction allowed is of the excess profits tax payable in respect of any chargeable accounting period might of itself tend to cause a preference for the earlier version, but, as I have already indicated, the provision against alteration of the amount of the deduction allowed is in my view decisive.

In the second place, the appellants contend that, even if the conclusion indicated is to be preferred, nevertheless the proviso to s. 18 (1) is only applicable to a case where, and to the extent to which, actual payment and repayment have been made. Had the respondents paid the excess profits tax in full on the figures agreed before any deduction for later deficiencies, then, in their submission, relief would have been claimable, the proviso would apply and the amount of the deduction already allowed could not be altered. In the present instance, however, only £1,000 has been paid, and for that sum credit has been given. Apart from the payment of the £1,000 and repayment of £483 found to have been overpaid when the final liability was ascertained, no sum was paid or repaid in respect of excess profits tax. Repayment, it is said, is used in that section in its strict sense of a cash payment; where anything other than cash payment is intended the Act is explicit in its term. "Relief" says s. 15 (2) (a) "shall be given by repayment or otherwise." The appellants, therefore, maintain that, in such a case as this, the amount of the deduction originally allowed under the section is to be altered, and the ultimate amount of excess profits tax due after the relevant deductions for deficiencies have been made is alone to be taken from the profits of the year. As in fact no excess profits tax is payable for the relevant accounting period, no sum is to be allowed to be deducted in arriving at the profits.

My Lords, whatever force the last observation may have, it is not open to this House to consider what might be an appropriate solution of such events as are now being dealt with. The question is not what might have been done, but what the Act provides. The argument, as I see it, depends on the distinction to be drawn between the words "repayment or otherwise" in s. 15 and "repayment" in s. 18. Repayment is not, nor, indeed, is payment, a term of art. It can be effected in any way which puts an end to the indebtedness between one person and another. Set off is payment as much as the tender of cash. Where the Crown is engaged in settling accounts with the subject, it is natural and desirable that a repayment in cash should be authorised if the return of money paid is contemplated, and, if this authority is given, it is again natural that the method of relief shall not be confined to a cash payment, and that the words "or otherwise" should be inserted to make this clear. But where no question of the authority of the Crown to make a cash payment is involved, the generic term repayment may well be used to cover any kind of repayment such as a set off of indebtedness on the part of the subject. The omission of the words "or otherwise" in s. 18 seems to me altogether inadequate as a foundation for the argument presented, and it would be an odd result if, as was conceded by the Crown's advisers, the appellants' calculations should be right if they had paid or tendered each sum due for excess profits tax, or, indeed, paid the whole sum due and then received back the overplus, whereas, if they waited until accounts could be conveniently settled, their indebtedness should be calculated on a totally different basis. It is, as the Lord President (COOPER) points out (1948, Sc. L.T., 524, 525), the amount of any excess profits payable which is to be deducted—not, as the Act of 1916 provided, those paid, and, as he says, the change may well be significant. The general scheme of the Act, in my opinion, deals with the matter on the basis that past accurate computations should not be interfered with, but the matter should be adjusted by adding the sum deducted to profits in the year of deficiency. No doubt the appellant gained by not having to pay the excess profits tax originally charged, but, on the other hand, he is deprived of the right to set off his loss against future profits. In these circumstances I cannot say that the Court of Session was wrong—indeed I think its conclusion was right and would dismiss the appeal.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, I agree with the opinion of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. The question in the appeal turns on the construction of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 15 and s. 18. Section 15 (1) provides for the ascertainment of a deficiency of profits in any chargeable accounting period. Section 15 (2) enacts that when a deficiency occurs in any chargeable accounting period, the profits chargeable with excess profits tax shall be deemed to be reduced, and it then goes on to deal with the consequential relief. Under para. (a) the aggregate of the profits chargeable for the previous chargeable accounting periods is to be deemed to be reduced by the amount of the deficiency, and the amount of excess profits tax payable in respect of the aggregate is to be deemed to be reduced accordingly. The relief necessary to give effect to the reductions is to be given by repayment or otherwise. Paragraph (b) deals with the case where the amount of the deficiency exceeds the aggregate amount of the profits chargeable for the previous chargeable accounting periods. In that event the balance is to be applied in reducing any profits chargeable for the next subsequent chargeable accounting period, and if and so far as it exceeds the amount of these profits, any profits chargeable for the next subsequent chargeable accounting period, and so on. Pausing there, I think that there is not much doubt about what is intended. Section 15 (2) is designed to secure that if excess profits have been earned in one or more chargeable accounting periods but a deficiency has occurred in a subsequent chargeable accounting period, the taxpayer shall pay excess profits tax only on the net aggregate. In the first part of the section I think "the profits chargeable with excess profits tax" means the total chargeable profits whenever earned and irrespective of the particular chargeable accounting period in which they were earned. There are two significant differences between para. (a) and para. (b). Under para. (a), the deficiency is set against the aggregate of past profits, which is to be deemed to be reduced by the amount of the deficiency. Under para. (b), the excess profits chargeable for the subsequent chargeable accounting period are to be actually reduced. I agree with my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack that there is no indication that the computation of excess profits for any chargeable accounting period before the chargeable accounting period in which the deficiency occurred is to be re-opened. The words "shall be deemed to be reduced" occur three times in s. 15 (2), and I think that they cannot be ignored or treated as negligible. One must ask for what purposes the total profits chargeable with excess profits tax, or the aggregate amount of the profits so chargeable for the chargeable accounting periods previous to the chargeable accounting period in which the deficiency occurred, or the amount of excess profits tax payable in respect of this aggregate, are to be deemed to be reduced. The answer supplied by the context is that it is for the purposes of giving the relief from excess profits tax made necessary by the occurrence of a deficiency of profits. The words "shall be deemed" appear also in s. 15 (1), and there they are qualified by the words "for the purposes of this Part of this Act," because it is intended that the event which has been deemed to occur should affect not only the computation of excess profits tax, but also the computation of income tax. The omission of the words "for the purposes of this Part of this Act" in s. 15 (2) seems to me to be significant.

If that is the meaning of s. 15 (2), its provisions seem to have no bearing on the problem dealt with in s. 18. Section 18 deals with the computation of profits for the purposes of income tax, and the first part of s. 18 (1) provides that the amount of the excess profits tax payable for any chargeable accounting period shall be deductible as an expense in computing profits for income tax purposes for the period. "The amount of the excess profits tax payable for any chargeable accounting period" must, it seems to me, mean the amount of excess profits tax arrived at for each several accounting period. When no deficiency has occurred, or when payment of excess profits tax has been made in each year before a deficiency occurred that is admittedly the meaning of the words. I think it must also be their meaning where a deficiency has occurred after a year, or a succession of years, in which excess profits have been earned and where the provisions for aggregating the past excess profits and deeming them to be reduced by the amount of the deficiency fall to be applied before any payment of excess profits tax has been made. The Crown, however, relied on the proviso to s. 18 (1) as well as on s. 15 (2). The proviso deals with the case where relief is given by way of repayment from excess profits tax chargeable for any chargeable accounting period previous to that in which a deficiency occurs. I think that it is intended to cover all those cases to which the method of aggregation and deduction is applied by s. 15 (2) (a). In those cases the proviso says that "the amount of the deduction allowed under this section shall not be altered." Unless these words mean that the deduction of the amount of the excess profits tax payable in respect of each particular chargeable accounting period is to stand, I do not know what they can mean. And if that is their meaning the method of aggregation and deduction and its results provided for by s. 15 (2) (a), in which the particular chargeable accounting periods are disregarded, are expressly excluded from having any place in the calculation of profits for the purposes of income tax.

My Lords, I am aware that the meaning which I have put on the relevant sections does not avoid all the difficulties of construction. I appreciate that the words "relief is given by way of repayment," which in themselves are appropriate to cover both those cases in which relief is given by a cash repayment and those cases in which relief is given by set off, nevertheless throw the mind back to the words "relief . . . given by way of repayment or otherwise" in s. 15 (2) (a) and may reasonably lead to the inference that the proviso to s. 18 (1) is limited to the case where relief is given by a cash payment. I will add that, on the Crown's construction, it might result that the liability of the taxpayer for income tax would be heavier if, instead of paying excess profits tax year by year, he postponed payment till the deficiency had occurred and the provisions of s. 15 (2) had come into operation, but I do not rely on the comparative equity of the rival contentions of parties. I prefer the construction submitted by the respondents, and it is enough to say with my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack that it has not been shown that the interlocutor under appeal is erroneous.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON : My Lords, this is an appeal against an interlocutor pronounced by the First Division of the Court of Session, as the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, on a Case Stated under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 149. The facts giving rise to the appeal are fully set out in the Case Stated, but I must repeat some of them in order to state the contentions of the parties and my views on these contentions. The question raised in the Case is whether the General Commissioners of Income Tax for the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire adopted the correct method of dealing with excess profits tax in arriving at the profits of the respondents for the purpose of income tax. The matter depends on the deductions allowable, in arriving at such profits, on account of liability in respect of excess profits tax.

The respondents, a limited company carrying on business in Scotland as building contractors, were assessed to income tax under sched. D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, for 1941-42 to 1945-46 inclusive, as follows :—1941-42 on £2,338 less wear and tear £80 ; 1942-43 on £5,000 ; 1943-44 on £5,000 ; 1944-45 on £500 ; 1945-46 on £500. The respondents appealed against these assessments, and their appeal was heard by the General Commissioners of Income Tax for the Lower Ward of Lanarkshire on Feb. 3, 1947. It was then stated to the commissioners that on Sept. 13, 1946, the parties had finally agreed to the figures of profits and of excess profits tax for all chargeable accounting periods up to that ending on July 31, 1944. The net balance of excess profits tax payable on an accounting in respect of all the chargeable accounting periods up to and including the twelve months ending July 31, 1944, had been agreed to be £517. The details of the finally agreed computations were as follows :

| Chargeable accounting period.             | Excess profits tax payable.                                                                       | Amounts repayable or to be set off in respect of excess profits tax deficiencies. |
|-------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| 4 months to July 31, 1939                 |                                                                                                   | £97 16 0(Set off against excess for twelve months to July, 31, 1940)          |
| 12 months to July 31, 1940                | £3,548 (after allowance of deficiency of £97 16s. for the period of four months to July 31, 1939) |                                                                                   |
| 12 months to July 31, 1941                | £1,384                                                                                            |                                                                                   |
| 12 months to July 31, 1942                | £4,636                                                                                            |                                                                                   |
| 12 months to July 31, 1943                |                                                                                                   | £8,465                                                                            |
| 12 months to July 31, 1944                |                                                                                                   | £586                                                                              |
|                                           | £9,568                                                                                            | £9,051                                                                            |
| Deduct deficiencies                       | £9,051                                                                                            |                                                                                   |
| Net balance of excess profits tax payable | £517                                                                                              |                                                                                   |

The respondents had paid £1,000 in September, 1943, as a payment on account of excess profits tax, and the appellants had credited this sum against the assessment for the year to July 31, 1940. In 1946 the appellants, after satisfying the net balance of excess profits tax payable of £517, repaid the balance of £483 to the respondents. The amounts of the profits chargeable to income tax before making adjustments in respect of excess profits tax payable and repayable were also agreed by both parties in the following amounts :—

|   |                       |          |         |
|---|-----------------------|----------|---------|
| A | Year to July 31, 1940 | Profit   | £4,838. |
|   | Year to July 31, 1941 | Profit   | £2,456. |
|   |                       | Interest | £21.    |
|   | Year to July 31, 1942 | Profit   | £5,783. |
|   | Year to July 31, 1943 | Loss     | £7,645. |
| B | Year to July 31, 1944 | Profit   | £550.   |

The parties, however, did not agree the adjustments to be made for income tax purposes in respect of the excess profits tax liabilities payable and the amounts of excess profits tax repayable for deficiencies.

It is convenient at this point to set out s. 12 (1), s. 15, s. 18 and s. 21 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, to which I shall refer hereafter as "the Act of 1939."

C These four sections are part of a fasciculus of sections headed "Excess profits tax."

"12.—(1) Where the profits arising in any chargeable accounting period from any trade or business to which this section applies exceed the standard profits, there shall, subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, be charged on the excess a tax (to be called the excess profits tax) equal to three-fifths of the excess.

D

15.—(1) For the purposes of this Part of this Act a deficiency of profits shall be deemed to have occurred in a trade or business in any chargeable accounting period if the profits arising from the trade or business in that period are less than the standard profits, or if a loss is sustained in the trade or business in that period ; and the amount of the deficiency occurring in any such period shall be taken to be—(a) where profits have been made in the period, the amount by which those profits fall short of the standard profits ; (b) where a loss has been sustained in the period, the amount of the loss added to the amount of the standard profits. (2) Where a deficiency of profits occurs in any chargeable accounting period in any trade or business, the profits chargeable with excess profits tax arising from the trade or business shall be deemed to be reduced, and relief shall be granted in accordance with the following provisions :—(a) the aggregate amount of the profits so chargeable for the previous chargeable accounting periods shall be deemed to be reduced by the amount of the deficiency, and the amount of excess profits tax payable in respect thereof shall be deemed to be reduced accordingly, and the relief necessary to give effect to the reduction shall be given by repayment or otherwise ; (b) where the amount of the deficiency exceeds the aggregate amount of the profits so chargeable for the previous chargeable accounting periods, the balance of the deficiency shall be applied in reducing any profits so chargeable for the next subsequent chargeable accounting period, and, if and so far as it exceeds the amount of those profits, any profits so chargeable for the next subsequent chargeable accounting period, and so on.

H

18.—(1) The amount of the excess profits tax payable in respect of a trade or business for any chargeable accounting period shall, in computing for the purposes of income tax the profits and gains arising from that trade or business, be allowed to be deducted as an expense incurred in that period : Provided that where, under the provisions of this Act relating to deficiencies of profits, relief is given by way of repayment from excess profits tax chargeable for any chargeable accounting period previous to that in which the deficiency occurs, the amount of the deduction allowed under this section shall not be altered but the amount repayable shall be taken into account in computing the profits and gains of the trade or business for the purposes of income tax as if it were a profit of the trade or business accruing in the chargeable accounting period in which the deficiency occurs. (2) The provisions of this section do not apply to the computation of the profits of a trade or business for the purposes of the national defence contribution.

A

21.—(1) Excess profits tax shall be assessed and collected by the commissioners, and shall be due and payable at the expiration of one month from the date of assessment, and shall be recoverable as a debt due to His Majesty from the person on whom it is assessed."

B

The contest between the parties as to the construction and effect of these sections is conveniently illustrated by certain tables which have been put before the commissioners and relied on before your Lordships' House. Table A shows the respondents' computation, and is as follows :—

A. The Company's Computation.

|                       |                                                           |        | Net profit forincome tax | C |
|-----------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------|--------|------------------------------|---|
| Year to July 31, 1940 | Agreed profit ... ..                                      | £4,838 |                              |   |
|                       | Less excess profits tax payable as finally agreed ...     | £3,548 |                              |   |
|                       |                                                           |        | £1,290                       |   |
| Year to July 31, 1941 | Agreed profit ... ..                                      | £2,456 |                              | D |
|                       | Interest ... ..                                           | 21     |                              |   |
|                       | Less excess profits tax payable as finally agreed ...     | £1,384 |                              |   |
|                       |                                                           |        | £1,093                       |   |
| Year to July 31, 1942 | Agreed profit ... ..                                      | £5,783 |                              |   |
|                       | Less excess profits tax payable as finally agreed ...     | £4,636 |                              | E |
|                       |                                                           |        | £1,147                       |   |
| Year to July 31, 1943 | Agreed loss ... ..                                        | £7,645 |                              |   |
|                       | Credit for excess profits tax repayable as finally agreed | £8,465 |                              |   |
|                       |                                                           |        | £820                         | F |
| Year to July 31, 1944 | Agreed profit ... ..                                      | £550   |                              |   |
|                       | Credit for excess profits tax repayable as finally agreed | £586   |                              |   |
|                       |                                                           |        | £1,136                       |   |

Table B was put in on behalf of the appellants, by the inspector of taxes who appeared before the General Commissioners, and is as follows :—

G

B. The Inspector's Computation.

|                       |                                             |        | Net profit forincome tax |   |
|-----------------------|---------------------------------------------|--------|------------------------------|---|
| Year to July 31, 1940 | Agreed profit ... ..                        | £4,838 |                              |   |
|                       | Less excess profits tax actually paid... .. | £1,000 |                              | H |
|                       |                                             |        | £3,838                       |   |
| Year to July 31, 1941 | Agreed profit ... ..                        | £2,456 |                              |   |
|                       | Interest ... ..                             | 21     |                              |   |
|                       | Excess profits tax actually paid ... ..     | Nil.   |                              |   |
|                       |                                             |        | £2,477                       |   |

Table B (continued.)

|   |                       |                                  |     |     |        |             |
|---|-----------------------|----------------------------------|-----|-----|--------|-------------|
| A | Year to July 31, 1942 | Agreed profit                    | ... | ... | £5,783 |             |
|   |                       | Excess profits tax actually paid | ... | ... | Nil.   |             |
|   |                       |                                  |     |     |        | £5,783      |
|   | Year to July 31, 1943 | Agreed loss                      | ... | ... | £7,645 |             |
| B |                       | Excess profits tax actually paid | ... | ... | Nil.   |             |
|   |                       |                                  |     |     |        | Loss £7,645 |
|   | Year to July 31, 1944 | Agreed profit                    | ... | ... | £550   |             |
|   |                       | Add excess profits tax repaid    |     |     | £483   |             |
|   |                       |                                  |     |     |        | £1,033      |

The General Commissioners accepted the respondents' computation as shown in Table A and their decision was affirmed on appeal by the First Division of the Court of Session.

In the concluding paragraph of the Case Stated, the General Commissioners set out the question of law as follows :—

"The question of law for the opinion of the court is whether we adopted the correct method of dealing with excess profits tax in arriving at the profits of the company for the purpose of income tax."

Now the method adopted by the General Commissioners was the method adopted by the respondents in their Table A, and, consequently, the only question before your Lordships' House is whether the method adopted in Table A is right or wrong. Counsel for the respondents explains and seeks to justify this method as follows. In the first place, he says, you must look at s. 18 of the Act of 1939. That is the section under which payments of excess profits tax can be deducted as an expense. Following the words of that section, and taking the first of the five relevant chargeable accounting periods, you find that £3,548 is "the amount of excess profits tax payable in respect of" the appellants' business for that chargeable accounting period. That sum is therefore deductible, under s. 18, "as an expense incurred in that period." The scheme of the Act of 1939 is to treat each chargeable accounting period separately, and once you have found out what are the excess profits in respect of a particular chargeable accounting period, and what is the excess profits tax payable in respect thereof, you have arrived at an allowable deduction which cannot subsequently be disturbed.

If there is a subsequent "deficiency of profits," as defined in s. 15, the proviso to s. 18 comes into operation and the words "where . . . relief is given by way of repayment" are not limited to the case of a repayment in cash. Consequently, in Table A the respondents rightly deducted the "excess profits tax payable as finally agreed" in each of the first three chargeable accounting periods, and as it was found that there was a "deficiency of profits" amounting to £8,465 in the fourth period, they rightly did not disturb the deductions already made in each of the first three periods, and the deficiency of £8,465 was correctly taken into account "as if it were a profit of the trade or business occurring in the chargeable accounting period in which the deficiency occurs," in accordance with the concluding words of the proviso to s. 18, and the same observation applies to the subsequent "deficiency" of £586. Thus Table A is correct throughout. My Lords, it may at once be observed that the argument just summarised, if correct, leads to remarkable results. Taking the year to July 31, 1941, as an example, the respondents' method of calculation would allow them to deduct, "as an expense incurred in that period," within the meaning of s. 18, a sum of £1,384 in respect of excess profits tax which never was paid and never will be paid by them.

Before considering the respondents' argument in more detail, it is desirable that I should state my views on the meaning of the word "payable" in the first line of s. 18. The learned judges of the First Division appear to have thought that the Crown's argument involved reading this word as meaning "actually paid" and the wording of Table B would seem to indicate that the Crown might desire so to contend. No such argument was advanced before this House. I would add that although the wording of Table B is ill-chosen, it may well be that the ill-chosen wording conceals a perfectly correct line of reasoning which arrives at a perfectly correct result. However, the correctness of Table B is not at the moment under consideration, and I turn to the construction of the word "payable" in s. 18. My Lords, in my view, the word "payable" in s. 18 has no strained or artificial meaning. It is used in the same sense as it is used in s. 21 and in s. 15. The amount of the excess profits tax payable in respect of each chargeable accounting period is ascertained in the manner laid down in the Act, and the tax becomes "payable" at the expiration of one month from the date of assessment. That amount the taxpayer is allowed to deduct as an expense incurred in respect of that period. If, however, there is a deficiency of profits in a subsequent chargeable accounting period, s. 15 (2) comes into operation. The aggregate amount of the profits chargeable with excess profits for the previous chargeable accounting periods is to be "deemed to be reduced" by the amount of the deficiency, and the amount of excess profits tax "payable" in respect thereof is to be "deemed to be reduced" accordingly. The relief necessary to give effect to this "deemed" reduction is to be given "by repayment or otherwise." It seems to me that the method of giving relief by repayment can only be adopted when there has been a previous payment, or previous payments, by the taxpayer, and it turns out that, having regard to the "deemed" reduction he has paid too much. The obvious, and possibly the only, way of giving relief, if the taxpayer has paid no excess profits tax, is by way of set off against the debt originally due to the Crown under s. 21. It may be convenient if at this stage I apply the provisions of s. 15 (2) as I understand them, to the figures in Table A, disregarding, as Table A disregards, the payment of £1,000 in 1943 and the repayment of £483 in 1946.

(i) A "deficiency of profits" occurred in a chargeable accounting period, namely, a deficiency of £8,465 in the year ending July 31, 1943. (ii) The aggregate amount of the profits chargeable with excess profits tax for the previous chargeable accounting periods must therefore be "deemed to be reduced" by the sum of £8,465, in accordance with the opening words of s. 15 (2) (a), and the amount of excess profits tax payable in respect thereof must be "deemed to be reduced accordingly." The amount of the profits chargeable with excess profits tax for each of the first three periods is not mentioned in Table A. For the present purpose I shall assume that it was the same as the sum there stated to be "excess profits tax payable as finally agreed," as excess profits tax was at the rate of one hundred per cent. for the whole of the second and third periods and for part of the first period. On this footing, the aggregate amount which must be "deemed to be reduced" was £3,548 plus £1,384 plus £4,636 or a total of £9,568. (iii) Section 15 (2) (a) does not define exactly how this "deemed" reduction is to be applied to the aggregate amount of £9,568, but the most natural way of applying it would seem to be first to reduce the £3,548 to nil, then to reduce the £1,384 to nil and then to reduce the £4,636 to £1,103. In this way effect will have been given to the total "deemed" reduction of £8,465, and the respondents do not seek to contest this method of carrying out the "deemed" reduction if they fail in their contention that the figures of £3,548, £1,384 and £4,636 ought to be left unaffected by the deficiencies of profits in subsequent chargeable accounting periods. (iv) In the year to July 31, 1944, there was again a "deficiency of profits" amounting this time to £586. This will be applied in reducing the £1,103 to £517. Thus there remains a balance of £517 of excess profits tax payable in respect of the year to July 31, 1942, and no further excess profits tax became payable prior to the repeal of that tax in December, 1946.

My Lords, with all respect to those who have thought otherwise, I cannot see that this method of applying the provisions of s. 15 (2) involves giving an artificial meaning to the word "payable" in s. 18, or that it involves giving to that word a twofold or threefold meaning, depending on the events which actually happen. To my mind "payable" always has the same simple meaning as it has in s. 21, but in certain events the amount payable is deemed to be reduced. Taking again, as an example, the year to July 31, 1941, the respondents claim to deduct £1,384 as an "expense" under s. 18 (1). They say: "this sum was 'payable' under s. 21 (1) and therefore we can deduct it." To this the appellants reply: "True, it was 'payable' under s. 21 (1) and we do not seek to give any other meaning to the word 'payable' in s. 18 (1). But we do say that it is 'deemed to be reduced' to nil under s. 15 (2) and therefore you can deduct nothing as an expense. If you had paid the £1,384, relief would be given 'by way of repayment' and the proviso to s. 18 (1) would have applied; the £1,384 would have been brought into a later year 'as if it were a profit of the business accruing' in that year, and the figures given in Table A would have been correct. As it is, relief is given 'otherwise,' namely, by way of a set off, and the figures in Table A are wrong." To my mind, this contention of the Crown is unanswerable, and shows that Table A cannot be correct. It is true that I have so far disregarded the payment of £1,000 and the repayment of £483, but I cannot see that any introduction of these figures into Table A can possibly make that table correct, if I am right in my construction of s. 15 (2) and if, as I think, "repayment" in the proviso to s. 18 (1) can only mean repayment in cash. I shall return to consider this proviso, but meanwhile I must consider the payment of £1,000 and the repayment of £483.

As to the £483 no difficulty arises. I have already shown that the total excess profits tax payable in respect of the whole period, after s. 15 (2) has been put into operation, is £517. The respondents have paid £1,000. Therefore £483 is due to them and this sum must be paid in cash, since there is no sum against which it can be set off. Here the proviso to s. 18 (1) comes into play, and the £483 must be "taken into account in computing the profits and gains of the trade or business for the purposes of income tax as if it were a profit of the trade or business accruing in the chargeable accounting period in which the deficiency occurs."

I am relieved of the task of considering at this point exactly how the £1,000 should be taken into account, by reason of a concession and statement by counsel for the respondents. He conceded that if s. 15 (2) were construed as I construe it, Table A must be incorrect, and he stated that in this event his clients were willing to accept a suggestion of the appellants which appears in Table B, that the £1,000 should be allowed as a deduction, for the purposes of income tax, as an expense incurred in the year ending July 31, 1940, and that the £483 should be brought in as if it were a profit of the business occurring in the year ending July 31, 1944.

I now turn to consider the argument of counsel for the respondents, as already summarised. It will be observed that throughout his argument counsel disregarded, as Table A disregards, the payment of £1,000 in 1943 and the repayment of £483 in 1946. In my view, there are at least two fatal flaws in the argument of counsel for the respondents. In the first place, the method adopted in Table A, and sought to be upheld by counsel, gives no effect at all to the provisions of s. 15 (2). No heed is paid to the "deemed" reduction of excess profits tax for which provision is made in that sub-section. The First Division found it possible to accept the respondents' argument, and the Lord President said (1948, Sc. L.T. 524) in the course of his opinion :

"The argument of the Inland Revenue had to be that, so long as excess profits tax existed (i.e., until December, 1946), assessments to that tax were merely provisional, and that there was no finality for either excess profits tax liability or income tax liability until the whole six years of the emergency tax had run their course, so that it could be known whether, and to what extent, relief under s. 15 might be claimable."

This argument he found unacceptable. I respectfully agree with the Lord President that the argument gives rise to difficulties, but I think that the wording of s. 15 (2) renders its acceptance inevitable. That sub-section makes it impossible to ascertain the amount of excess profits tax for which a taxpayer may ultimately be liable, in respect of any chargeable accounting period, until excess profits tax ceases to be in force. I would add two observations. First, that excess profits tax was essentially a temporary measure, although, of course, the legislature could not know exactly how long it would last; secondly, that the respondents' argument also gives rise to anomalies. As I have already pointed out, if it were correct it would enable them to deduct, as an expense, large sums on account of excess profits tax which were never paid and were ultimately found not to be payable. In the second place, the latter part of the argument of counsel for the respondents dealing with the event of a subsequent deficiency of profits rests on his contention that the word "repayment" in s. 18 is not limited in its meaning to a repayment in cash but covers every case in which relief is given, including a case in which relief is given by set off. In my judgment, this word can only refer to a repayment in cash. I think that this is its more natural meaning in the context in which it appears, but if there were any doubt on the point it is removed by the words "the relief necessary to give effect to the reduction shall be given by repayment or otherwise" at the end of s. 15 (2) (a). In my view, the word "repayment" must bear the same meaning in s. 18 (1) as it bears in s. 15 (2) (a). In the latter sub-section relief given "by repayment" is contrasted with relief given "otherwise," and I think that "repayment" in this context plainly means repayment in cash, as contrasted with relief given in any other manner. The respondents' argument gives no meaning at all to the words "or otherwise" in s. 15 (2) (a). The words in the proviso to s. 18 (1) "where relief is given by way of repayment" show that the proviso applies only where one particular method of giving relief is adopted and the method referred to can only be, in my view, the method of repayment in cash. In the present case, only £483 was repaid in cash, yet in Table A the respondents treat two sums of £8,465 and £586 as coming within the proviso to s. 18 (1).

My Lords, as I have said, the only question before this House is whether the method adopted in Table A is right or wrong. I have endeavoured to show that it is wrong in two vital respects, viz. (a) it gives no effect at all to the provisions of s. 15 (2), and (b) it treats two sums of £8,465 and £586 as coming within the proviso to s. 18 (1), although neither of these sums was the subject of a cash repayment. If Table A does not show the correct method of dealing with excess profits tax in arriving at the profits of the respondents for the purpose of income tax, the question of law must be answered in the negative. It would not be right for me to express a concluded view as to how the respondents' payment of £1,000 should be treated, assuming that my view as to the construction of the Act is correct. This point has not been argued, for the reasons which I have already stated. Nevertheless, I think it is right that I should state one way in which I think it might be treated, because by so doing I shall show, as I hope, that my construction need not lead to any strange result in a case where part, but not all, of the excess profits tax "payable" under s. 21 (1) has been paid before a "deficiency of profits" occurs. I think it is reasonable to treat the £1,000 as a payment on account of the excess profits tax payable for the year to July 31, 1940, and the appellants have so treated it with the assent of the respondents. It follows that when relief has to be given to give effect to a "deemed" reduction of £9,051 (£8,465 + £586) relief can be given by way of repayment in respect of part of the "aggregate amount" of £9,568 (£3,548+£1,384+£4,636) and relief can be given by way of set off against the remainder. By setting off the £9,051 against the £9,568 the excess profits tax payable is reduced to £517, but, as the respondents have paid £1,000, £483 is due to them as a repayment. As I have already pointed out, the proviso to s. 18 (1) comes into play as respects this repayment in cash. The respondents have already paid £1,000. That sum was part of the excess profits tax "payable" within s. 18 (1), although the sum "payable" was ultimately "deemed to be reduced." Accordingly, if there had been no subsequent "deficiency of profits" the respondents would have been able to deduct it, as an expense, for the purposes of income tax. Following the words of the proviso to s. 18 (1) the amount of the deduction allowed under s. 18 (1) (namely, a deduction of £1,000 in respect of the year ending July 31, 1940) is not altered, but the £483 repayable is taken into account "as if it were a profit of the trade or business accruing in the chargeable accounting period in which the deficiency occurs." I see no difficulty in dealing with the payment and repayment in this way. It may be that in Table B the £483 is brought in as a profit a year too late, but to this the respondents do not object. I think I should add that, if my reasoning is incorrect and the argument for the respondents is to be accepted, it would appear to be necessary to explain how Table A can be correct in disregarding the payment of £1,000 and the repayment of £483, and how these sums shall be treated. I find no light on this point in the respondents' case. Nor does it appear to be dealt with in the opinions delivered in the First Division of the Court of Session. I would allow the appeal and answer the question of law in the negative.

- D LORD MACDERMOTT : My Lords, if the submission of the Crown is to prevail the words "the amount . . . payable" in the first part of s. 18 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, must bear a complex and unnatural meaning. They must, as I follow the argument, mean the greater of (a) the amount ultimately payable, i.e., the amount of excess profits tax payable in respect of a particular year as subsequently reduced by way of relief under s. 15, and (b) the amount actually paid as excess profits tax in respect of the same year. It is material to observe that the first part of s. 18 (1) is an enactment of general applicability. It makes excess profits tax deductible as an expense for income tax purposes irrespective of whether or not a right to relief under s. 15 arises ; and if it could be read apart from its proviso and s. 15, the submission of the Crown would clearly be untenable. So read I think there can be no doubt that the words "the amount . . . payable" would connote nothing more or less than the excess profits tax liability as computed for the year in question. They would hold no warrant for looking beyond what could be assessed and levied at the end of such year, and payment would be an irrelevant consideration.

- The first question, then, is whether the effect of s. 15 and the proviso to s. 18 (1) is to expand and modify this prima facie meaning so as to accord with the contentions of the Crown. Regarded alone, s. 15 would not justify the view that "the amount . . . payable" may mean, on occasion, not the liability but a different amount measured by the sum actually paid. But it would go some way to justify the view that "payable" means "ultimately payable" if, in sub-s. (2) (a) thereof, the word "deemed" in the direction "and the amount of excess profits tax payable in respect thereof shall be deemed to be reduced accordingly" could be construed as meaning "deemed for the purposes of this Part of this Act." Coming, however, to the best conclusion I can on the language of the statute, I do not think that would be the right interpretation. It seems to me that sub-s. (2) is concerned primarily with the granting of relief from liability in respect of a period, which may span several years, rather than with the reopening and adjustment of each of the previous assessments. The machinery of para. (a) starts its work on actual profits and actual liabilities. The first are to be "deemed to be reduced" in the aggregate, but that can only be notional and for the purpose of sub-s. (2). The second are to be "deemed to be reduced accordingly" and I do not think this reduction can fairly be regarded as intended to fulfil a wider purpose. If that is right, I can find no good reason for reading "payable" in s. 18 (1) as "ultimately payable," for there is nothing in the proviso to that sub-section, taken either alone or in conjunction with s. 15, to support that interpretation. The proviso does not purport to modify what has gone before. On the contrary, it directs, in regard to the only kind of event with which it is concerned, that "the amount of the deduction allowed under this section shall not be altered." Even if the view of s. 15 which I favour is wrong, it does not follow that the Crown case is right. It is not enough for the Crown to say that "payable" means "ultimately payable" and to stop there. To do so would, where relief under s. 15 has been given by way of repayment, lead to an impossible result, for the proviso would then operate to charge the subject, who because he had paid had got a repayment, a second time in respect of the same parcel of profits. It is to avoid the entanglements thus created by the difficult terms of this proviso that the Crown definition of "payable" assumes the form of "ultimately payable or actually paid, whichever amount is the greater." This is not a severable proposition and the first part of it cannot survive alone.

My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in print the opinions of my noble and learned friends LORD PORTER and LORD REID, and I desire to express my concurrence with the reasons which have led them to reject the construction placed on the word "payable" in s. 18 (1) by the Crown. I need not repeat those reasons; but I would, if I may, add a further ground for the same conclusion which seems to flow from the considerations to which I have just referred. A proviso in a statute must, no doubt, be read and have effect according to its tenor; but its nature is not to be overlooked in the task of interpretation, and in the absence of some compelling context (of which I see no sign in the present case) it is not a legitimate process, in order to resolve some doubt or difficulty arising from a proviso, to use it, so to speak, as a lever to force plain words in the enactment to which it is appended away from their natural meaning. Here, I think, that is what the Crown has endeavoured to do and that is one of the reasons why its contentions should not succeed: see West Derby Union v. Metropolitan Life Assurance Society (1). As LORD HERSCHELL there observed ([1897] A.C. 655):

"Of course a proviso may be used to guide you in the selection of one or other of two possible constructions of the words to be found in the enactment, and show when there is doubt about its scope, when it may reasonably admit of doubt as to its having this scope or that, which is the proper view to take of it; but to find in it an enacting provision which enables something to be done which is not to be found in the enactment itself on any reasonable construction of it, simply because otherwise the proviso would be meaningless and senseless, would, as I have said, be in the highest degree dangerous."

The next question is whether the respondents' method of computation complied with the terms of the statute. It is based on a construction of s. 18 (1) which cannot be accepted merely because that of the Crown is rejected, though the case appears to have been presented throughout as a matter of choice between the rival interpretations, and on the basis that if one fell the other stood. The respondents' submission as to the meaning of the words "the amount . . . payable" accords with what I think is the right view. The trouble is with their construction of the proviso. Though it applies only where "relief is given by way of repayment from excess profits tax chargeable" they say that this extends to any relief which may be given under s. 15 (2) (a), and, consequentially, that in the instant case "the amount repayable," which under the proviso is to be brought into account as a profit in the deficiency year, includes all the excess profits tax liability in respect of which relief has been granted, and is not limited to the actual repayment of £483. This meaning has the virtue of giving the proviso a rational design by making its compensatory provisions adequate to maintain a constant balance against the operation of the words "the amount ... payable" according to their true construction, but it rides so uneasily on the language which the legislature has used that I find myself unable to adopt it. I would not feel the same difficulty if relief under s. 15 had to take the shape either of an actual repayment or of a set off in the sense of applying one obligation to reduce or extinguish another, for "repayment" like "payment" need not always connote the passing of money. It is, however, plain that relief may commonly come to be given under s. 15 merely by virtue of the process of reduction which is deemed to be effected thereunder. That, indeed, has happened in the present case for in it the relief was of that nature save to the extent of the £483. I do not think that kind of relief can reasonably be described as "relief ... by way of repayment." Nor am I able to find in the statute any context to justify such a description of it. No doubt the proviso to s. 18 (1) must be read closely with s. 15 (2), but that, as it seems to me, only adds another difficulty. The kind of relief under discussion either falls within the expression at the end of s. 15 (2) (a)—"repayment or otherwise"—or it does not. If the former, its appropriate place is in the category covered by the words "or otherwise" and not in that covered by "repayment"; and, if the latter, it is no whit nearer being given "by way or repayment." This view, if well founded, means that there has been an unfortunate casus omissus in the drafting of the proviso. It may well be that this reflects the stress of events in 1939 when the statute was enacted; but, whatever the reason, the defect is, to my mind, beyond repair by any process of adjudication, however anomalous its results. For these reasons, I think the respondents' computation (Table A) is correct in law for the first three, but not for the last two, of the years under review, and I would answer the question of law accordingly.

LORD REID: My Lords, in the present case, a number of profitable years for the respondents, in respect of which they would have had to pay large sums of excess profits tax if those years had stood alone, were succeeded by a year in which a heavy loss was sustained and a year in which the profits fell short of the standard profits. The general scheme of the Act for dealing with such a situation is simple enough. Relief is given so that, at the end of the period for which the tax is in operation, excess profits tax is only due on the amount by which the aggregate of chargeable profits in the good years exceeds the deficiencies in the other years. This result must be reached by way of relief, because, as regards each of the earlier chargeable accounting periods, where the profits exceeded the standard profits tax was immediately chargeable on the excess, assessments could be and were made, and tax was collected before it was known that there would later be a loss. What the Act does in s. 15 (2) is to direct that the profits chargeable with tax in the earlier good years and the tax payable in respect thereof shall be deemed to be reduced by the amount of the subsequent deficiency, and to provide that the relief necessary to give effect to the reduction shall be given by repayment or otherwise. The nature of the relief must depend on whether tax in respect of the earlier years has actually been paid or not. If the sum paid by the taxpayer in respect of the earlier years is larger than his total liability for the whole period as ascertained when the later deficiency of profits is taken into account, then plainly the taxpayer must get something back, and relief will operate by way of repayment. But if the taxpayer, though due to pay large sums in respect of the earlier years, has in fact paid nothing, or has only paid a sum smaller than the total amount of his ultimate liability, there is no room for any repayment and relief can operate by discharging the taxpayer's outstanding liability in respect of the earlier years to such extent as is necessary. I do not think that it is necessary to consider whether relief could operate in any other way. So far there is no difficulty. The difficulty arises out of the inter-relation of excess profits tax and income tax. Where there is no question of a deficiency of profits in any year, again the scheme is simple enough. For income tax purposes, the amount of excess profits tax payable for any chargeable accounting period (normally a period of one year) is allowed by s. 18 to be deducted as an expense incurred in that period. So long as there is no subsequent deficiency each period can be and is treated as standing by itself, and in effect that part of the profits which exceeds the standard profits is subject to excess profits tax but not to income tax, while the remainder of the profits is subject to income tax. But the simplicity of the scheme breaks down when a subsequent deficiency of profits makes it necessary to re-open the position of the earlier years in order to operate the relief from excess profits tax to which the taxpayer is entitled. The question which arises in this case is : What does the statute direct to be done as regards income tax in that event ?

I start with one direction about which there is no controversy in this case and which appears to me not to be ambiguous. Where the taxpayer has paid more than is ultimately found to be due he gets a repayment, and the latter part of the proviso to s. 18 (1) directs that this repayment shall be treated for income tax purposes as if it were a profit accruing in the period in which the deficiency of profits occurs. The repayment is not in fact a profit, and if it is treated as a profit in one year it must be off set by a corresponding allowance of a deduction in another period. This was not disputed by the Solicitor-General. I think that the position can best be made plain by a simple example. Let me suppose that in one year there is an excess profit of £5,000, and in the next a deficiency of £5,000. The result is that in the end no excess profits tax is due. It may be that the £5,000 of tax due in respect of the first year taken by itself has been paid in full. In that case the whole of that £5,000 is repayable and the statute directs that for income tax purposes it must be taken into account as a profit in the second year when there was a deficiency of £5,000. Let me further suppose that the standard profits were £2,000 in each year so that there was a total profit of £7,000 in the first year and a loss of £3,000 in the second year. The statutory direction to take into account, as a profit in the second year, the £5,000 of excess profits tax which was repayable converts the actual loss of £3,000 in that year into a profit of £2,000 for income tax purposes. If that were the only adjustment, the result would be that income tax would have to be paid on the actual profit of £7,000 for the first year and on the fictitious profit of £2,000 for the second year, in all £9,000 for the two years. But in fact the total profit for the two years taken together was only £4,000, so one would expect to find a provision for a reduction of the first year's profits for income tax purposes from the actual profit of £7,000 to £2,000 so that the total profits for income tax purposes for the two years would correspond with the actual total profit for the two years of £4,000. I turn to the provisions of s. 18 (1) which is the only place where any warrant for a deduction from the £7,000 profit in the first year could be found. I have already said that in a case which is not complicated by any question of deficiency of profits s. 18 (1) is a warrant for treating as a deduction for income tax purposes the sum payable as excess profits tax. In that case, when the tax so payable is paid, it is retained by the Exchequer : in the case I am now supposing, the tax has been paid but has then been repaid to the taxpayer. Does this repayment make any difference to the income tax position for the first year ? The first part of the proviso to s. 18 (1) supplies the answer. It enacts that " the amount of the deduction allowed under this section shall not be altered." That can, I think, only refer in the case I am supposing to the £5,000 which was originally payable and was in fact paid as tax due in respect of the first year but later repaid. A direction that, where relief is given, the amount of the deduction shall not be altered assumes that the amount of the deduction could be and was ascertained before the relief was given. The deduction is the amount of excess profits tax " payable," so " payable " cannot mean ultimately found to be payable because that can only be ascertained after relief has been given. It must mean originally payable before any question of relief arose.

The Solicitor-General admitted, and I have no doubt rightly admitted, that the first part of the proviso means that where tax has been paid the fact that it has later been repaid makes no difference. It remains deductible as an expense for income tax purposes notwithstanding its later return to the taxpayer. The matter is then put right, not by cancelling the deduction, but by treating the repayment as a profit in a later year. The real difficulty is to determine what has to be done as regards income tax where the excess profits tax payable in respect of an earlier year has not in fact been paid and relief has to be given in respect of a later deficiency by total or partial discharge of the assessment in respect of the earlier year. The proviso appears only to apply where "relief is given by way of repayment" and there is no corresponding provision to deal with relief given otherwise than by repayment. But if in this case one applies the first part of s. 18 (1), giving to it the same meaning as the Solicitor-General admitted it to have and as I have tried to show it must have where the proviso applies, it is impossible I think to reach a reasonable result without invoking the proviso.

Let me revert to the simple example which I took before, with the single difference that I now suppose that £5,000 was assessed and payable as excess profits tax for the first year, but not paid. The deduction allowed by s. 18 (1) for income tax purposes is "the amount of excess profits tax payable" for the chargeable accounting period and there is nothing in the Act to indicate that "payable" must be held to have a different meaning or that the deduction must be calculated in a different way according to what has in fact been paid. So the £5,000 would still be a deduction for income tax purposes just as it was when that sum had first been paid and then repaid, but there would be no proviso to direct that this is to be compensated by adding in £5,000 as a profit in the subsequent deficiency year. The Solicitor-General boldly sought to get over this difficulty by arguing that the word "payable" in s. 18 (1) has different meanings depending on what has actually been paid before the deficiency years are taken into account under s. 15 (2). If the original assessment has been paid in full, then "payable" means payable under that assessment; if nothing has been paid, then "payable" means ultimately found to be payable after subsequent deficiencies have been taken into account; but if a part only has been paid of the amount due under the original assessment and part or all of that payment has to be repaid (as happened in this case) then "payable" has no relation either to the amount payable under the original assessment or to the amount ultimately found to be due after taking subsequent deficiencies into account, but it means the amount actually paid.

My Lords, I find it impossible to construe the phrase "the amount of the excess profits tax payable . . . for any chargeable accounting period" in this way. I do not deny that the word "payable" is ambiguous. A word is ambiguous because a reasonable man using it in the context in which it occurs can be supposed to have intended, in so using it, one of two or more different meanings, and if a word is ambiguous a court is entitled to select one of those meanings as the true meaning. But the fact that a word is ambiguous does not entitle a court to select another meaning which it is plain that no reasonable man could have intended. "Payable" is ambiguous because it might mean originally payable before the subsequent deficiency was known or taken into account, or it might mean ultimately payable after that deficiency had been taken into account. But could it possibly have the complicated threefold meaning for which the Solicitor-General contends? To my mind, the question in this case is whether Parliament can possibly be supposed to have intended the phrase which I have quoted to bear the meaning which I have stated. I cannot bring myself to imagine anyone having such an intention, and therefore I cannot accept the argument for the Crown. It might be that an equitable result, or even a reasonable result, could only be reached by attributing to a phrase in a statute a meaning which no reasonable man would attach to it, but to attribute such a meaning to a phrase would in effect be legislating and not construing the statute and that is beyond the province of a court of law. If by legitimate processes of construction no meaning can be found which is equitable or even reasonable, then the matter can only be put right by further legislation.

I think it is fairly clear how s. 18 (1) came to assume its present form. There are many similarities between excess profits tax and the old excess profits duty and under the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, s. 38 (3), relief was provided to meet the case of a subsequent deficiency of profits after a year for which excess profits duty was payable. But this section was so phrased that it was necessary to pay the duty in respect of the earlier year before relief could be claimed in respect of the subsequent deficiency. Accordingly, the relief could only take the forms of repayment or set off against duty payable in respect of a still later profitable year, and the main difficulty in the present case could not arise. It is not very surprising that, in the circumstances of 1939, it was not observed that the change introduced by which a taxpayer can now get relief without actually paying the tax due for the earlier year necessitated a further provision dealing with deductions for income tax purposes if a proper result were to be reached. But, however that may be, I do not think that it is possible to reach a satisfactory result merely by construing the provisions of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, as they stand, and a court cannot supplement construction by legislation.

There appear to remain two possibilities. I have said that the proviso appears only to apply when relief is given by way of repayment, and not when relief is given otherwise than by way of repayment. If this is taken to be the true meaning of the proviso a reasonable result cannot be reached. In the present matter the taxpayer has throughout presented his case on the footing that the proviso applies not only to the tax which he actually paid and must now be repaid, but also to the further sum originally due which he did not pay, and which he is not now bound to pay because liability to pay it has been discharged by the operation of relief. This construction produces something much nearer to a reasonable and equitable result. In short the two possibilities are that the word "repayment" means what it says or that it is wide enough to include the case when no money passes but a liability is discharged. There are serious objections to the adoption of either of these alternatives, but if I have to choose between them—because there is no other possible construction—I would choose the alternative which has been adopted by the General Commissioners and approved by the First Division in this case. I think therefore that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed. No order as to costs, an agreement having been made with regard thereto.

Solicitors : Solicitor for England of the Board of Inland Revenue and Solicitor for Scotland of the Board of Inland Revenue (for the Crown) ; Kingsley Wood, Williams & Murphy, agents for Downie, Aiton & Co., Glasgow, and D. G. M'Gregor, W.S., Edinburgh (for the company).

[Reported by C. ST. J. NICHOLSON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re STEANE'S (BOURNEMOUTH), LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), November 18, 21, December 5, 1949.]

Company—Winding-up—Avoidance of disposition of property after commencement of winding-up—Discretion of court—Principles for exercise—Justice in particular circumstances—Special regard to bona fides of applicant—Debenture to secure advances made for payment of debts, to enable company to carry out its contracts—Company and debenture-holder not aware of presentation of petition when debenture issued—Advances made before and after service of petition—Companies Act, 1948 (c. 38), s. 227.

By the Companies Act, 1948, s. 227 : " In a winding-up by the court, any disposition of the property of the company . . . made after the commencement of the winding-up, shall, unless the court otherwise orders, be void." By s. 229 (2), except where there has been a previous resolution by the company for voluntary winding-up : " . . . the winding-up of a company by the court shall be deemed to commence at the time of the presentation of the petition for the winding-up."

The applicant was a director of a private company which was engaged in making and erecting prefabricated houses for local authorities. The company owed £51,017 to its bankers on an unsecured overdraft, and on Mar. 17, 1949, the bank refused to honour cheques issued by the company, in the ordinary course of its business, for sums amounting to £696 9s. 11d., unless funds were provided for the purpose. The applicant thereupon agreed with the company to advance this sum forthwith on the security of a debenture to be issued to him, and to make such further advances, not exceeding in all the sum of £5,000, as might be required to enable the company to continue to carry out its contracts. On Mar. 18 the bank formally demanded payment of the company's overdraft, and on Mar. 22 presented a petition to wind-up the company, but neither the company nor any of the directors knew that a petition had been presented until it was served on the company on Mar. 24, after the debenture had been sealed and issued, the applicant having in the meanwhile advanced to the company two further sums which were urgently required, chiefly for the payment of wages. On Mar. 30, he advanced a fourth sum, partly for wages and partly for other, less urgent, purposes. After the winding-up order was made on Apr. 4, 1949, the applicant applied for an order under s. 227 of the Act of 1948 that his debenture should not be void, but should be treated as valid to the extent of £2,888 16s. 8d. (i.e., the aggregate of the four sums advanced by him and the costs of preparation and registration of the debenture) together with interest, and that the taxed costs of the application should be added to the security.

HELD : the legislature, having omitted to indicate any particular principles which should govern the exercise of the discretion vested in the court by s. 227, must be deemed to have left such exercise entirely at large and controlled only by those general principles which applied to every kind of judicial discretion ; in exercising its discretion the court must decide what would be just and fair in the circumstances of each case, having special regard to the question of the good faith and honest intention of the persons concerned ; and, as the applicant had acted throughout in good faith, his object being merely to enable the company to fulfil its contracts, the court would make the order asked for.

Re Park Ward & Co., Ltd. ([1926] Ch. 828), applied.

[AS TO DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY AFTER COMMENCEMENT OF WINDING-UP, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., 1949, Vol. 5, pp. 714, 715, para. 1156 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 10, pp. 864, 865, Nos. 5834-5841.]

FOR THE COMPANIES ACT, 1948, s. 227 and s. 229, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, 2nd Edn., Vol. 3 ; pp. 646, 647.]

Cases referred to :

(1) Re Park Ward & Co., Ltd., [1926] Ch. 828 ; 95 L.J.Ch. 584 ; 135 L.T. 575 ; Digest Supp.

(2) Howard (Sunbury), Ltd. (Application of A. J. Newman), (1948), unreported.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS applying for an order under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 227, that a disposition made by a company after the commencement of its winding-up should not be void.

Before the petition for winding-up was presented, the applicant, a director of the company, agreed to make advances to the company on the security of a debenture to be issued to him, the advances being required by the company to enable it to carry out its contracts. The debenture was issued after the petition had been presented, but before it was served on the company and before the company or any of its directors had received any intimation in regard to it. Advances were made by the applicant before and after the petition was presented, one advance being made after the petition was served. Finding that the applicant had acted in good faith, VAISEY, J., now made the order asked for. The facts appear in the judgment.

Lindner for the applicant.

C. A. Settle for the liquidator.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 5. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. This is an application by Mr. Catlow Greenhalgh for an order under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 227, that the disposition made after the commencement of the winding-up of Steane's (Bournemouth), Ltd., by the issue by the company to the applicant, on Mar. 24, 1949, of a debenture to secure the repayment of a present advance of £696 9s. 11d. and future advances up to £5,000, and charging by way of specific charge the real and leasehold property of the company and its goodwill and by way of floating charge all its other assets, should not be void, but should be treated as valid to the extent of £2,888 16s. 8d., together with interest and costs, and that the taxed costs of the applicant of and occasioned by this application should be added to the amount secured by such debenture. The liquidator is the respondent to the application.

Section 227 of the Act is in these words :

"In a winding-up by the court, any disposition of the property of the company, including things in action, and any transfer of shares, or alteration in the status of the members of the company, made after the commencement of the winding-up, shall, unless the court otherwise orders, be void."

The section reproduces, without variation, s. 173 of the Companies Act, 1929, which was in substantially the identical terms of s. 205 (2) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, and s. 153 of the Companies Act, 1862. Except where there has been a previous resolution by the company for a voluntary winding-up, it is provided by s. 229 (2) of the Act of 1948, reproducing s. 175 (2) of the Act of 1929, s. 139 of the Act of 1908 and s. 84 of the Act of 1862, that :

"...the winding-up of a company by the court shall be deemed to commence at the time of the presentation of the petition for the winding-up."

In the present case the petition to wind-up the company was presented on Mar. 22, 1949, and the order to wind it up was made on Apr. 4, 1949. The Midland Bank, Ltd. (hereinafter called "the bank") were the petitioners. In support of the present application an affidavit was sworn by the applicant setting out the facts of the case shortly as follows :

"The company was a private company incorporated on Dec. 22, 1945, under the Act of 1929. The applicant, in July 1948, subscribed and paid for 8,500 shares of £1 each in the company, which was then carrying on a substantial business in making and erecting prefabricated houses for the Bournemouth, Christchurch, and Gosport Corporations."

- That, I suppose, may fairly be regarded as work of national importance. The bank, as the company's bankers, had granted to the company an unsecured overdraft up to £50,000, and had in addition entered into bonds with two at least of these corporations for the due performance by the company of its contracts with them. In the same month of July, 1948, an accountant, Mr. James Cox, subscribed and paid for five hundred of the company's shares, and subsequently increased his holding to 1,500 shares. He and the applicant were appointed directors of the company along with a Mr. Steane, and at a later day two other persons joined the board. Shortly afterwards, i.e., in or about September, 1948, the company was in urgent need of further financial assistance which the bank was at first unwilling to provide on any terms, but it was ultimately arranged that the limit of the existing overdraft of £50,000 should be increased by £2,500 on a guarantee given by the applicant to cover the increase. Towards the end of February, 1949, the directors came to the conclusion that, unless further finance could be obtained, the company would be unable to complete its contracts. The bank was found to be unwilling to help in any way, and at a meeting of the directors of the company held on Mar. 2, 1949, a resolution was passed authorising Mr. Cox, the accountant and director, to borrow money on behalf of the company on the security of a debenture. It is suggested by the liquidator that this was an illegal delegation of the company's borrowing powers, but that seems to me to be far too narrow a view to take of the matter. On or about Mar. 15, 1949, the company, in the ordinary course of its business, issued seven cheques in settlement of accounts owing by the company for sums amounting in all to £696 9s. 11d. Two days later, on Mar. 17, 1949, the applicant was informed by Mr. Cox that the bank would not honour the said seven cheques on presentation unless funds were provided for the purpose, and he, accordingly, agreed with Mr. Cox that he would, on the security of a debenture to be issued to him, advance this sum of £696 9s. 11d. forthwith and would make such further advances, not exceeding in all the sum of £5,000, as might be required to enable the company to continue to carry out its contracts, and on or about the same day the applicant, in pursuance of such agreement, handed to Mr. Cox his cheque for £696 9s. 11d., payable to the company's order. On the following day the applicant and Mr. Cox had an interview with the bank's branch manager. The applicant's cheque for £696 9s. 11d. was credited to the company, and the bank agreed to honour the said seven cheques on presentation. At the same interview the manager handed to the applicant a letter addressed to the company by the bank formally demanding payment of the amount of the company's overdraft, viz., £51,017 0s. 5d. On Mar. 22, 1949 (being the day on which the petition was presented) the company received from the applicant's solicitor the engrossment of a debenture to be sealed and issued to him. A meeting of directors had been arranged for that day, but it was not, in fact, held. There was a meeting on the following day, Mar. 23, but for some reason which it is difficult to discover, and which was certainly never explained to me, the matter was not dealt with at that meeting. However, on the next day, Mar. 24, a further meeting was held at 10 a.m., when a resolution was passed authorising the sealing and issuing of the debenture, which was done then and there. Previously, i.e., on Mar. 23, a further sum of £238 12s., urgently required for payment of wages, was advanced by the applicant to the company for that purpose. The serious consequences of a failure to pay wages to those engaged in a business of this kind are too obvious to need description. Returning to Mar. 24, the following further events occurred on that day. The applicant advanced a further sum of £975, part of which was required for wages. At 2.45 p.m. (after the debenture had been sealed and issued, and after the applicant's cheque for £975 had been paid to the credit of the company's account at the bank), the bank's petition for winding-up was served on one of the company's directors at the company's registered office. The applicant states, and I accept it as a fact, that no earlier intimation of the presentation of the petition had been received by the company or any of its directors. A further step in the proceedings was taken on Mar. 30, when the applicant advanced a final £950 to the company, partly for wages and partly for other purposes, admittedly less urgent and pressing. His case is obviously less easy with regard to that sum than to those advanced before he knew of the petition.

The result would appear to be as follows. The applicant's four advances amount to the aggregate sum of £2,860 1s. 11d., to which he seeks to add £28 14s. 9d. as the costs of the preparation and registration of the debenture, bringing his total claim to the sum of £2,888 16s. 8d. Under the provision of s. 227 the "disposition" (consisting of the issue of the debenture) is void unless I "otherwise order," and the question is whether or not I ought to do so. The section itself gives me no guidance whatsoever as to the principles on which I should act, nor do I get much assistance from Re Park Ward & Co., Ltd. (1), where the facts, though similar, were somewhat different. There, the whole of the advance was made for the payment of wages which would now give preferential rights by subrogation, and the creditor had, at the time he made the advance, full notice of the presentation of the petition. Howard (Sunbury), Ltd. (2), an unreported decision of ROXBURGH, J., on May 12, 1948, suggests that a distinction should be drawn between advances made for the purpose of preserving the company's property in praesenti and those intended to enhance its value in futuro, the applicant in that case, as I understand, being anxious to acquire the company's undertaking from the liquidator and desirous of improving it for his own ultimate benefit. Such an intention, consciously directed to the advantage, not of the company, but of the applicant, might well vitiate a claim such as the present, but no such suggestion could be made here. The applicant gave evidence before me on the liquidator's notice to cross-examine him, and I may say at once that I am completely satisfied as to his good faith and as to the single-minded purpose which actuated him throughout—which was (as he said) to keep the company going or to keep things going. There is no doubt that all the moneys were advanced on the footing that he should be secured, and there is no doubt that they went into the company's coffers. It is only as regards the final £950 that I feel any doubt, and at that point the question (raised, but not resolved, by ROXBURGH, J.) arises whether a disposition can be so severed as to be validated in part only. In such a case as the present I should have thought that each of the four advances could be treated as a separate "disposition," but it may be unnecessary for me to come to any final conclusion on the point to-day. Towards the end of the hearing, counsel for the liquidator appeared to be willing to concede the applicant's point as regards the first three advances and to confine his claim to the fourth advance, i.e., the £950. His case was based on the fact that part of the amount, after it was received by the directors, was used by them for making payments which were in no sense urgent or pressing, or wholly necessary to "keep the company going," in the applicant's phrase, but while that circumstance might give rise to claims by the liquidator against the directors, I fail to see how, in the circumstances of the present case, it can affect the rights inter se of the company and the applicant qua lender of the money. The applicant was, it is true, one of the directors and must be presumed to have known the purposes for which the money was required and on which it would probably be expended, and I can imagine cases in which a lender, knowing of an intended misapplication of his money, or suspicious of a scheme intended to defeat the rights of the general body of creditors, would fail to obtain any validation of his charge. This is, in my judgment, very far from being such a case. The liquidator took, among others, the point that part of the money said to have been provided for wages went in fact to the employees, not of the company, but of certain sub-contractors. There is, I think, nothing in this point. He has traced and explained in detail the destination of the moneys advanced by the applicant, and has suggested that the particulars should be analysed and a part, at least, of them treated as not covered by the charge. I think that it was the liquidator's duty to give the fullest information to the court. But the view which I take of my duty under the section (shared, to the best of my belief, by ROXBURGH, J.) is that each case must be dealt with on its own facts and particular circumstances (special regard being had to the question of the good faith and honest intention of the persons concerned), and that the court is free to act according to the judge's opinion of what would be just and fair in each case.

I have come to the conclusion that I ought in this case to order otherwise, as regards all the advances, and to make the order in the terms asked for by the summons, including the provision for adding the costs of the applicant to his security, following, in this respect, Re Park Ward & Co., Ltd. (1). The legislature, by omitting to indicate any particular principles which should govern the exercise of the discretion vested in the court, must be deemed to have left it entirely at large, and controlled only by the general principles which apply to every kind of judicial discretion. I have reviewed the facts of the present case somewhat at length because I think that such a review must usually be necessary whenever a case of this nature falls to be decided. The liquidator's costs of the application will be included in the costs of the liquidation.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors : S. A. Bailey & Co. (for the applicant) ; Wild, Collins & Crosse (for the liquidator).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Doubted by DENNING, L.J. MOLE v.
MOLE. [1950] 2 All E.R. 328.

Not followed. POOL v. POOL. [1951]
2 All E.R. 563.

BOSTOCK v. BOSTOCK.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Ormerod, J.), November 28, 29, December 2, 1949.]

Divorce—Evidence—Privilege—Meeting between parties and their solicitors with view to reconciliation—Admissibility of evidence of proceedings at meeting.

On the hearing of cross-petitions for divorce on the ground of desertion the husband sought to adduce evidence of what had taken place at a meeting between the parties and their solicitors at which a reconciliation was discussed. The wife objected to the evidence being given on the ground that what occurred at the meeting was privileged.

HELD: what took place at such a meeting was not to be taken as being without prejudice, and, consequently, privileged, if it was not specifically stated to be so, and, therefore, the evidence tendered was admissible.

McTaggart v. McTaggart ([1948] 2 All E.R. 754), explained and distinguished.

[AS TO COMMUNICATIONS "WITHOUT PREJUDICE," see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 13, pp. 703-705, para. 774 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 22, pp. 375-378, Nos. 3836-3860.]

Case referred to :

(1) McTaggart v. McTaggart, [1948] 2 All E.R. 754 ; [1949] P. 94 ; [1949] L.J.R. 82.

PETITION by the husband for divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion. The wife by her answer denied that she had deserted the husband and petitioned for a dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the husband's desertion. ORMEROD, J., gave judgment for the wife. The case is reported only on a point relating to the admissibility of evidence of a meeting held to effect a reconciliation between the parties and their solicitors.

W. Latey for the husband.

Roger Ormrod for the wife.

ORMEROD, J., stated facts which are immaterial to the present report and continued : At the end of November, 1945, there was a meeting between the husband and the wife and their solicitors to discuss a reconciliation. Counsel for the husband tendered evidence of the events which took place at that meeting, but counsel for the wife objected to that evidence being called on the ground that what occurred at the meeting was privileged. In support of his contention he cited McTaggart v. McTaggart (1). There a husband and a wife who had been separated arranged to see the probation officer with a view to becoming reconciled. The attempt was not successful and there were proceedings at which evidence was given by the probation officer to corroborate the evidence of one of the spouses regarding what had taken place at the interview. The matter came before the Court of Appeal, who held that in the particular circumstances the evidence of the probation officer was not privileged and that he could give the evidence. It was pointed out, however, that the reason why he could do so was that the privilege did not attach to him personally, but attached to the two spouses, and they, having themselves given evidence as to what had happened at the interview, had clearly waived the privilege. COHEN and DENNING, L.JJ., in the course of their judgments, said that, had the privilege not been waived, clearly there would have been privilege, because a meeting arranged with the probation officer for the purposes of reconciliation must be presumed to be without prejudice.

On the strength of that authority counsel for the wife asked me to say that the interview in the present case between the two parties and their solicitors was without prejudice and, therefore, privileged, as it was clearly arranged for the specific purpose of effecting a reconciliation. I do not think that the learned lords justices in McTaggart v. McTaggart (1) ever intended to go so far as to say that a meeting arranged by the parties to a matrimonial dispute to discuss a possible reconciliation must be taken to be without prejudice if it is not specifically stated so to be. It may be that in McTaggart v. McTaggart (1) the meeting was without prejudice, but I think that what the learned lords justices were saying there was that that particular meeting, which was not only a meeting to arrange a reconciliation, but one at which a probation officer was present to assist in achieving that purpose, must be taken to be without prejudice because that combination of circumstances compelled that inference* to be drawn. Otherwise, if the parties discussed their affairs with the probation officer, with the knowledge that afterwards evidence could be given of the conversations in a court, they would be much less likely to be frank with him, and, therefore, his function would be much less likely to be successful. That is the view I take and, therefore, I admit this evidence.

[HIS LORDSHIP then found that the husband was the party in desertion and granted a decree nisi to the wife.]

Decree nisi with costs.

Solicitors : Gibson & Weldon, agents for Hand, Morgan & Co., Stafford (for the husband) ; Layton & Co. (for the wife).

[Reported by R. HENDRY WHITE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

GOWER v. GOWER.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Barnard, J.), November 30, 1949.]

Divorce—Costs—Security for wife's costs—Trial of issue after decree absolute—Jurisdiction of court to order security—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 523/L.9), r. 74 (2).

A

By the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 74 (2) it is provided: "After the registrar's certificate under r. 30 has been granted, or with leave at an earlier stage of the cause, a wife who is petitioner or has filed an answer may apply for security for her costs of the cause up to the hearing and of and incidental to such hearing."

B

In 1941 a wife obtained a decree nisi for the dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's adultery. In 1942 the decree was made absolute and a consent order of £130 a year for the wife's maintenance was made. On July 28, 1948, the husband applied to vary the maintenance by decreasing its amount on the ground that the wife was living in adultery, and on July 14, 1949, PILCHER, J., directed that an issue be tried as to the wife's adultery. The wife applied to the registrar for an order for security of the costs of the issue.

C

HELD: the costs for security for which the wife applied could not be said to be "of and incidental to" the hearing of the divorce suit eight years previously within the meaning of r. 74 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, and, accordingly, the wife was not entitled to security thereunder, but the rule was not exclusive, the court had an inherent jurisdiction to order security for a wife's costs in a proper case, and, on the facts, the present was a proper case for the exercise of the jurisdiction.

D

[AS TO SECURITY FOR WIFE'S COSTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 724-727, paras. 1107-1115; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 421-424, Nos. 4277-4307.]

E

Cases referred to:

- (1) Johnstone v. Johnstone, [1929] P. 165; 98 L.J.P. 76; 140 L.T. 451; Digest Supp.
- (2) King v. King, [1943] 2 All E.R. 253; [1943] P. 91; 112 L.J.P. 89; 169 L.T. 251; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Roberston v. Robertson and Favagrossa, (1881), 6 P.D. 119; 51 L.J.P. 5; 45 L.T. 237; 27 Digest 472, 4960.
- (4) Sheppard v. Sheppard, [1905] P. 185; 74 L.J.P. 102; 93 L.T. 443; 27 Digest 423, 4297.
- (5) Williams v. Williams, [1929] P. 114; 98 L.J.P. 40; 140 L.T. 383; Digest Supp.

F

G

APPEAL by the wife from an order of the registrar, refusing an application by her for security for the costs of an issue arising out of maintenance proceedings. BARNARD, J., allowed the appeal and ordered that the matter be referred back to the registrar. The facts appear in the judgment.

P. M. O'Connor for the wife.

H

Crispin and Stuckey for the husband.

BARNARD, J.: This is an appeal by a wife from an order of the registrar dated Oct. 31, 1949, refusing to order the husband to secure a sum of money for her costs of an issue arising out of maintenance proceedings. On July 18, 1941, the wife obtained a decree nisi for the dissolution of her marriage with the husband on the ground of his adultery, together with an order for the custody of the only child of the marriage. The decree was made absolute on May 4, 1942. On Dec. 4, 1942, a consent order was made for the maintenance of the wife at the rate of £130 per annum less tax, and on Mar. 10, 1948, an interim order for the maintenance of the child was made at the rate of £1 per week as from May 3, 1947. On July 28, 1948, the husband filed a notice of application to vary the maintenance by decreasing its amount on the ground that, inter alia, the wife had been and still was living in adultery. On July 14, 1949, PILCHER, J., ordered that an issue be tried as to the adultery of the wife with oral evidence and by a judge alone. The wife, who was the defendant in the issue, then applied to the registrar for an order for security of the costs of such issue, and, as I have stated, the registrar dismissed her application.

Counsel for the wife contended (i) that this application came within the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 74 (2), and (ii) that the court had an inherent jurisdiction to order security in such a case. In support of his first contention he argued that the application was covered by the words "of and incidental to such hearing." I reject this argument. The word used in the rule is "hearing" and not "decree," and I fail to see how an application to vary maintenance some eight years after the hearing of the divorce case can possibly be "of and incidental to such hearing."

As to the second point, I have come to the conclusion that r. 74 is not exclusive and that the court has an inherent jurisdiction to order security for a wife's costs in proper cases. In Johnstone v. Johnstone (1) the husband was ordered to give security for his wife's costs of an issue as to domicile and LORD HANWORTH, M.R., stated in the course of his judgment ([1929] P. 172) that :

"The old rules of the ecclesiastical courts were preserved by s. 22 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and are now reproduced by s. 103 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. The result is that the old rule as to the costs of the spouses is still applicable to costs in the Divorce Division, and the husband has to make provision for costs of the wife to enable her to contest the issue."

Although both he and LAWRENCE, L.J., based their decisions on the ground that an issue as to domicile came within the wording of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, r. 91, the rule then applicable to security for a wife's costs, GREER, L.J., differed from the other members of the court as to the construction to be placed on that rule and stated that he thought that the court had inherent jurisdiction to deal with the costs of an issue of that kind, such jurisdiction being derived from the practice of the ecclesiastical courts, and, therefore, in his opinion, there was jurisdiction in the registrar to make the order which he had refused to make. In King v. King (2) the full Court of Appeal held that it had jurisdiction to order a husband to give security for the costs of his wife in an appeal by him against the dismissal by a judge of the Divorce Court of a petition for divorce brought by him against his wife. SCOTT, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, stated ([1943] 2 All E.R. 254) that the practice both before and after the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, had always been only to give the wife security in cases where she had not sufficient estate to pay her own costs and referred with approval to the passage in LORD HANWORTH's judgment in Johnstone v. Johnstone (1) which I have already quoted.

It is important to consider the object of security. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., stated (6 P. 122, 123) in Robertson v. Robertson (3) :

"Now on principle it is plain that the whole foundation of the rule depends on the liability of the husband to pay the necessary and fair costs of the wife's defence. I take it that that rule is founded on the old English law, which gave the whole personal property of the wife to the husband, and gave him also the income of her real estate ; so that in the absence of a settlement (which, as we all know, is a comparatively modern introduction) she was absolutely penniless, and, therefore, the ecclesiastical court not only provided for the costs of her defence, but also gave her alimony pendente lite so as to provide for her maintenance . . . I have given what I believe to be the true view of the origin of the liability of the husband ; but I am not oblivious to the nobler view, if I may so express it, held in the House of Lords, that no gentleman, indeed, no man of right feeling would wish that his wife should not have the means of fairly investigating and fairly defending herself against so odious a charge as that of adultery. Really, if there had not been, as I do believe there is, the common and pecuniary reason for fixing the husband with the costs, I think that that reason ought to be sufficient to all right-minded men."

The principle enunciated by SIR GEORGE JESSEL was before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, but none the less remains unaffected by it, for, after the passing of that Act, SIR GORELL BARNES, P., in the course of his judgment in Sheppard v. Sheppard (4), said ([1905] P. 190) :

"It is true that the discretion and the way in which it is exercised originates in the fact that a wife has, at common law, a right to pledge her husband's credit for necessities ; but that is only in part the foundation for the way in which this court exercises its discretion in cases such as this, the real point being that it is impossible to do justice if a woman who is attacked cannot put the court in possession of all the facts, and fight her case and deal with it properly, unless she has funds to do it. And this is equally true in a case where the wife wishes to have relief on the ground of her husband's misconduct. That this does not rest solely on common law principles may be illustrated by the fact that it applies in cases where the woman is not really the wife, as, for instance, where it is alleged that there has been a bigamous marriage."

Further, HILL, J., in Williams v. Williams (5), no doubt having in mind the effect of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, stated ([1929] P. 118) :

"The old basis for the rule, namely, that all the wife's property on marriage passes to the husband, and therefore the husband alone can foot the bill, has gone altogether, and now you must consider whether in the circumstances the wife can foot the bill, and it is a very important matter to consider whether the solicitor can conduct the business without something in court to pay him up to setting down and without security."

I am satisfied in the present case that the wife has no means except the £130 per annum less tax to which she is entitled under the consent order for maintenance and the £1 per week she receives in respect of the child, apart from the fact that she may receive benefits, such as board and lodging from the man with whom she is alleged to be living in adultery, but as to this an issue has been directed. Counsel for the husband contends that since the decree absolute she is no longer the wife and the divorce suit has abated. It is true that she is no longer the wife, but for certain purposes, such as maintenance and custody of children, the divorce suit must be treated as in being and the wife as still retaining the status of wife. I, therefore, allow the wife's appeal, and, as I understand that the registrar dismissed her summons because he considered that he had no jurisdiction, the matter must be referred back to him to consider the question of security.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors : Arthur Robson (for the wife) ; Pengelly & Co. (for the husband).
[Reported by R. HENDRY WHITE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re MCGREAVY. Ex parte MCGREAVEY v. BENFLEET URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer and Harman, JJ.), November 7, 21, December 5, 1949.]

Bankruptcy—"Debt"—Arrears of rates—Arrears as basis for petition—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 4 (1), s. 33 (1).

M. and R. carried on a business in partnership on certain premises in respect of which they failed to pay to the B. council a large sum due to the council for rates. M. and R. committed an act of bankruptcy within the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (1) (a), by executing a deed of assignment of their property to a trustee for the benefit of their creditors. The council did not assent to the deed, and subsequently presented a bankruptcy petition against M. and R. On Sept. 28, 1949, a receiving order was made against M. and R. M. appealed on the ground that the debt alleged was not a good petitioning creditor's debt in law.

HELD : having regard to s. 33 (1) (a) of the Act of 1914, the sum due for rates was clearly a provable debt and a debt within the meaning of s. 4 (1) of the Act, and, therefore, it was a debt which would support a bankruptcy petition.

Liverpool Corpn. v. Hope ([1938] 1 All E.R. 492), explained.

Dictum of COCKBURN, C.J., in Ex parte Muirhead, Re Muirhead, (1876), (2 Ch.D. 25), not applied.

Re North Bucks Furniture Depositories, Ltd. ([1939] 2 All E.R. 549), considered.

[AS TO NATURE OF PETITIONING CREDITOR'S DEBT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 2, pp. 56-65, para. 69-75 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 4, pp. 113-116, Nos. 1025-1049.]

(1) Re Edgcome, Ex p. Edgcome, [1902] 2 K.B. 403 ; 71 L.J.K.B. 722 ; 87 L.T. 108 ; 5 Digest 1022, 8340.

(2) Liverpool Corpn. v. Hope, [1938] 1 All E.R. 492 ; [1938] 1 K.B. 751 ; 107 L.J.K.B. 694 ; 158 L.T. 215 ; 102 J.P. 205 ; Digest Supp.

(3) Ex p. Muirhead, Re Muirhead, (1876), 2 Ch.D. 22 ; 45 L.J.Bey. 65 ; 34 L.T. 303 ; 4 Digest 124, 1127.

(4) Re Debtor (No. 975 of 1937), Debtor v. Petitioning Creditor and Official Receiver, [1938] 2 All E.R. 530 ; Digest Supp.

(5) Re O'Gorman, Ex p. Bale, [1899] 2 Q.B. 62 ; 68 L.J.Q.B. 650 ; 80 L.T. 501 ; 4 Digest 124, 1128.

(6) Re Sacker, Ex p. Sacker, (1888), 22 Q.B.D. 179 ; 58 L.J.Q.B. 4 ; 60 L.T. 344 ; 4 Digest 113, 1019.

(7) Re Macoun, [1904] 2 K.B. 700 ; 73 L.J.K.B. 892 ; 91 L.T. 276 ; 4 Digest 112, 1013.

(8) Ex p. Harris, Re Lewis, (1876), 2 Ch.D. 423 ; 45 L.J.Bey. 71 ; 34 L.T. 261 ; 4 Digest 87, 789.

(9) Ex p. Jones, Re Jones, (1881), 18 Ch.D. 109 ; 50 L.J.Ch. 673 ; 45 L.T. 193 ; 4 Digest 29, 235.

(10) Re Hunter, (1879), 3 L.R. Ir. 465 ; 4 Digest 114, 10280.

(11) Re North Bucks Furniture Depositories, Ltd., [1939] 2 All E.R. 549 ; [1939] Ch. 69 ; 108 L.J.Ch. 275 ; 160 L.T. 523 ; 103 J.P. 207 ; Digest Supp.

(12) Huddersfield Police Authority v. Watson, [1947] 2 All E.R. 193 ; [1947] K.B. 842 ; [1948] L.J.R. 182 ; 177 L.T. 114 ; 111 J.P. 463 ; 2nd Digest Supp.

(13) Lloyd v. Heathcote, (1820), 2 Brod. & Bing 388 ; 5 Moore, C.P. 129 ; 4 Digest 114, 1029.

APPEAL by a debtor from a receiving order made on Sept. 28, 1949, by the registrar of the Southend County Court.

The petition was presented by the Benfleet Urban District Council to whom the debtor (and his business partner, who did not resist the petition, or now appeal against the order) owed a large sum in rates. The debtor in the present appeal argued that unpaid rates were not such a debt as would support a bankruptcy petition. The appeal was dismissed. The facts appear in the judgment of the court.

- A Aronson, K.C., M. V. S. Hunter and Sabin for the appellant debtor.
Christie, K.C., Caplan and Lloyd-Davies for the Benfleet Urban District Council.
C. W. Chandler for the Official Receiver.

Cur. adv. vult.

- Dec. 5. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment of the court. This is
 B an appeal from a receiving order made on Sept. 28, 1949, by the registrar of the Southend County Court against Francis Bernard McGreavey and Frederick Leslie Rundle, who are described in the order as "lately trading in co-partnership under the style or firm of McGreavy (sic.) & Rundle." The order was made with the consent of the debtor Rundle, and he is no party to this appeal, but McGreavey resisted the petition, though not, apparently, on any grounds now taken, and
 C he appeals against the order. At the hearing before us both the grounds of appeal stated in his notice of appeal dated Oct. 18, 1949, were abandoned, and application was made to us to allow a new and additional ground to be put forward, to wit, that "the debt alleged in the petition is not a good petitioning creditor's debt in law." These words are taken from a letter from the appellant's solicitors to the Official Receiver of Nov. 1, 1949. We permitted the appeal to D go forward on this ground.

- The petitioner in this case is the Benfleet Urban District Council, and the foundation of the petition is a large sum admittedly due to the council for rates on a stadium where the partnership business was formerly carried on. The act of bankruptcy was the execution by the debtors of an assignment of their property to a trustee for the benefit of their creditors. The council did not assent
 E to that deed, and there is no doubt that the act of bankruptcy is within the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (1) (a). The point now taken involves a novel issue which may be shortly stated. It is that the only remedy which a local authority has for the recovery of rates is the statutory remedy of distress, and that this is in fact an attempt, and the first attempt made for three hundred years, to enforce payment of rates by means other than the statutory means. The council
 F retort that there is no doubt that rates are a debt provable in bankruptcy, having, indeed, a certain priority under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, and they urge that, if a debt (as opposed to a liability) is provable, it will support a petition.

- Rates were first created by the statute 43 Eliz. c. 2 (the Poor Law Relief Act, 1601), which enacts that the churchwardens and householders appointed for the purpose shall raise weekly or otherwise by taxation of every inhabitant,
 G parson, vicar, and other and every occupier of lands, houses, and so on, in the parish any such competent sum as they think fit, and also competent sums of money for and towards the necessary relief of the lame, impotent, old, blind and such others being poor and not able to work. Section 2 of this statute authorises the overseers by warrant from two justices to levy the rates and arrears by distress and sale of the offender's goods. By the Distress for Rates
 H Act, 1849, s. 2, justices are empowered to issue a warrant of commitment against persons not having goods and chattels on which distress can be levied and to keep such persons in prison for three months. By the Money Payment (Justices Procedure) Act, 1935, s. 10, the power to issue a warrant for commitment is limited to cases where the failure to pay is found to have arisen from the wilful refusal or culpable neglect of the ratepayer, and the justices are empowered, where they decline to issue a warrant, to remit the payment of rates.

Turning now to the bankruptcy legislation, the Act of 1914, which alone is in force, by s. 1 (1) (a) provides as before mentioned the act of bankruptcy in this case. Section 3 provides who may present a petition, namely, for the present purpose, a creditor. Section 4 limits the nature of the debt, which must, by sub-s. (b), be a liquidated sum payable either immediately or at some certain future time. By s. 30 the debts and liabilities provable in bankruptcy are described, and sub-s. (8), which defines the word "liability," shows that a good many claims may be proved which could not support a petition. Section 33 (1) provides that there shall be paid "in priority to all other debts (a) . . . local rates due from the bankrupt." It is clear, therefore, that rates are a debt within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, because the last mentioned section speaks of "other" debts. That, however, it is said, does not conclude the question. We are reminded that under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 6, a debt, in order to support a petition, must be a debt "due at law or in equity," and it is said that these words must necessarily mean enforceable by action in a court of law or equity. Before the Act of 1869, an equitable debt was provable, but would not support a bankruptcy petition. The reason for this is not apparent. The position was changed by the Act of 1869. After the Judicature Act the words "due at law or in equity" disappeared owing to the fusion of the two systems, but it is said that the law remains the same and that one test of whether a debt will support a petition is whether it can be the subject-matter of an action in court.

The appellant debtor starts with the point that, since 1601, the only remedy ever expressly given for the enforcement of rates has been the remedy of distress, aided possibly by committal, though that has been held to be a punitive remedy and not a method of enforcement : Re Edgcombe (1). The debtor cites and relies on Liverpool Corpn. v. Hope (2) in the report of which ([1938] 1 K.B. 751) the headnote is in these terms:

"An action by a local authority to recover unpaid arrears of rates will not lie. The proper method of procedure in such a case is by an application for a distress warrant followed by distress. A local authority commenced proceedings in the county court for certain unpaid arrears of rates which they alleged to be due. The county court judge having held that on such a claim an action would lie, the respondent appealed :—Held (reversing the decision of the county court judge), that, a rate not being a common law liability but the creature of statute, this method of procedure was wrong, and the only remedy available was that laid down by statute, namely distress."

SLESSER, L.J., giving judgment, says ([1938] 1 All E.R. 494) :

"It is sufficient to say that it is really not suggested, and it could not be suggested, that any statute from the year 1601 down to the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, or any Act amending that Act, has ever provided the local authority with any remedy for the non-payment of rates other than the remedy by distress. In those circumstances the learned county court judge does not, as I understand it, suggest that there is any remedy at common law by action for the non-payment of rates, but he does suggest that an analogy should be drawn between a rating authority demanding rates and a landlord demanding rent . . . It is elementary that the right of a landlord to sue for his rent arises either out of some express covenant or contract or out of tenure. There is no such relationship, there is no such contract, as between the local authority and the ratepayer, and the whole analogy is unsound."

Earlier he had said (ibid.) :

"As to the first ground [of appeal], which appears on the face of it to be an ordinary common law claim for debt, it is clear to my mind that the only remedy which is afforded to a local authority entitled to rates is the remedy of distress."

Now, of course, if that be the whole law on the subject, there is an end of the matter. It seems to us, however, that the lord justice was, in fact, addressing his mind only to the question before him, namely, whether a remedy by action was available, and his decision merely negatives this.

The debtor further relies on Re Muirhead (3). That was a case in which the Court of Appeal held that a husband in a divorce suit, in whose favour the Divorce Court had made an order that the damages against the co-respondent should be paid to him on his undertaking to lodge the money recovered in court, could not support a bankruptcy petition. In our judgment, the true ratio decidendi of that case rests on the opinion of the court that the money was not due to the petitioner, who was merely a kind of conduit pipe appointed by the court to collect money to which he had no claim himself. That is the view of the decision recently expressed by SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., in Re a Debtor (No. 975 of 1937) (4) ([1938] 2 All E.R. 533). COCKBURN, C.J., does, however, say in Muirhead's case (3) (2 Ch.D. 25) :

“Now in order to constitute a good petitioning creditor's debt, you must have that which may be the immediate subject of an action at law or suit in equity.”

This is clearly an echo of the Act of 1869 then in force. MELLISH, L.J., after referring (ibid., 27) to the same words “debt due either at law or in equity,” founds himself on the view that the debt must be payable to the petitioner. This last view was enough to decide the question, and the statement of COCKBURN, C.J., above quoted was, in our judgment, obiter dictum. In Re O'Gorman (5), WRIGHT, J., accepted the decision in Muirhead's case (3), but held that a sum ordered to be paid to a petitioner in divorce was a good provable debt. That was all he was called on to decide. Re Sacker (6) also cited to us, must, having regard to the observations in Re Macoun (7) ([1904] 2 K.B. 703), be taken to be authority only for the view that a receiver as such is not a “creditor,” even though there be an order for payment of a balance to him. It follows that, unless he has some other right (e.g., if he be the holder of a bill of exchange entitling him to take action in his own name), he cannot support a bankruptcy petition : secus a receiver who has a personal right to sue: cf. Ex p. Harris (8).

All these cases, however, still leave us without an example which satisfies us that there can be a provable debt (as opposed to a liability) due to the petitioner, and not merely payable to him on behalf of another, which will not support a bankruptcy petition. As we have said, there are many liabilities provable which will not support a petition, but that is not the same thing. The instance of a statute-barred debt was advanced to us, but that seems to us to be in essence an unenforceable liability rather than a debt. It may, it is true, be used as a shield by way of set off, or give a right of retainer, but it is not a debt in respect of which any active step can be taken. Again, we were referred to infants' debts which will not support a petition (Ex p. Jones (9) ), but the reason stated (18 Ch.D. 120) by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., for that decision was that money owing by an infant was not a legal debt, but only (where the infant has acted fraudulently) a liability in equity to pay a sum of money.

We do not see why, in the face of the express words of the Bankruptcy Act, which show beyond doubt that rates are a provable debt, they will not support a petition merely because they cannot be sued for by action at law. This can only be so if rates are not a “debt” within s. 4 of the Act, and, in our judgment, they must be a “debt” within that section, having regard to the fact that they are manifestly debts within s. 33. To hold otherwise would be to construe one word in two senses in different parts of the same statute. We were referred by counsel for the debtor to an Irish case, Re Hunter (10), in which the headnote (3 L.R.Ir. 465) is as follows :

“The statute 12 & 13 Vic., c. 91, providing for the collection of rates in the city of Dublin, makes the Collector-General a creditor, and empowers him to sue in his own name for arrears of rates as a debt due to and vested in him; and therefore he is entitled to avail himself of the procedure in bankruptcy subsequently provided for the benefit of creditors in general."

Counsel invited us to take the view that it was only because of the terms of the special Act in that case that the Collector-General of Rates in the City of Dublin could present a petition. The case turns on the construction of the Irish Act, but it does no more than show that the collector was a creditor and carries us, we think, no further. A

Counsel for the debtor made the further point that rates could not be the subject of a bankruptcy notice because no judgment could be obtained for them, and that the local authority must, therefore, wait till the debtor committed some act of bankruptcy independent of the volition of the creditor, and argued that this showed that a species of debt of this special kind was not a debt within s. 4. This point may well, in our judgment, explain the absence of precedent for a petition of this sort, but has no further relevance. It was further objected that, as no attempt to levy distress had been made in this case, the debt was not liquidated, because of the justices' power to remit under the Act of 1935, but, in our judgment, there is nothing in this. The local authority is under no obligation to apply for a warrant, and if that step be not taken, the power to remit does not arise. B C

The council relied chiefly on the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33, already referred to, and on the analogous legislation in the Companies Acts, and a decision under the Companies Act, 1929, of CROSSMAN, J., in Re North Bucks Furniture Depositories, Ltd. (11), where he held that a local authority could petition to wind-up a limited company for unpaid rates. The learned judge there founded himself merely on the words of the Companies Act, 1929, s. 170, which provides that a "creditor" may petition. He held that, having regard to the priority section in the Act (s. 264), rates must be a debt, and the person to whom the debt was owed must be a creditor within the meaning of s. 170. This legislation is exactly parallel to the bankruptcy legislation in this respect, and the case is, we think, on all fours with the present, though not binding on us as a Divisional Court: see per LORD GODDARD, C.J., in Police Authority for Huddersfield v. Watson (12). It would, however, be a lamentable anomaly if it were the law that arrears of rates were a good debt on which to found a petition for winding-up a limited company, but not a good debt to found bankruptcy proceedings if the debtor happened to be an unincorporated association. The council further relied on Lloyd v. Heathcote (13), but that case only shows that the court considered rates to be a debt, and the collector a creditor, within the meaning of the bankruptcy law, notwithstanding the fact that the collector could not sue. It is no authority for the proposition that a petition can be founded on a debt for rates, and carries the council no further, for none can deny that a rate now is a debt in bankruptcy so far as proof is concerned. D E F G

For these reasons, while we recognise that this may be a novelty in bankruptcy law, and we have hesitated long, having regard to the Official Receiver's statement to us that there is no record of a petition based on rates in the bankruptcy records, we are of opinion that there is no escape from the language of the Act of 1914, and that this is such a debt as will support a petition in bankruptcy. We, accordingly, dismiss the appeal. H

Appeal dismissed with costs. Costs of the Official Receiver to be added to his costs, charges and expenses payable out of the estate.

Solicitors: Percy Haseldine & Co. (for the debtor); Zefferitt, Heard & Morley Lawson, agents for Heard & Coleman, Hadleigh, Essex (for the Benfleet Urban District Council); Solicitor to the Board of Trade (for the Official Receiver).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

HAMBLIN v. HAMBLIN (by her Guardian).

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Ormerod, J.), November 22, 1949.]

Divorce—Insanity—Incurable unsoundness of mind—Period of “care and treatment”—Detention in approved hospital in pursuance of order made under Lunacy Act, 1890—Quarterly returns by medical officer not made within prescribed time—Returns not sent to Board of Control within prescribed time—Effect on detention order—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 176 (d) (as amended by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 2)—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 3 (a)—Mental Treatment Rules, 1930 (S.R. & O., 1930, No. 1083), r. 126 (1), (3) (as amended by the Mental Treatment (Emergency Provisions) Rules, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 1095)).

From Apr. 25, 1930, the wife had been detained in an approved hospital under an order made under the Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 24 (3). She had been visited quarterly by the medical officer of the hospital, as required by s. 202 (1) of the Act of 1890, but the medical officer had failed to make his returns within the time prescribed by the Mental Treatment Rules, 1930, r. 126 (1), and the returns were not sent to the Board of Control within the time prescribed by r. 126 (3) (as amended by the Mental Treatment (Emergency Provisions) Rules, 1940). On a petition by the husband for divorce on the ground that the wife was incurably of unsound mind and had been continuously under care and treatment since Apr. 25, 1930, it was contended on behalf of the wife that the neglect to comply with the provisions of the Mental Treatment Rules, 1930, r. 126, brought to an end the order of Apr. 25, 1930, and, therefore, the wife had not been “continuously under care and treatment for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition,” as required by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 176 (d), as amended by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 2.

HELD : neglect to comply with the provisions of the Mental Treatment Rules, 1930, r. 126 (1) and (3), did not in any way invalidate or bring to an end the order of Apr. 25, 1930, and, therefore, the wife remained subject to the order and continued to be under “care and treatment,” within the meaning of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 176 (d), as amended by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 2, and as defined by s. 3 (a) of the Act of 1937, and the husband was entitled to a decree nisi.

[AS TO DIVORCE ON GROUND OF INSANITY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., 1949 Supplement, Divorce, para. 981.]

PETITION by the husband for divorce on the ground that the wife was incurably of unsound mind and had been continuously under care and treatment since Apr. 25, 1930.

In 1930 the wife was admitted, under the Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 24, to the Fulham Hospital, and later was transferred to the Tooting Bee Hospital where she remained up to the present time. The necessary formalities were complied with when the admission took place and when the order of detention, under s. 24 (3) of the Act, was made on Apr. 25, 1930, but it was contended by counsel on her behalf that she had not been “continuously under care and treatment for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition,” as required by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 176 (d), as amended by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 2, because the provisions of the Mental Treatment Rules, 1930, r. 126, were not complied with.

By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 3 : “For the purposes of s. 176 of [the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925], as amended by this Act, a person of unsound mind shall be deemed to be under care and treatment (a) while he is detained in pursuance of any order . . . under the Lunacy and Mental Treatment Acts, 1890 to 1930 . . .” By the Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 202 (1) (as amended by the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, s. 20 (4) and (5) ), every rate-aided person of unsound mind not in an institution for persons of unsound mind “shall once in every quarter of a year . . . be visited . . . if resident in a workhouse, by the medical officer of the workhouse.” By the Mental Treatment Act, 1930, s. 19 (1), where a person of unsound mind is liable under the Act of 1890 to be detained in a workhouse, he may be detained instead in an approved hospital, subject to the same provisions of the Lunacy Acts, 1890 to 1922, as if he were in a workhouse. By the Mental Treatment Rules, 1930, r. 126 (1), within seven days of the last day of each quarter “each . . . medical officer of a . . . hospital approved under s. 19 of the Act of 1930 shall make a return of all rate-aided persons of unsound mind who during the preceding quarter were visited by him under s. 202” of the Act of 1890. By r. 126 (3) (as amended by the Mental Treatment (Emergency Provisions) Rules, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 1095) ) : “Within two clear days after the receipt of the return in respect of a quarter ending Mar. 31 the clerk shall make a copy thereof and send the return to the Board [of Control].”

The visits required by s. 202 (1) of the Act of 1890 had been duly made by the medical officer, but the returns had not always been made within the time prescribed by r. 126 (1), and were not sent to the Board of Control within the time prescribed by r. 126 (3), although they were sent at some subsequent time. ORMEROD, J., now held that the failure to make the returns within the time prescribed did not invalidate or bring to an end the order of Apr. 25, 1930, for the “care and treatment” of the wife, and he granted the decree nisi.

King Anningson for the husband.

Horner for the wife.

ORMEROD, J. : I think it is clear that in this case I should grant a decree. [After stating the facts, HIS LORDSHIP dealt with the relevant statutory provisions, and continued :] The only question that arises is whether the fact that the returns were not made and sent to the Board of Control within the prescribed time has the effect of bringing to an end the period of “care and treatment” under the order of Apr. 25, 1930, or whether, in spite of the neglect of the medical officer to make his returns within the prescribed time, the order still remains in force and, therefore, the “care and treatment” continue. I see nothing in r. 126 to lead me to think that, if the provisions of the rule are not complied with, the person affected ceases to be subject to the original order that was made. I think that, had it been the intention of those framing the Mental Treatment Rules, 1930, that that should be so, it would have been clearly expressed, because there is the plain statutory provision in s. 24 of the Act of 1890 setting out the circumstances in which an order shall be made and the effect of an order when it is made. Therefore, I am satisfied that the neglect of the medical officer to make the returns within the prescribed time does not in any way invalidate or bring to an end the order which was made, and which has been in force for some years, for the “care and treatment” of the wife. I am not in any way excusing the neglect of the medical officer in question to make the prescribed returns. The rules are made for the protection of the patients in the hospital or the asylum, as the case may be, and, therefore, it is of the highest importance that the returns should be made and that they should be complied with strictly so that the patients and their relatives may have access to the returns and be satisfied that the interests of the patients are being looked after, as the law of the country provides that they should, but I do not think that, in the event of neglect to comply with one of the rules, it follows that an order which has been made should come to an end. Therefore, I am satisfied that, so far as the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation)

Act, 1925, s. 176 (d) (as amended by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 2), is concerned, the conditions have been complied with and this is a proper case for a decree nisi to be made.

Decree nisi granted. The wife's costs to be paid by the husband, and an order for maintenance of the wife.

Solicitors : Lewis-Barnes, Wheeler & Co. (for the husband) ; The Official Solicitor (for the wife).

[Reported by R. HENDRY WHITE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

B

NOTE.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT, 1948 : PRACTICE.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Cassels, JJ.), December 12, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Corrective training—Preventive detention—Supervision order—Previous convictions—Admission—Need to caution prisoner—Notice of intention to prove conviction—Need to give notice to produce notice—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 21 (1) ; s. 22 (1) ; s. 23 (1).

D Case referred to :

(1) R. v. Turner, [1910] 1 K.B. 346 ; 79 L.J.K.B. 176 ; 102 L.T. 367 ; 74 J.P. 81 ; 14 Digest 482, 5258.

STATEMENT BY THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.

E LORD GODDARD, C.J. : I want to mention two matters of practice under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, with regard to ss. 21-23. I am told that certain chief officers of police have raised the question whether, when they serve notice on the prisoner of previous convictions and invite him to say whether he admits them or not, it is necessary to administer a caution. In the opinion of the court it is not necessary that any caution should be administered when the police are serving the appropriate notices.

F The other point is that I am told there has been an inquiry from quarter sessions, or a point has been raised at a certain borough quarter sessions, whether or not a police officer can give evidence of the contents of the notice that he serves on the prisoner without giving a notice to produce it. I am surprised this question should have been raised because I thought it was a well known rule of evidence relating to documents that no notice to produce the notice ever

G need be given. The classic case, of course, is a notice to quit where an action is brought to recover possession of land. No notice to produce the notice is ever necessary, and, if authority were wanted, it was so expressly ruled by this court in R. v. Turner (1), in which CHANNELL, L.J., pointed out that, if you had to give notice to produce the notice, you would have to give notice to produce the notice to produce, and so ad infinitum. If ever the question is raised again,

H chairmen of quarter sessions can rest assured that it is not necessary to give notice to produce the notice which has been served on the prisoner.

R. v. GREEN.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Cassels and Pritchard, JJ.), December 5, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Trial—Irregularity—Communication from jury to judge—Answer given in absence of prisoner.

At the conclusion of the trial of the appellant on a charge of receiving stolen property, the jury, having retired to consider their verdict, sent to the recorder a written note in which they asked a question relating to the case. The recorder received and answered the note in his private room, without returning to court, and so the contents of the communication were not made known to the prosecution or to the appellant or his counsel.

HELD : any communication between a jury after their retirement and the presiding judge, even though it may be purely immaterial, must be read out in open court and the answer given, in the presence of the prosecution and the accused person ; this procedure had not been followed ; and the conviction must be quashed.

[AS TO COMMUNICATIONS WITH A JURY OUT OF COURT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 19, p. 312, para. 650 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 30, pp. 236-237, Nos. 312-327.]

Case referred to :

- (1) R. v. Bodmin Justices, Ex parte McEwen, [1947] 1 All E.R. 109 ; [1947] K.B. 321 ; [1947] L.J.R. 338 ; 111 J.P. 47 ; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant, who was convicted at Bolton Quarter Sessions of receiving stolen cloth valued at £7,000, based his appeal on the fact that, unknown to him written communications had passed between the jury and the recorder while the jury were in their room considering their verdict. The Court of Criminal Appeal allowed the appeal and quashed the conviction.

H. Lever for the appellant.

W. G. Morris for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant was convicted before the recorder of Bolton of receiving 60,947 yards of cloth, valued at more than £7,000. There can be no doubt that on the evidence the conviction was amply justified, but, unfortunately, the recorder made an error. After the jury were enclosed, they sent him a communication which he received in his private room and then sent an answer to the jury in their room without coming into court and disclosing what was the question which the jury had put, or what was his answer thereto. He says :

"The note from the jury was returned to them. It contained a simple question (the exact terms I do not remember) with which I had dealt in my summing-up. I considered whether it was necessary to call them back into court, but, as the question was, as I have said, so simple and had been dealt with, I did not deem it necessary."

This court and the Divisional Court have said on more than one occasion that any communication between a jury and the presiding judge must be read out in court, so that both parties, the prosecution and the defence, may know what the jury are asking and what is the judge's answer. Very likely, in the present case, the communication was quite immaterial, and, if the recorder had been able to tell this court what was the question asked by the jury, we might have been able to consider it, although nothing that I say now should be taken in any way to authorise a departure from the well-recognised rule that these matters must be dealt with openly in court. In R. v. Bodmin Justices, Ex parte McEwen (1), after the magistrates had retired to consider a case, they sent for a witness and asked him a question in their room. The question, they stated in their affidavit, was in the interests of the prisoner, but, as it was done in the absence of the prisoner, the Divisional Court felt that the only thing they could do was to bring up the conviction on certiorari and quash it. In the present case the court feels the same difficulty. The communication made to the recorder was not read out in court and the appellant, therefore, did not, and does not, know what it was. In these circumstances, however unfortunate it may be, the appellant having been shown to the satisfaction of the jury to have been guilty of a most serious crime, this court feels that there is no option but to quash the conviction.

Conviction quashed.

Solicitors : J. H. Milner, agent for Lewis & Co., Manchester (for the appellant); E. Fielding, Bolton (for the Crown).

[Reported by H. McL. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

NOTE.

Re KAVANAGH. Ex parte THE BANKRUPT v. JACKSON (THE TRUSTEE).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.),
December 5, 6, 1949.]

Bankruptcy—Property available for distribution—Claim by bankrupt for damage to reputation and property—Settlement of action—Apportionment of agreed damages—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 38 (a).

APPEAL by the trustee in bankruptcy from an order of the Divisional Court of the Chancery Division, dated June 27, 1949, reported [1949] 2 All E.R. 264.

On Nov. 7, 1947, K., on whom a bankruptcy notice had been served, issued a writ against her former solicitor, B., and alleged in her statement of claim that B. had divulged information given him in confidence as her solicitor, causing her irreparable loss of credit and reputation, and preventing her from managing her financial affairs so as to avoid bankruptcy. As special damages she claimed (i) cost of appearing at and defending the bankruptcy proceedings; (ii) costs of defending an originating summons issued by a bank in respect of a mortgage; and (iii) loss of profit in a business which she had carried on. On Nov. 11, 1947, a receiving order was made against K., and adjudication followed on Dec. 3, 1947. K.'s action against B. never came to trial, it being settled on Feb. 22, 1949, by the payment of £1,000 by B. together with K.'s party and party costs, and judgment being entered accordingly. The trustee in bankruptcy made no application in the action, although on Nov. 10, 1948, he wrote to K.'s solicitors saying that, in reliance on the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 38, he would claim any sum recovered in the action as assets in the bankruptcy. On Mar. 4, 1949, the trustee notified all persons concerned by letter that he claimed the £1,000. B. paid the £1,000 into the county court to abide the decision of the court and the trustee moved in the county court for a declaration that the whole of the money was payable to him. It was agreed at the hearing that K. would have become bankrupt in a fortnight or so irrespective of the acts of B.'s of which K. complained, and K. argued that, therefore, the acts of B. had not resulted in any damage to her property, but that the whole £1,000 was attributable to damage to her personally in respect of her credit or reputation and was payable to her. The trustee argued that there was, equally, no case to show damage to her credit or reputation in view of her impending bankruptcy, and that the £1,000 must vest in him under s. 38 (a).

HELD : in view of the facts that there was a judgment ordering the payment of the £1,000 in satisfaction of all claims and that there was no evidence that that sum should be allocated wholly to one head, the argument based on s. 38 (a) could not be upheld and the money should be divided equally between the two heads of claim.

Decision of the Divisional Court of the Chancery Division ([1949] 2 All E.R. 264), affirmed.

[AS TO ENTITLEMENT TO PROPERTY DEVOLVING ON BANKRUPT BEFORE DISCHARGE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 2, pp. 219-225, paras. 290-295 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 5, pp. 724-729, Nos. 6286-6323.]

Cases referred to :

(1) Addis v. Gramophone Co., Ltd., [1909] A.C. 488 ; 78 L.J.K.B. 1122 ; 101 L.T. 466 ; 17 Digest 78, 1.

(2) Wilson v. United Counties Bank, Ltd., [1920] A.C. 102 ; 88 L.J.K.B. 1033 ; 5 Digest 974, 7971.

The county court judge ordered the apportionment of the £1,000 as to £300 to K. personally, and £700 to her trustee in bankruptcy. The Divisional Court varied that order, apportioning the money equally between the bankrupt and the trustee.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors : Field, Roscoe & Co., agents for Cook, Fowler & Outhet, Scarborough (for the trustee) ; Gibson & Weldon, agents for Tasker, Hart & Munby, Scarborough (for the bankrupt).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Followed. BATER v. BATER. [1950] 2 All E.R. 458.

DAVIS v. DAVIS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), November 8, 9, 1949.]

Divorce—Cruelty—Standard of proof—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 178 (2) (as substituted by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 4).

By s. 178 (2) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, as substituted by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 4 : "If the court is satisfied on the evidence that—(i) the case for the petition has been proved . . . the court shall pronounce a decree of divorce."

A husband petitioned for divorce on the ground of his wife's cruelty. The learned judge found that cruelty had not been proved with the same degree of strictness as is required for proof of a criminal offence in a criminal court, and dismissed the husband's petition.

Per BUCKNILL and SOMERVELL, L.JJ. : the word "strict" is sufficiently apt to describe the measure and standard of proof required of a charge of cruelty in the Divorce Court, and it is unnecessary to introduce any question of the standard of proof required of a criminal charge.

Per DENNING, L.J. : s. 178 (2) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (as substituted) lays down a sufficient test by providing that a decree shall be pronounced if the court is "satisfied on the evidence that the case for the petition has been proved." That puts the burden on the person who makes the allegation, but it is not a burden of extraordinary weight. The same standard of proof as that required in criminal cases is not needed, to say nothing of the rules as to corroboration of the evidence of accomplices and so on which apply in criminal courts.

Per curiam : the charges of cruelty were proved beyond reasonable doubt, and the husband was entitled to a decree.

[AS TO CRUELTY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 649-654, paras. 954-962; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 281-293, Nos. 2513-2694.]

Cases referred to :

(1) Ginesi v. Ginesi, [1948] 1 All E.R. 373 ; [1948] P. 179 ; [1948] L.J.R. 892 ; 112 J.P. 194 ; 2nd Digest Supp.

(2) Churchman v. Churchman, [1945] 2 All E.R. 190 ; [1945] P. 44 ; 114 L.J. (P.) 17 ; 173 L.T. 108 ; 2nd Digest Supp.

(3) Lauder v. Lauder, [1949] 1 All E.R. 76 ; [1949] P. 277.

(4) Wright v. Wright, (1948), 77 C.L.R. (2) 191.

(5) Miller v. Minister of Pensions, [1947] 2 All E.R. 372 ; [1948] L.J.R. 203 ; 177 L.T. 536 ; 2nd Digest Supp.

(6) Mordaunt v. Moncreiffe, (1874), L.R. 2 Sc. & Div. 374 ; 43 L.J.P. & M. 49 ; 30 L.T. 649 ; 39 J.P. 4 ; 27 Digest 384, 3770.

(7) Loveden v. Loveden, (1810), 2 Hag. Con. 1 ; 27 Digest 296, 2730.

APPEAL by the husband from a judgment of BARNARD, J., dated Mar. 18, 1949, dismissing the husband's petition for divorce on the ground of his wife's cruelty.

The wife had brought a cross-charge in her answer for divorce on the ground of her husband's cruelty, which the learned judge had dismissed and against that decision there was no appeal. The Court of Appeal, in allowing the husband's appeal, indicated that they were not prepared to extend the decision in Ginesi v. Ginesi (1) to include cases of cruelty, and held that, on the evidence, cruelty had been established.

E. G. H. Beresford for the husband.
Cuddon for the wife.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of BARNARD, J., dismissing a petition by the husband for a divorce on the ground of the cruelty of his wife and dismissing the cross-petition of the wife in her answer for a decree of divorce on the ground of the husband's cruelty. There is no appeal by the wife from the latter decision, and the only question we have to consider is whether the judge was right in dismissing the husband's petition.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued :] The one point made by counsel for the husband is that the learned judge misdirected himself in saying that a charge of cruelty must be proved with the same degree of strictness as that with which a crime must be proved in a criminal court. That has caused a certain amount of discussion, and, no doubt, the question may require to be finally settled hereafter. I do not propose to attempt to settle it today, but I must draw attention to two cases. In Ginesi v. Ginesi (1) the Court of Appeal accepted the statement of LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Churchman v. Churchman (2) that so far, at any rate, as adultery is concerned the same strict proof is required as in criminal offences properly so called. It is true that in Churchman v. Churchman (2) LORD MERRIMAN used rather broader words than that because he spoke merely of a matrimonial offence, but in that case the court was dealing with the question of adultery. In Ginesi v. Ginesi (1), after quoting the dictum of LORD MERRIMAN in Churchman v. Churchman (2), WROTTESELEY, L.J., said ([1948] 1 All E.R. 376) :

"It will be observed, therefore, that the standard of proof with which we have been dealing in this case is there said by LORD MERRIMAN to apply to all matrimonial cases. All that it has been necessary to establish in the present case is that that standard applies to the proof of adultery, and since all the authorities cited to the court are cases of adultery, I only desire to say that it seems to me that today this court need only lay down that this standard of proof applies to cases of adultery, leaving it to other occasions to decide whether it is equally true of other matrimonial matters—in addition, of course, to connivance, which was the offence which LORD MERRIMAN must have had in mind in Churchman v. Churchman (2).”

It is interesting to note that in Lauder v. Lauder (3) LORD MERRIMAN said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 77) on the question of cruelty :

“ It is a commonplace to say that cases of that character need, as, indeed, do all cases of cruelty, to be strictly proved, and strictly proved in accordance with the well known definition of cruelty to which I will refer later.”

I myself think that the word “ strict ” is sufficiently apt to describe the measure and standard of proof required of a charge of cruelty and that it is unnecessary to introduce any question of the standard of proof required of a criminal charge. As a matter of interest, the matter has been considered in Australia in Wright v. Wright (4), where the High Court declined to follow Ginesi v. Ginesi (1). The decision in Wright v. Wright (4), however, is not binding on this court. The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 178 (2) (as substituted by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 4), requires that the court should be “ satisfied on the evidence that the case for the petition has been proved.” I understand that simply to mean that, if there is any reasonable doubt at the end of the case, the burden of proof has not been discharged and the decree ought not to be granted. If, on the other hand, the court is satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt, the petitioner is entitled to his decree. I mention this because it is possible that the learned judge in this case has set up a slightly too high standard of proof. [HIS LORDSHIP then dealt with the incidents of cruelty alleged by the husband and came to the conclusion that the charges of cruelty were proved beyond reasonable doubt and that the appeal should be allowed.]

SOMERVELL, L.J., concurred.

DENNING, L.J. : The judge directed himself in these words :

“ A charge of cruelty is a very serious charge to make and this court has said over and over again that the party who makes it must prove it beyond all reasonable doubt. It must be proved with the same degree of strictness as a crime is proved in the criminal court.”

If that has been said over and over again it must have been in very recent times, because, so far as I am aware, it was not said previously. If it is correct, it marks an important departure, for there is a considerable difference between the standard of proof required in criminal cases and that required in civil cases—a difference which I endeavoured to define in Miller v. Minister of Pensions (5) to which I need add nothing now.

In considering the standard of proof in divorce cases it is important to remember that it has been held by the House of Lords in Mordaunt v. Moncreiffe (6) that a suit for divorce is a civil and not a criminal proceeding. One would expect, therefore, to find that in the ordinary way the rules of civil procedure and not the rules of criminal procedure would apply to divorce suits. The standards and rules of the criminal courts have been built up out of the high regard which the law has for the liberty of the individual. No man's liberty is to be taken away unless the case is proved against him beyond reasonable doubt. The same stringency is not necessarily called for in divorce suits, or, at any rate, in divorce suits on the ground of cruelty or desertion, where the court is concerned, not to punish anyone, but to give statutory relief from a marriage that has broken down. I should have thought that s. 178 (2) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (as substituted by the Act of 1937) lays down a sufficient test by providing that a decree shall be pronounced by the court is "satisfied on the evidence that the case for the petition has been proved." That puts the burden of proof on the person who makes the allegation, but it is not a burden of extraordinary weight. It is a burden which exactly accords with SIR WILLIAM SCOTT's general rule in Loveden v. Loveden (7) where he said (2 Hag. Con. 3) :

"The only general rule that can be laid down upon the subject is, that the circumstances must be such as would lead the guarded discretion of a reasonable and just man to the conclusion."

That was the rule of the ecclesiastical courts and it was cited with approval by TUCKER, L.J., in Ginesi v. Ginesi (1). The court in that case clearly did not intend to introduce any new rule. Whatever may be the position in adultery cases, it is clear that Ginesi v. Ginesi (1) gives no authority to the Divorce Court to adopt in all divorce cases the standard of proof required in criminal cases, to say nothing of the rules as to corroboration of the evidence of accomplices and so on which apply in criminal courts.

There is a danger in asserting, what the statute does not assert, that the charge must be proved beyond reasonable doubt because of the temptation it affords to give effect to shadowy or fanciful doubts. That standard is a proper safeguard to persons accused in criminal cases, but if it were applied in divorce cases it might mean unjustly depriving an injured party of a remedy which he ought to have. Ginesi v. Ginesi (1) does not apply to cases of cruelty, and in such cases I do not think the court should require any higher standard than the statute itself requires, namely, that it should be "satisfied." The judge here seems to have required more. He required corroboration of acts of cruelty which were, I should have thought, proved clearly enough by the husband and of which the wife's explanation is so incredible that it ought to be rejected. If corroboration were required of all acts of cruelty, it would mean that many petitioners would be unable to prove their cases because it often happens that cruelty is committed in the privacy of the matrimonial home. The injuries caused by the acts are often the subject of corroboration, but not the acts themselves. It seems to me, therefore, that the learned judge misdirected himself as to the standard of proof. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed. No order as to costs on the husband's undertaking to comply with the order for security made below.

Solicitors : Dennes & Co., agents for Harvey, Mabey & Walker, Birmingham (for the husband) ; J. D. Daniell, Birmingham (for the wife).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

---

NOVELLO &amp; CO., LTD. v. ERNST EULENBURG, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., and Cohen, L.J.), November 29, 30, December 1, 2, 1949.]

Copyright—Emergency legislation—Enemy owner of copyright—Grant of interest in copyright to non-enemy person—Non-exclusive licence—Action by licensee for infringement—Rights of licensee—Joinder of owner—Dispensation—Discretion of court—Onus of proof that owner an enemy alien—Evidence—Existence of licence—Patents, Designs, Copyright and Trade Marks (Emergency) Act, 1939 (c. 107), s. 2 (1) (5).

By the Patents, Designs, Copyright and Trade Marks (Emergency) Act, 1939, s. 2 (1) : "Where—(a) an enemy or an enemy subject is, or has at any time since the beginning of Sept. 3, 1939, been, whether alone or jointly with any other person, . . . the owner of a copyright, or entitled to any other interest in a . . . copyright (not being merely the interest of a licensee), and (b) the [Comptroller-General of Patents, Designs and Trade Marks] is satisfied that it is in the interest of all or any of His Majesty's subjects that the rights conferred by . . . the copyright [should be] exercised . . . and that a person who is not an enemy or an enemy subject desires . . . to exercise the said copyright and is in a position so to do, the Comptroller may, on the application of that person, make an order granting to him . . . an interest in the copyright . . . either for the whole of the residue of the term of the . . . copyright, or for such less period as the Comptroller thinks fit. . . (5) A licensee under a licence granted under this section may institute proceedings for infringement in his own name as though he were . . . the owner of the copyright . . . so, however, that any person other than an enemy who, whether alone or jointly with any other person, is . . . the owner of the copyright . . . shall, unless the court in which the proceedings are taken thinks fit to direct otherwise, be made a party to the proceedings either (a) if he consents in writing thereto, as a plaintiff or (b) if he does not so consent as a defendant."

On Aug. 13, 1945, the Comptroller granted to the plaintiffs, a firm of publishers, a non-exclusive licence in the copyright of two tone poems by the composer, Richard Strauss. Under that licence the plaintiffs claimed an injunction and ancillary relief against the defendants who published two miniature scores of these works. The defendants pleaded, inter alia, that the owner of the copyright was not an enemy, and that the action was, therefore, not maintainable without his being joined. Before 1939 the owner of the copyright was a firm in Leipzig, the proprietor of which was Henry H., a Jew. In July, 1939, an official of the German Ministry of Information purported to sell that business on behalf of Henry H. In 1942 Henry H. died in enemy occupied territory. In 1949 his son Max H., a British subject, obtained letters of administration cum testamento annexo of the estate of Henry H. HARMAN, J., dismissed the action on the ground that it was incompetent through want of proper parties, and he declined to exercise in the plaintiffs' favour a discretion to dispense with the joinder of the Max H. who, he held, was the owner of the copyright.

HELD : (i) the Patents, Designs, Copyright and Trade Marks (Emergency) Act, 1939, s. 2 (5), was not a purely procedural provision, but gave a non-exclusive licensee such rights to sue for infringement as the owner of the copyright could have, but the licensee would hold the fruits of the action on behalf of the owner so far as those fruits related to a remedy appropriate only to the owner.

(ii) the onus of proof that the owner of the copyright was an enemy rested on the plaintiffs.

(iii) as Max H., the alleged owner, did not appear before the Comptroller, although he had had notice of the plaintiffs' application, the grant of the licence was not conclusive evidence of enemy ownership at the material date. The fact that he threatened opposition, but did not persist in it, was some evidence, but it could readily be displaced.

Hill v. Clifford, Clifford v. Timms, Clifford v. Phillips ([1907] 2 Ch. 236), distinguished.

(iv) in the circumstances the court ought to have exercised its discretion and dispensed on terms with the joinder of the alleged owner of the copyright.

[FOR THE PATENTS, DESIGNS, COPYRIGHT AND TRADE MARKS (EMERGENCY) ACT, 1939, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 32, p. 1170.]

Cases referred to :

(1) Hill v. Clifford, Clifford v. Timms, Clifford v. Phillips, [1907] 2 Ch. 236 ; 76 L.J.Ch. 627 ; 97 L.T. 266 ; 23 T.L.R. 601, C.A. ; affmd., [1908] A.C. 12, 15 ; 33 Digest 161, 450.

(2) Van Grutten v. Foxwell, Foxwell v. Van Grutten, [1897] A.C. 658 ; 66 L.J.Q.B. 745 ; 77 L.T. 170 ; 46 W.R. 426, H.L. ; 33 Digest 161, 447.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of HARMAN, J., dated July 29, 1949.

In an action for infringement of copyright brought by the plaintiffs under s. 2 (5) of the Patents, Designs, Copyright and Trade Marks (Emergency) Act, 1939, the defendants alleged inter alia that the owner of the copyright was a British subject and should have been joined in the action. At the trial HARMAN, J., refused an application of the plaintiffs to dispense with the joinder of the alleged owner of the copyright and dismissed the action as incompetent. The Court of Appeal, being of opinion that the discretion ought to have been exercised in favour of the plaintiffs, allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.

Shelley, K.C., and Aldous for the plaintiffs.

S. Pascoe Hayward, K.C., and Busse for the defendants.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. : This appeal against the dismissal of the plaintiffs' action by HARMAN, J., relates to the publication by the defendants of two miniature full orchestral scores of two tone poems by the composer, Richard Strauss, namely, "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel." The plaintiffs claimed in the action as licensees under the Patents, Designs, Copyright and Trade Marks (Emergency) Act, 1939, of the copyright in those two works, and they allege that the defendants are infringing the English copyright by publishing the two miniature orchestral scores I have mentioned. Many issues were raised on the pleadings, but HARMAN, J., dismissed the action on the ground that it was incompetent through want of proper parties and he declined to exercise in the plaintiffs' favour a discretion to dispense with the joinder of the particular person who, according to his judgment, was the owner of the copyright. On all the judge's findings throughout the case I find myself in entire agreement with him save on one point only. As will appear, the result of the difference of view is somewhat important in the ultimate result.

The plaintiffs are publishers of musical works. Before the last war they were the agents of a publishing business in Leipzig, called C. F. Peters. I understand that, according to German law as it then was, C. F. Peters as a business had no separate legal entity from the individual or individuals who owned it, but it will be convenient in the course of the judgment to refer to the business as "Peters." About 1930 or 1931 Peters acquired the English copyright in the musical works of Richard Strauss which I have mentioned. At that time Peters was wholly owned by one individual, a Mr. Henri Hinrichsen, a Jew. At some time thereafter he took into partnership or co-ownership of the business a son of the name of Max Hinrichsen who left his native land about 1937 and came to England. At all times material in this action he was a British subject by naturalisation. After the departure of his son Max, Henri Hinrichsen took into the business another son, Hans. In July, 1939, there occurred a transaction to which I shall have to allude hereafter. Leaving that for the moment aside, I will pursue the fortunes of Henri and Hans to their unhappy end. They both left Germany some time before February, 1940, for in that month they appeared in Brussels, then free from the German occupation which later overwhelmed it. Later in 1940 Hans died of typhoid fever in a French concentration camp. All his property, and, therefore, any interest that he then had in the business and assets of Peters, passed on an intestacy to his mother and father. The father, Henri, appears to have survived his wife, but probably he died in 1942. Apart from any effect that the transaction of July, 1939, had, Henri at his death was the sole proprietor of the business and the assets of Peters, including the English copyright in Richard Strauss' works. That English asset, therefore, until representation in this country was effected, would vest, I assume, in the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division. A B

However that may be, on Mar. 2, 1949 (which was after the present action had started) Max obtained letters of administration cum testamento annexo to his father's will, and, therefore, he now represents his father's estate, and any English rights and properties in copyright or otherwise that Henri had at his death indubitably are now vested in him as his father's personal representative. C By virtue of relation back that would be the position at the date of the writ in this action in May, 1948. I repeat, therefore, that, apart from the effect of the transaction of July, 1939, at the material dates—namely, those of the issue of the writ in this action and of the happenings complained of immediately before that event—the owner of the Strauss copyrights was a British subject. On the other hand, it may well be that when the war broke out in September, 1939, the owner was an enemy, for while Hans and Henri left Germany on some date before February, 1940, they may have done so after September, 1939. I do not think that for present purposes that matters, but I mention it as an introduction to the reading of the relevant sub-sections of the Patents, Designs, Copyright and Trade Marks (Emergency) Act, 1939, for it is under that Act that the plaintiffs D E derive their title. It was an Act designed to make, as the title suggests, "special provision with respect," among other things, to copyright, "to meet any emergency which may arise as a result of war." Section 2 empowers the Comptroller to grant licences under copyrights of enemies and enemy subjects. The words "enemy" and "enemy subject" are defined by reference to the earlier Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, but nothing for present purposes turns on those definitions and I shall not further allude to them. Section 2, so far as relevant, is F as follows :

"Where (a) an enemy or an enemy subject is, or has at any time since the beginning of September 3, 1939, been, whether alone or jointly with any other person . . . the owner of a copyright . . . and (b) the Comptroller is satisfied that it is in the interests of all or any of His Majesty's subjects that the rights conferred by . . . the copyright should be exercised . . . and that a person who is not an enemy or an enemy subject desires to exercise the said rights of copyright and is in a position so to do, the Comptroller may, on the application of that person make an order granting to him a licence . . . or granting an interest in the copyright . . . either for the whole of the residue of the term of the . . . copyright, or for such less period as the Comptroller thinks fit." G H

It was under that section that the plaintiffs made their application, and on Aug. 13, 1945, the licence sued on in this action was granted. The Act proceeds to provide for the exercise of the rights when they have been granted, but I will observe before I pass to the next sub-sections which are material that the licence may be on such terms as the Comptroller thinks fit, and, in particular, may be either an exclusive licence or a non-exclusive licence. In this case, beyond any question, the licence granted was a non-exclusive licence. Section 2 (4) provides :

A “An order granting a licence under this section shall, without prejudice to any other method of enforcement, operate as if it were embodied in a deed granting the licence which . . . the owner of the copyright . . . and all other parties having any interest therein had executed with full capacity so to do, and the order shall accordingly operate to take away from any such party any right in relation thereto the exercise whereof would be inconsistent with the existence of the licence in accordance with and subject to the terms on which it is granted.”

B Counsel for the defendants has relied on those words as casting a light on the proper interpretation to be given to sub-s. (5) which is of great importance for this case and is as follows :

C “A licensee under a licence granted under this section may institute proceedings for infringement in his own name as though he were . . . the owner of the copyright, . . . so, however, that any person other than an enemy who, whether alone or jointly with any other person, is . . . the owner of the copyright . . . shall, unless the court in which the proceedings are taken thinks fit to direct otherwise, be made a party to the proceedings, either—(a) if he consents in writing thereto, as a plaintiff, or (b) if he does not so consent, as a defendant.”

D The first question which arises under that sub-section is this. Counsel for the defendants has argued that sub-s. 5 is a purely procedural section and so is not effective to confer on a licensee any right of action which he would not have had, apart altogether from the Act, if he had sued and had joined with him the owner of the copyright. Applying the argument to this case, counsel for the defendants says that the plaintiffs are non-exclusive licensees, and, therefore, if the owner of the copyright had been a British subject and this Act had had no application, such a licensee could not have sued to restrain publication of the works which the defendants have published whether or not he joined the owner of the copyright, for, even if the non-exclusive licensee could complain to his copyright owner that some other person was being allowed to exercise rights in derogation of the grant alleged to have been made, nevertheless he, the non-exclusive licensee, would have no cause of action against that other person. It was argued that it would be wrong to construe this section so as to give a non-exclusive licensee rights and remedies which are far in excess of any rights and remedies that an ordinary non-exclusive licensee would have, and by way of emphasis it was said that, if the construction put forward by the plaintiffs is right, a person publishing in this country material in respect of which a licence has been given to other persons would be liable to be sued by all those other persons, each of them claiming his proper remedy, not as a licensee, but as copyright owner, including damages and delivery up of the infringing copies. HARMAN, J., on that point decided adversely to the argument of counsel for the defendants. He dealt with it quite briefly and, as I have already indicated, I agree with the conclusion at which he arrived. He said :

H “It seems to me that [s. 2 (5)] has exactly the effect which it is said to have, namely, that it gives to the licensee such rights as the owner of the copyright could have, and, therefore, the question is : Would C. F. Peters, suing here, have the right to stop Eulenburg and Eulenburg, Ltd., from reproducing the works in England ? As I have already said, I think he would.”

I agree that this sub-section should be given the meaning which the language conveys on its ordinary commonsense interpretation. It does not, of course, follow, (and counsel for the plaintiff has, indeed, conceded this point) that a licensee, recovering damages or getting some other remedy appropriate only to the owner of the copyright, can put in his own pocket or appropriate to himself the fruits of the action. They would be held by him on behalf of the true owner of the copyright, and that, which I think is inherent in the sub-section, seems to remove the main basis of the argument of counsel for the defendants. If Parliament had intended merely to say that a licensee under this Act should have the same rights of action as an ordinary licensee, but should not be embarrassed by the fact that he could not join the copyright owner because the copyright owner was an enemy, it would have been quite easy to say so, but, deliberately, as I assume, Parliament has vested in the licensee for the purposes of proceedings the rights of action of the owner, and the section states that he is to sue as though he were the owner with all the consequences that flow therefrom. If that view were not right, it would appear to me that the grant of a non-exclusive licence would be a singularly valueless operation, since the licensee could never prevent anybody else coming into the market and publishing the same documents with the advantage of having no royalty to pay in respect thereof. I cannot think that that was the intention. A B

That disposes of the point under sub-s. 5, and I agree with HARMAN, J., that, therefore, the question is : Would Peters have been entitled to sue or, turning again to the section, have the plaintiffs in this action satisfied the other conditions which are there laid down ? It is to be noted that their obligation is that any person other than an enemy who is alone or jointly the owner must be joined unless the court in the exercise of its discretion thinks fit to direct otherwise. The first point seems to me to be : On whom does the onus of proof lie to show whether the owner is or is not an enemy ? I think that the answer to that is that it lies on a plaintiff. If he comes to the court clothed, as it were, with all the authority and rights of the owner and the owner is not here, then he must establish that the reason that he is not here is that he is an enemy. That is, again, in entire accord with the view of HARMAN, J., and I shall proceed to the question whether that onus has been discharged, but, anticipating the important matter that follows, the plaintiff, if he fails to discharge the onus, may either at the trial or, I take it, at any earlier time ask the court in the exercise of its discretion to dispense with joining the owner who is not an enemy. C D E

I turn to the first matter : Have the plaintiffs discharged the onus of proving enemy ownership of the copyright ? They set out to prove it, first by the production of the licence of Aug 13, 1945, and they add to that (and the matter is not without some significance) this point. When the application was made it was advertised, and the advertisement came to the attention of Max Hinrichsen, a person who, in the absence of the transaction of July, 1939, would be the copyright owner. Max, having written a somewhat bellicose communication to the plaintiffs, did not carry his warfare any further, but allowed the plaintiffs to proceed with their application and obtain the licence. That, says counsel for the plaintiffs, is strong evidence in support of the view that the owner was not Max Hinrichsen and so the inference is that the owner was an enemy. How far, apart from Mr. Hinrichsen's inactivity when the matter had been brought to his attention, counsel for the plaintiffs could rely on the licence of itself it is, perhaps, not material to consider, though counsel argued that under the authority of Hill v. Clifford (1) it was not only admissible but was prima facie evidence of enemy ownership, since the order could only have been made and the licence could only have been granted on the footing that this case fell within the Act—in other words, that it was the case of an enemy-owned copyright. I agree with counsel for the defendants that Hill v. Clifford (1) is not an authority governing this case. There the question was whether two dentists had been guilty of disgraceful conduct in a professional respect, because, if they had, their partner was entitled to determine the partnership. Their transactions had come before the General Medical Council, which, by the appropriate statute, is given certain F G H I rights, and, in particular, the right to strike dentists off the register if they are guilty of the kind of conduct which I have mentioned. Messrs. Clifford, having appeared before the General Medical Council, had been found guilty of malpractices and had been struck off the register. It was objected on their behalf in the partnership proceedings that that fact was not admissible in evidence against them, and this court held that that was not so. I need not pursue the matter, for the reasons which I have already intimated, but I point out that in

A Hill v. Clifford (1) and in the case quoted in it (Van Grutten v. Foxwell (2)) the person against whom the finding was made was before the body that made the finding. If Mr. Hinrichsen had been before the Comptroller and had argued against the grant of the licence on the ground that he, Hinrichsen, was the owner and the Comptroller had found against him and issued the licence, I think that Hill v. Clifford (1) might have been authority for the view that counsel for the

B plaintiffs could in this action rely on the order against a third party, Eulenburg, Ltd., but those are not the facts, and, the order having been made in the absence of Hinrichsen, I cannot see that any particular weight can be attached to it of itself in this matter. At the same time, as I have already indicated, the fact that Max Hinrichsen had notice of the plaintiffs' application and made a threat entitles counsel for the plaintiffs to say that it is some evidence of enemy owner-

C ship at the material date, but it is evidence which can quite readily be displaced.

[His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence relating to the transaction of July, 1939, and said that the court was not justified in treating what purported to be a sale of the Peters business by a German government official in July, 1939, as a nullity.] He continued : I think that the plaintiffs failed to satisfy the onus of proving an enemy owner of the copyright, but the plaintiffs

D then asked the court to exercise its discretion and to dispense with joinder of the owner. If HARMAN, J., was right, Max was held and found to be the owner, and the question, therefore, in respect of which the judge's discretion was sought was : Can the joinder of Max as owner be dispensed with ? HARMAN, J., in all the circumstances of the case, refused, and, if the premise be accepted, I should not myself think that there was any ground for disturbing the judge's

E exercise of discretion, but, if the premise goes, what then ? Indeed, I ask myself (and I am by no means clear of the answer) : If HARMAN, J., had thought it right to hold that, however probable might be the invalidity of the 1939 transactions, it was not finally to be decided, would he have exercised the discretion as he did ? I am inclined to think that he would have done otherwise, but, however that may be, if the premise on which the discretion came to be exercised

F vanishes, the question which he had to answer was a different question.

I think, therefore, that we are bound to review afresh this question of discretion. This has been the most difficult and vexing part of the case, made far more so by the circumstances mentioned by counsel for the defendants. I will state certain matters which I think are relevant. The position now is, not that Max is the owner, but that he may be—that he probably, but not certainly,

G is the owner. Indeed, as counsel for the plaintiff pointed out, there is a rival claimant in his brother, Walter. Whose joinder, therefore, on this hypothesis is the judge asked to dispense with and in what capacity is it suggested that they were to be joined ? Assuming that we confined our attention solely to Max, he would only be joined as one who claimed to be the owner, and the plaintiffs would presumably put in the amended statement of claim that he claimed to be

H the owner and was joined as such, though the plaintiffs denied his title. Max might or might not have taken any part in the proceedings. If not, the joinder would have been futile. If the issue as to whether he was the owner was raised, the whole question which is in issue in another action which has been brought by the plaintiffs against Hinrichsen Edition, Ltd., would be raised also in this action. If those matters had been brought to the attention of HARMAN, J., I think that he might well have said that the best thing was to postpone the further hearing of this case, which counsel for the defendants has asked him earlier to do. [HIS LORDSHIP having referred to the discussion in the court below on the application for an adjournment until after the hearing of the plaintiffs' action against Hinrichsen Edition, Ltd., continued :] On what terms ought the discretion to be exercised? If terms could not be satisfactorily found which protected the rights that ought to be protected, that would be a powerful reason for not exercising it, but I am disposed to think that they can. Counsel for the defendants told us that on one occasion his clients offered to stop selling. That appears to have fallen on deaf ears. At any rate, I do not think that there is any ground for imposing such terms on them today. I do not think that in all the circumstances the plaintiffs ought to stop the defendants selling or that they should have any injunction. I think that, pending the determination of the main question all that the defendants should be required to do is to keep an account of any sales that in the meantime they may make. Likewise as to damages. Though an enquiry can be ordered, I suggest that it should not be proceeded with, again, until after the substantive question has been decided. Nor do I think it right that the question of the costs of the action should be dealt with until that matter has been finally considered. All those things would be postponed, but I think that subject to those terms the discretion ought to be exercised, that the joinder of Max Hinrichsen or any other person should be dispensed with, and that the fruits of the plaintiffs' cause of action (if it exists) should be kept intact until these other matters have been determined.

COHEN, L.J. : I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. This court is always reluctant to interfere with a judge's exercise of his discretion and will, shortly speaking, only do so if it is satisfied that he has gone wrong in principle or that injustice will be done if his exercise of discretion is allowed to stand. The present case seems to me to be one in which we are bound to review the exercise by HARMAN, J., of his discretionary power to dispense with the joinder of the owner of the copyright. He found that the Hinrichsen family had inherited between them the whole interest in the Peters firm. This inheritance was through Henri, the father, who at the date of his death was entitled to the whole interest in the Peters firm. The judge then points out that Max was a British subject and had taken out letters of administration and it followed therefrom, in the judge's view, that the whole legal title was in Max. The beneficial interest, though I do not think that that is material, was in Max and his brothers and sisters. That view which HARMAN, J., had reached must, I think, have coloured his whole decision on the discretion point, since, if it was shown that the legal title to the copyright was vested in a British subject resident in England, it must plainly be wrong to dispense with that British subject being a party to the action. I think that the conclusion of the learned judge was not justified by the evidence before him. In those circumstances, it was plainly our duty to consider what on the facts as we found them would be a proper exercise of the discretion. It seems to me that, had I been in the position of HARMAN, J., and had to exercise the discretion, I should have exercised it on terms, since I am satisfied that it is possible to devise terms which will do justice to both parties. I think that the terms that SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., has outlined will give the defendants reasonable protection in the event of it being held in the Hinrichsen action that the title to the Peters firm was vested in Henri Hinrichsen at his death, and at the same time will not deprive the plaintiffs of the rights to which they will clearly be entitled if the title to the Peters firm is held to have been effectively transferred to Mr. Herman and Mr. Petschull. It seems to me, therefore, that justice does require in the present circumstances that we should hold that HARMAN, J., wrongly exercised his discretion on the facts as he should have found them and that it should be exercised on the terms which my Lord has indicated. I should add that in reaching the conclusion which I have reached I take into account, and I think that SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., did, too, the fact that the defendants are shown not to have had the rights that they alleged in their original defence or, indeed, any rights in respect of this alleged copyright in issue in the action. For those reasons, I agree with my Lord that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs of the appeal. Order in terms of the judgment that the defendants keep an account of their sales and that the plaintiffs be entitled to an inquiry as to damages to become effective after the question of the ownership of the copyright is decided by the court. Costs in the court below to await that decision.

Solicitors : Shaen, Roscoe & Co. (for the plaintiffs) ; Booth & Blackwell (for the defendants).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

[Affirmed. H.L. [1951] 2 All E.R. 352.

C K. C. SETHIA (1944), LTD. v. PARTABMULL RAMESHWAR.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), December 5, 6, 1949.]

Contract—Implied term—Shipment of jute from India to Italy—Export permitted only under licence and subject to quota—Contract not expressed to be subject to quota—Conditions governing sellers' ability to perform contract under quota system known to both parties.

In July and September, 1947, the sellers, who carried on business in Calcutta, entered into contracts with the buyers, a company registered in England and carrying on business in London, to ship certain quantities of jute to Genoa. The time for shipment was originally from October, 1947, to January, 1948, but it was extended by consent to October, 1948. The contracts were on c.i.f. terms and expressed to be on the terms and conditions of the London Jute Association contract. At all material times the export of jute from India was permitted only under licence from the government of India, and during 1947 exports were allowed only on a quota system whereby a shipper had to choose as his basic year one of the years from 1937 to 1946 and was allotted a quota in regard to the countries to which he had shipped in his basic year. The sellers chose 1946 as their basic year, but they had made no shipments to Italy in that year, with the result that they obtained no quota for Italy and were unable to make any shipments under the contracts until 1948 when, under new regulations, they were allowed a small quota for Italy against evidence of firm contracts. As a result, they were able to ship less than a third of the amount of jute which they had agreed to ship under their four contracts of July and September, 1947. The buyers, as well as the sellers, knew of the regulations which were in force in regard to the export of jute, but the contracts were not expressly stated to be "subject to quota." On a claim by the buyers for damages for breach of contract, the sellers based their defence on the lack of quota and contended that, to give business efficacy to the contracts, a term must be implied in them that they were subject to quota. The buyers contended that such a term could not be implied.

HELD : the court would read an implied term into a contract only where it was clear that both parties intended that term to operate; although both parties knew that the contracts could only be met out of the sellers' quota, the question whether that quota would suffice for the purpose depended on matters concerning the conduct of the sellers' business which were peculiarly within their knowledge as opposed to that of the buyers (e.g., the sellers alone would know (a) which year they had chosen as their basic year and what quota they were likely to receive as a result of their choice, and (b) what contracts with other buyers had to be satisfied out of their quota), and an unqualified provision to the effect that the contract was subject to the quota being sufficient and to the seller using his best endeavours to obtain a sufficient quota, would be quite inadequate to secure the business efficacy of the contracts; as, therefore, the parties could not be taken to have intended that the term sought by the sellers to be implied should be incorporated in the contracts, it was impossible to read into the contracts of July and September, 1947, the term contended for by the sellers.

Re Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders and Batt (John) & Co. (London), [1917] 2 K.B. 679, distinguished.

[AS TO IMPLIED TERMS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 7, pp. 322, 323, para. 451; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 12, pp. 607-613, Nos. 5028-5066.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Re Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders & Batt (John) & Co. (London), [1917] 2 K.B. 679; 86 L.J.K.B. 1360; 116 L.T. 805; 12 Digest 397, 3223.
- (2) The Moorcock, (1889), 14 P.D. 64; 58 L.J.P. 73; 60 L.T. 654; 12 Digest 611, 5048.

APPEAL by the sellers from a decision of LORD GODDARD, C.J., dated June 23, 1949, whereby he upheld the award of the committee of the London Jute Association, stated in the form of a Special Case for the opinion of the court, on four appeals, which were brought before the committee by the buyers, against awards made by arbitrators in favour of the sellers in regard to four separate contracts. The committee of the London Jute Association quashed the awards of the arbitrators and made an award of damages in favour of the buyers, subject to the question of law raised in the Special Case.

The sellers were a partnership carrying on business in Calcutta and dealing, inter alia, in jute. The buyers were a limited liability company, registered in England and carrying on business in London. By the four contracts, two of which were made on July 28, 1947, and the other two on Sept. 5, 1947, the sellers agreed to sell certain quantities of jute, the shipments to be made to Genoa by October, 1948. The contracts were on c.i.f. terms and expressed to be on the terms and conditions of the London Jute Association contract. They were not expressed to be "subject to quota." At all material times the export of jute from India was prohibited except under licence, both parties being aware of this fact. In February, 1947, the government of India introduced a quota system for regulating the export of jute. Under this system, shippers were required to choose as their basic year one of the years from 1937 to 1946, and were allotted a quota in regard to the countries to which they had shipped in their basic year and in proportion to the amount shipped to those countries in that year. The sellers chose 1946 as their basic year, but they had made no shipments to Italy in that year, with the result that no quota was allotted to them for Italy and they were unable during 1947 to make any shipments under the contracts. Under new regulations which were in force for the first six months of 1948 they were allotted a small quantity of jute for shipment to Italy, but by October, 1948, the time fixed for the completion of the contracts, they had shipped less than one-third of the amount which they had contracted to ship. The buyers claimed damages for breaches of the four contracts and the disputes were referred to arbitration. It was contended on behalf of the sellers that an implied term should be read into the contracts that they were subject to the necessary licences and quotas being obtainable, as it must obviously have been the intention of the parties to include such a term to give to the transaction the efficacy which both parties had intended it to have. The Court of Appeal now held that this was not a case in which it would be right or possible to read into the contracts an implied term, and they dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Sir William McNair, K.C., A. P. Chaudhuri and J. G. S. Hobson for the sellers. Scott Cairns, K.C., and B. J. M. MacKenna for the buyers.

A

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a decision of LORD GODDARD, C.J., on an award in the form of a Special Case stated for the opinion of the court by the committee of the London Jute Association relating to four appeals, which were brought before the committee by the buyers, against awards which had been made by four arbitrators in favour of the sellers with regard to four separate contracts. The committee of the London Jute Association overruled the awards of the arbitrators, and made an award of damages in favour of the buyers, awarding them £14,273, subject to the question of law raised in the Special Case. The award of the committee has been upheld by the Lord Chief Justice.

B

C

D

E

F

The sellers carry on business in Calcutta, dealing inter alia in jute which is the subject of these contracts. The buyers are a limited liability company, registered in England and carrying on business in London. By the four contracts, of which the first two are dated July 28, 1947, and the second two, Sept. 5, 1947, the sellers agreed to sell to the buyers under the first two contracts five hundred bales of jute under each contract, and under the second two contracts 1,250 bales under each contract, the jute being graded in two cases as "Tossa" and in the other two cases as "firsts." They were c.i.f. contracts, the shipments were to be made to Genoa, and the date fixed for shipment was, with regard to the first contract, October to November, 1947, with regard to the second, September to October, 1947, and, as regards the third and fourth, December, 1947, to January, 1948. It is common ground that eventually the time for shipment was by consent extended until October, 1948. Under these contracts there were shipped one hundred bales under the first, 250 under the second, and approximately 250 under each of the last two, leaving a balance unshipped of four hundred on the first contract, 250 under the second and one thousand under each of the last two, and it is in respect of these unshipped balances that the damages have been awarded. The contracts were made on the terms of the form of contract in use by the London Jute Association, cl. 1 of which provides :

"Shipment. To be shipped from Calcutta and/or Chittagong . . ."

G

H

Clause 3 deals with unavoidable delay, which was not relied on. Clause 18, headed "Paramount," is attached to the form of contract by a slip and reads as follows :

"Notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, should this contract in whole or in part become impossible of fulfilment through the interruption or the result of interruption of the normal course of business in India or Pakistan or any part of India or Pakistan by or in consequence of civil war or social unrest or by or in consequence of the action of any Indian or Pakistan Government or any government claiming to be such for or for any part of India or Pakistan or other authority, then it shall be null and void without the payment of any damages or penalties by either party to the other upon the declaration by the Committee of the London Jute Association that such impossibility has, in fact, come about."

Neither side sought to avail themselves of that clause, and no declaration under that clause had ever been made by the committee, but its insertion shows that the state of affairs prevailing in India and Pakistan had come to the knowledge of the association, and its incorporation in the contract shows that the parties must be taken to have been not unmindful of the difficulties and complications which might arise in performing the contract.

The point of law raised in this appeal is whether or not, in order to give business efficacy to the contracts, it is necessary to imply into them a term which is not to be found expressly therein. Counsel for the sellers submits that there must be implied into them a term that they were subject to the necessary licences being obtainable, this being, in his submission, a necessary term by reason of the fact that at all material times the export of jute from Calcutta and Chittagong could be carried out only under licences granted by the government of India, or, after the partition of India and Pakistan, by the government of India and the government of Pakistan, respectively. A

The facts, as found in the Special Case, may shortly be stated as follows. There was a licensing system in force in India before the contracts were made, and in February, 1947, the government of India notified the jute trade that regulations were to be made with regard to shipment by quota of jute. We have not seen the precise regulations that were made, but have merely a summary of the law which was in force, which shows that the export of jute was under control, that licences had to be obtained before it could be exported, and that the licences were granted pursuant to what is called a quota system. Under the regulation of shipment by quota, established shippers (among whom were the sellers) had to choose one particular year out of the years 1937 to 1946 as their basic year, and declare their shipments and the countries to which they had shipped in that basic year. The closing period for making applications to obtain quotas was March, 1947. The sellers chose 1946 as their basic year, but in that year they had made no shipments to Italy, with the result that, when quotas were allotted, they obtained no quota for Italy, the quota system being based on the countries to which the established shippers had shipped in the basic year : i.e., the shippers were allotted a total quota, and out of that total they were allotted quotas for specific countries, having regard to the countries to which they had shipped in the basic year. The sellers, therefore, could ship no jute to Italy, but, although this was the position when the contracts of July, 1947, were made, they contracted in absolute terms to make the shipments to Genoa. In determining whether or not a term that the contracts were subject to the necessary licences being obtainable should be implied into these contracts, it is important to remember that a potential buyer in England might have assumed that the sellers had chosen as their basic year one in which they had made shipments to Italy and that they had, accordingly, received a substantial quota for that country. D E

On the partition of Pakistan and India, which became effective on Aug. 15, 1947, Calcutta remained in India, but Chittagong became part of Pakistan. The governments of India and Pakistan had entered into an agreement, called a Standstill Agreement, whereby Pakistan undertook to carry out the restrictions on export then existing in India, but, notwithstanding that agreement, the authorities in Pakistan at first not only put no obstacle in the way of exports from Chittagong but tried to stimulate them. Early in 1948, however, their policy changed, and they began to tighten up the export system, beginning with Italy, and by February, 1948, there was a licensing system in force similar to that in India, and it has remained in force ever since. The Case finds, however, that between October, 1947, and June, 1948, over 700,000 bales of jute were, in fact, shipped from Chittagong, and that the sellers shipped a small quantity of jute from Chittagong in February, 1948, but made no shipments from Chittagong to the buyers. From the beginning of 1948 until June 30, 1948, new provisions were brought into force in India, whereby quotas were allotted to shippers who could produce evidence of having concluded firm contracts, and on Feb. 18, 1948, the sellers applied under these provisions. They submitted eleven contracts, including the four entered into with the buyers in the present case, and they were allotted, for export from Calcutta to Italy, 83 tons on Apr. 7, 1948, and 194 tons on May 13, 1948, making a total of 277 tons out of the F G H 995 tons required to carry out the eleven contracts. Of this, they distributed 842 bales, amounting to about 150 tons, to the buyers in the present case, and there is no question that they distributed equitably between their various buyers the quota which was allotted to them under that application. For the period from July 1, 1948, to Oct. 31, 1948, no licences for export from Calcutta to Italy were granted by the government of India. On Sept. 15, 1948 (as a result of a suggestion made by the buyers, at some unspecified date), the sellers applied to the government of Pakistan for a quota to Italy. The Case does not find what the fate of that application was, but I think it is a fair inference, as counsel for the sellers submits, that no quota was allotted.

I think that has sufficiently dealt with the facts for the purposes of deciding the question of law, viz., whether or not it is necessary, so as to give business efficacy to these contracts, to incorporate the implied term on which counsel for the sellers relies. The sheet anchor of his argument lies in Re Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders and John Batt & Co. (London) (1), a decision of this court on arbitration proceedings between sellers and buyers in connection with aluminium during the 1914/1918 war. The headnote is as follows:

"By a contract made in London, and dated Aug. 19, 1915, the appellants sold to the respondents, both parties being resident in this country, fifty tons of aluminium 'to be shipped by steamer(s) to Vladivostok during December/January next,' at a price including cost and freight; payment to be by cash against documents in London. At the date of the contract there was, to the knowledge of both parties, a prohibition against the export of aluminium from this country except on licence granted by the British government. On Dec. 7, 1915, an order was made applying reg. 30A of the Defence of the Realm (Consolidation) Regulations, 1914, to aluminium. That regulation provides that 'no person shall, without a permit . . . (a) buy, sell, or deal in; or (b) offer or invite an offer or propose to buy, sell, or deal in; or (c) enter into negotiations for the sale or purchase of or other dealing in, any war material' to which the regulation might be applied by order, whether or not the sale, purchase, or dealing was effected in the United Kingdom. No aluminium was shipped under the contract. The buyers claimed damages for breach of contract, and the dispute was referred to arbitration. The umpire found that the parties in fact contemplated that the aluminium would be shipped from this country, and that neither of the parties contemplated or intended the performance of the contract by shipment of American aluminium; that the sellers duly applied for a licence to export the aluminium from this country, but a licence was refused, and that the failure to ship was due to their inability to obtain a licence; and that the sellers did not, after Dec. 7, 1915, or at all, apply for a permit to purchase aluminium in America so as to ship it from there, but if they had so applied the proper authority in this country would not have granted a permit :—Held, upon the assumption that the shipment was limited to a shipment from the United Kingdom, that the contract did not impose upon the sellers an absolute obligation to ship or to pay damages in default of shipment, and that therefore the sellers, who had used reasonable diligence to obtain a licence to ship, were not liable in damages to the buyers."

It is not necessary to refer to the finding on the further point with regard to purchases in America.

On the argument of that case before this court - and I think this is important - counsel on each side agreed that some term had to be implied into that contract to give business efficacy to it. The only dispute between the parties was : What was that term ? Counsel for the sellers submitted that a term must be implied in the contract that it was subject to a licence to export being obtained. Counsel for the buyers submitted that in order to give the contract its business efficacy it was necessary to imply a term that the sellers undertook to obtain a licence and to ship the aluminium. In his judgment, VISCOUNT READING, C.J., said ([1917] 2 K.B. 685) :

"The question is what is the obligation of the sellers under the contract ? It is admitted by both parties that some obligation must be implied in the contract. In my opinion the implied obligation is no higher than that the sellers shall use their best endeavours to obtain a permit. That is a term which is necessary to give to the contract such business efficacy as both parties must have intended, when they entered into the contract, that it should have, within the principle laid down by BOWEN, L.J., in The Moorcock (2)."

The other members of the court, LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., and SCRUTTON, L.J., agreed. The decision in that case was that a particular term had to be implied into a particular contract, and it cannot, of course, amount to a decision that in other contracts of a different nature such a term must necessarily be implied. Nor do I think it can possibly go so far as to bind a court to hold that, whenever the obtaining of a licence forms some part of the transaction at some stage, such a term must always inevitably be implied. I think that every contract must be looked at separately, and the surrounding circumstances with regard to each contract are always material.

In the Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders case (1) there is nothing to indicate that the obtaining of a licence was in any way dependent on any action—other than that of applying for the licence—to be carried out by the party whose duty it was to obtain the licence. If in that case the facts had been that the sellers had, or might have had, an aluminium quota at the time they entered into the contract, and that the obtaining of a licence was a mere formality for exporting the quota which they had already obtained, or which under the prevailing system they might have obtained, then I think the position would have been very different. At the time when the contracts in this case were made, for all that anyone in this country knew, the sellers might have had a quota for Italy. They had not got one, however, and knew that they had not. None the less, they chose to enter into these contracts. In my view, these contracts and the circumstances surrounding them are clearly distinguishable from the position which existed in the Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders case (1). Another feature of the present case which results from the quota system, and which, I think, is material, is that the sellers' position vis-a-vis the buyers, is, or might be, dependent, to a certain extent, on what other contracts the sellers chose to enter into with other buyers. Assuming that they had obtained a quota out of which they could allocate to the buyers, the more contracts they entered into (i.e. the greater quantity they contracted to sell to other buyers), the smaller would be the amount out of the quota which they could supply to the buyers in this case. That, again, I think, tends to negative the necessity for implying into these contracts the term which the sellers seek to incorporate in them.

That, in effect, is the decision at which LORD GODDARD, C.J., arrived, but some criticism has been made with regard to the language which he used, which, it is said, indicates that he had not fully appreciated the working of this particular system. I do not think that those portions of his judgment where he is dealing in general terms with quota systems were intended to apply precisely to the facts of this case. He was indicating the position that might arise under quota systems, showing that one case cannot always govern another. He said :

"If, therefore, he chose to say to some customer of his abroad : 'I will sell you five hundred tons of jute,' I cannot read into that contract a term saying : 'only if I can get a licence to increase my quota.' He has got a quota."

That passage was criticised as showing (so it was said) that the Lord Chief Justice thought that, at the time of the contracts, the sellers had got a quota for Italy. Of course, they had not, but, on the other hand, they had sent in their application and received quotas for other countries. However, whether or not they had, in fact, got a quota at the time these contracts were made does not alter the principle of the decision. The point is that under this system they might have got a quota, for all that was known to the buyers in this country. It was a matter peculiar to these particular sellers that they had not been able to get a quota for Italy, the country to which shipment was to be made under the contracts, and for these reasons I think that it is not necessary to imply into the contracts the term which counsel for the sellers seeks to incorporate, that they have a business efficacy without any such term being implied, and that the case is distinguishable from the Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders case (1).

The committee have found in the Case, that each of the contracts was what is known in the jute trade as a "clean contract," i.e. :

"... a contract which or shipment under which is not expressly stated to be 'subject to quota'."

The Case goes on to find :

"It was not and is not unusual to specify in a contract that it or shipment under it is 'subject to quota'."

I have arrived at my decision independently of that finding. Where buyers and sellers are both members of a particular association, and where that association has in force two alternative contracts, I should desire to reserve for further consideration the question, if it should arise, whether or not it is permissible to give evidence to say that the parties had selected the one contract to the exclusion of the other. Generally speaking, it is beyond question that one contract cannot be construed by reference to another, but whether or not the fact that there are two forms of contract might not be a circumstance which it was proper to regard in a case where the sellers and buyers are both members of the same association, is a matter which can be dealt with if and when it arises. It is to be observed that in the present case there is no finding that the sellers were members of this association. I agree with counsel for the buyers that, if a term has to be implied in this contract, it is open to considerable doubt and speculation as to the precise nature of the implied term which would be necessary, having regard to all the circumstances to which I have already referred, including the possibility of the sellers obtaining contracts with other buyers. For these reasons I think that this appeal fails.

SINGLETON, L.J. : On the facts of this case, I do not see any reason why the sellers should be allowed to introduce another term into the contracts between them and the buyers. In no sense is it necessary to do so for the purpose of giving business efficacy to the contracts. There are, apparently, two forms of contract in use in the jute trade, and it must be assumed that the parties to these contracts were familiar with both. One is the "clean contract," which this was, and the other, which, as the Case Stated, is not unusual, is the form which is "subject to quota." It is the "subject to quota" form which the sellers now wish to have, and it is not surprising that the buyers resist that claim. Counsel for the sellers submitted that we are not entitled to have before us any form of contract other than the "clean contract" when considering the question now before the court. I will assume that that is right, though it must not be taken that I accept it as a correct proposition. Both parties knew of the requirements as to licences and quota. It seems to me that the sellers took a risk and now they wish to change the nature of the bargain they made. As LORD GODDARD, C.J., pointed out, this case differs from Re Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders and John Batt & Co. (London) (1) in several respects. I propose to refer to one difference only. The extracts from the arguments in that case, and the passages from the judgment of VISCOUNT READING, C.J. ([1917] 2 K.B. 685), which my Lord read, show quite clearly that it was admitted by both sides in the course of the argument that some additional term must be read into the contract in that case, and the only question was : What was the term to be ? In the case under appeal, it is not necessary to read anything into the contracts. They are clear and free from ambiguity. The sellers found that the quota given to them did not enable them to fulfil all their obligations, and they seek to be relieved from the burden of the contracts, but they have not shown, as I think, any ground for the introduction of any term into them.

There is one other matter to which I think it right to draw attention. The contracts between the parties were on the terms and conditions of the London Jute Association contract, cl. 12 of which is that any dispute shall be referred to arbitration in accordance with the bye-laws of the association, and there is a provision for appeal to the committee of the association against any award. This dispute was referred to arbitration, and subsequently there was an appeal to the committee. Thereafter a Special Case was stated by the committee and came before LORD GODDARD, C.J. Most respectfully, I would point out that this procedure adds greatly to the cost and trouble which the parties have to encounter in a case of this kind. It would, I think, be much better that a dispute such as this should go direct to the Commercial Court, and there be dealt with, as it would be a saving of costs for the parties. If this court had taken a view in favour of the submission of counsel for the sellers, it would still have been necessary, I think, for the case to be referred back again. All that procedure and a good deal of the costs would be avoided if a matter of this kind was dealt with by the judge sitting in the Commercial Court. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J. : I agree that the appeal fails. In considering the question whether an implied term should be read into contracts such as these, there is, I think, a real and important distinction between circumstances such as those in Re Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders and John Batt & Co. (London) (1), where the commodity in question was a commodity all dealings in which were unlawful in the absence of a licence and circumstances such as those in the present case which concerns a commodity subject to control on a quota system under which individual dealers can lawfully deal with the commodity up to the amount of the quota allotted to them respectively. In cases of the former type, it is easy to imply a term to the effect that the transaction is subject to the necessary licence being obtained, for otherwise it would be manifest to both parties that the transaction could not be carried out at all, but in cases of the present type, while it is, no doubt, true that both parties know that the contract can only be met out of the seller's quota, the question whether the seller's quota will suffice for that purpose seems to me to depend on a variety of matters concerning the conduct of the seller's business, and, as such, matters peculiarly within his knowledge as opposed to that of the buyer. The seller will know which basic year he chose for the purpose of fixing his quota. He will know (as is material here) to which countries he exported, and, therefore, what quota he is likely to get, if any, for the particular country where the commodity, the jute, is to be delivered. The seller will further know, and he prima facie alone will know, what other contracts he has entered into or intends to enter into. These would, of course, affect the sufficiency or otherwise of his quota. Further, it must be presumed that he knows the market in which he deals, and knows the prospects, if necessary, of buying quota to supplement any deficiencies in his own, or, perhaps, of exchanging quota available for one country for quota available for another, and thus enabling himself to carry out his contract. In these circumstances, as it seems to me, prima facie the sufficiency of the seller's quota to meet any contract he enters into is a matter for him to see to, and any difficulties he may encounter as regards the sufficiency of his quota seem to me prima facie to be a business risk which he must accept in the absence of some provision to the contrary in the contract. Otherwise, it seems to me that these transactions would be unworkable.

A One thing, I think, is clear about implied terms. I do not think that the court will read a term into a contract unless, considering the matter from the point of view of business efficacy, it is clear beyond a peradventure that both parties intended a given term to operate, although they did not include it in so many words. In the Anglo-Russian Merchant Traders case (1) it was relatively easy to formulate the implied term. Here it seems to me that it is absolutely impossible to do so. An unqualified provision to the effect that the contract was subject to the quota being sufficient and to the seller using his best endeavours to obtain a sufficient quota, would, as it seems to me, be quite inadequate, for the reason B my Lord has pointed out, that the sufficiency of quota depends not only on the amount of quota the seller is able to get but on the quantity of jute he is committed to deliver under the totality of contracts that he has entered into. The term would, therefore, have to include a provision dealing in some way or other with the situation in which the seller had, in fact, had sufficient quota to meet the C particular contract, but not enough to meet that contract and all his other contracts. How the seller and the buyer are to be assumed to have wished to deal with that kind of situation, it is really quite impossible to say. For these reasons, in addition to those given by my Lords, I agree that this is not a case in which it is right, or, indeed, possible, to read into the contracts an implied term of the kind contended for by the sellers. The appeal, accordingly, fails, D and should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors : Linklaters & Paines (for the sellers) ; Stuart Hunt & Co. (for the buyers).

[Reported by C. ST. J. NICHOLSON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re Nos. 38, 39 AND 40 WINDMILL STREET,
ST. PANCRAS, LONDON.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), December 8, 1949.]

War Damage—Value payment—"Proprietary interest"—"Short tenancy"—Term of more than seven years under two instruments—Lease for five years extended to twelve years—War Damage Act, 1943 (c. 21), s. 123.

G The War Damage Act, 1943, s. 12, provides : "(1) The right to receive a value payment shall vest in accordance with the following provisions of this section. (2) The time by reference to which the vesting of the right to receive a value payment is to be regulated . . . shall . . . be the time immediately before the occurrence of the war damage, and (a) if at the material time the only proprietary interest subsisting in the hereditament was a fee simple in the whole of the hereditament . . . the right to receive the payment . . . shall vest in the person who was at the material time the owner of that proprietary interest . . . (b) in any other case, the payment shall be apportioned between the several proprietary interests subsisting in the hereditament or in any part thereof at the material time . . ." Section 105 of the Act provides : "(1) . . . references in Part I of this Act to the owner of a proprietary interest . . . shall be construed as references to the person in whom the legal estate in respect of the interest . . . is vested . . ." Section 123 defines "proprietary interest" in relation to any hereditament H as “(a) the fee simple in the land comprised therein . . . and (b) any tenancy of that land . . . other than a short tenancy.” That section defines a “short tenancy” as “a tenancy granted for a term of seven years or less.”

By a lease dated Apr. 8, 1931, B. and F., the owners of certain hereditaments, demised those hereditaments to W.H. for a term of five years. On Dec. 31, 1934, W.H. died and by his will he bequeathed his interest in the said lease to his son, H.H. By a deed dated Dec. 3, 1935, executed in counterpart and made between B. and F., of the one part (described as the lessors), and H.H., of the other part (described as the lessee), it was recited inter alia that the deed was supplemental to the lease dated Apr. 8, 1931 (the effect of which was stated), that the interest of W.H. in the said lease was vested in H.H., and that B. and F. had agreed to demise to H.H. the premises demised by the lease “for the further term of seven years to commence on June 24, 1936,” at a certain rent and subject to certain covenants and provisions thereafter reserved and expressed. By the operative part of the instrument B. and F. demised to H.H. the property comprised in the recited lease for a term of seven years from June 24, 1936, subject to the rent payable “at the like times and in the like manner as the rent reserved by the lease and subject to like covenants and agreements” on the part of H.H., with certain exceptions. H.H. covenanted to observe and perform the covenants and that he would be subject to the proviso for re-entry “in like manner as if all such covenants and conditions as to re-entry had been repeated in the deed with such modifications . . . as the circumstances might require.” There followed, inter alia, an option to H.H. to purchase “the reversion in fee simple in the premises hereby demised” at a price to be agreed. Each part of the deed was indorsed: “Deed extending the term of lease of [the hereditaments] for seven years from June 24, 1936, at £230 per annum rent.” On Nov. 15, 1940, the hereditaments suffered war damage and were rendered a total loss. On the question whether H.H. was entitled to a proprietary interest so as to be entitled to receive a proportion of the value payment to be made in respect of the war damage:

HELD: the period of seven years mentioned in the definition of “short tenancy” in s. 123 of the Act was not necessarily a term of that period granted by one and the same instrument, but it might be such a term subsisting under the combined effect of two or more instruments; on construction, the deed of Dec. 3, 1935, extended the original term granted in 1931 and did not constitute a new lease; and, therefore, on the material date H.H. was in possession of a term granted for twelve years and not under a “short tenancy”, with the result that he had a proprietary interest within the meaning of s. 123 and the value payment must be apportioned under s. 12 (2) (b).

[FOR THE WAR DAMAGE ACT, 1943, s. 12 (2), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 36, pp. 350, 351.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Lewis v. Baker, [1905] 1 Ch. 46; 74 L.J.Ch. 39; 91 L.T. 744; 30 Digest 484, 1444.
- (2) Terroni & Necchi v. Corsini, [1931] 1 Ch. 515; 100 L.J.Ch. 289; 145 L.T. 95; Digest Supp.
- (3) Lawrence v. Sinclair, [1949] 1 All E.R. 418; [1949] 2 K.B. 77; [1949] L.J.R. 1003.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to obtain payment out of court of a sum of £1,018 7s. 10d. standing to the credit of an account entitled “In the matter of the War Damage Act, 1943, and In the matter of the hereditaments known as 38, 39 and 40 Windmill Street, St. Pancras, in the county of London,” the money having been paid into court under the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 33.

The right to receive the payment depended on whether or not the respondent had a proprietary interest in the hereditaments within the meaning of the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 12 (2) (b). VAISEY, J., held that he had such an interest and was, therefore, entitled to receive a proportion of the value payment. The facts appear in the judgment.

McMullen for the applicants (owners of the hereditaments).

A G. B. Parker for the respondent (occupier thereof).

VAISEY, J. : This is an application to obtain payment out of court of a sum of £1,018 7s. 10d. standing to the credit of an account entitled "In the matter of the War Damage Act, 1943, and In the matter of the hereditaments known as 38, 39 and 40, Windmill Street, St. Pancras, in the county of London." That sum of money was paid into court by the War Damage Commission under the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 33, which provides :

"(1) If the right to receive a sum representing a payment under this Part of this Act in respect of war damage, or a part of such a payment, is claimed by two or more persons adversely to each other, or the commission are unable to ascertain in whom such a right is vested . . ."

C the commission are entitled to pay the money into court.

The applicants to the present summons, Mr. Bull and Mr. Foyster, were, at all material times, the owners of the hereditaments in question. On Nov. 15, 1940, the hereditaments suffered war damage which, for the purposes of and within the meaning of the War Damage Act, 1943, rendered them a total loss, and, accordingly, a value payment fell to be made under that Act. The respondent to the summons is Mr. Harold William Hensman, and he, at the date of the disaster, was in possession of the property under a certain document which is described by the applicants as a lease. That document, which was dated Dec. 3, 1935, requires to be examined with particularity. It is described, not as a lease, but as a deed. It was executed in counterpart, one part being executed by the applicants, and the other by the respondent. It is indorsed, for what that is worth, in these terms : "Deed extending the term of lease of Nos. 38, 39 and 40, Windmill Street, St. Pancras, London, for seven years from June 24, 1936, at £230 per annum rent." The deed is made between the applicants, defined as the lessors, of the one part, and the respondent, described as the lessee, of the other part. The operative part of the document is prefaced by three recitals. The first recital states that the deed is supplemental to a lease dated Apr. 8, 1931, made between the lessors, of the one part, and one William Hensman, of the other part. I pause here to observe that William Hensman was the father of the present respondent. The effect of the lease is recited as being that it was a demise by the lessors to William Hensman of the property in question for a term of five years at the yearly rent of £220 thereby reserved. The second recital states : "The interest of William Hensman in the said lease is now vested in" the respondent. The third recital says that the lessors had agreed with the lessee—i.e., the applicants had agreed with the respondent—

"to demise to him the premises comprised in and demised by the lease for a further term of seven years to commence on June 24, 1936, at the rent of £230 and subject to the covenant and conditions hereinafter reserved and expressed."

H Then comes the operative part, which states that the lessors—i.e., the applicants—thereby demise to the respondent the property in question—i.e., the property comprised in and demised by the recited lease—for a term of seven years from June 24, 1936, subject to the enhanced rent of £230 a year "payable at the like times and in the like manner as the rent reserved by the lease and subject to the like covenants and agreements" on the part of the respondent, with certain exceptions which I do not think it is necessary to state in detail. The respondent then covenants to observe and perform the covenants and that he would be subject to the proviso for re-entry

"in like manner as if all such covenants and conditions as to re-entry had been repeated in the deed with such modifications as the circumstances might require."

It is further stated that during the term of seven years the respondent would "repair and make good" certain specified matters of disrepair which were set out in the schedule to the deed. There is a covenant on the part of the applicants, and a corresponding covenant on the part of the respondent, that during the term they would observe all the covenants and provisions as therein specified "which ought on their respective parts to be performed and observed." Finally, there was a provision entitling the respondent to purchase the reversion at not more than a specified sum on giving notice before the expiration of the term thereby granted. The evidence shows that the respondent had acquired the interest of his father in the lease of Apr. 8, 1931, by reason of the fact that he was his father's executor and was the specific legatee of the business of the father which was carried on on that property. The effect of the deed of Dec. 3, 1935, is perfectly plain, apart from the technicalities of the law and from the undoubted circumstance that it can be described in legal phraseology in more than one way.

The issue here is whether the deed of 1935 ought to be treated as a new lease to the respondent, without any regard to the earlier history of the matter, or whether it should be regarded as having the operation merely of extending the existing term due to expire on June 24, 1936, so as to expire at a date seven years later. The deed may be accurately described, so far as its effect goes, in either of those two ways. The War Damage Act, 1943, s. 12, provides :

"(1) The right to receive a value payment shall vest in accordance with the following provisions of this section. (2) The time by reference to which the vesting of the right to receive a value payment is to be regulated . . . shall . . . be the time immediately before the occurrence of the war damage, and (a) if at the material time the only proprietary interest subsisting in the hereditament was a fee simple in the whole of the hereditament . . . the right to receive the payment . . . shall vest in the person who was at the material time the owner of that proprietary interest . . . (b) in any other case, the payment shall be apportioned between the several proprietary interests subsisting in the hereditament or in any part thereof at the material time . . ."

Section 105 of the Act defines what is meant by the owner of the proprietary interest, and says :

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, references in Part I of this Act to the owner of a proprietary interest . . . shall be construed as references to the person in whom the legal estate in respect of the interest . . . is vested . . ."

In s. 123, which is the definition section of the Act, it is stated :

" 'proprietary interest' means, in relation to any hereditament or property—(a) the fee simple in the land comprised therein . . . and (b) any tenancy of that land or of any part thereof, other than a short tenancy."

The question is whether or not the interest of the respondent was "a short tenancy." If it was a tenancy other than a short tenancy, the respondent is entitled to a share in this value payment. On the other hand, if the interest of the respondent is a short tenancy, he is not entitled to participate in the value payment and the only other claimants to that payment are the applicants. That brings me to the question : What is a short tenancy ? According to the definition in s. 123 :

“ ‘short tenancy’ means a tenancy granted for a term of seven years or less . . . , and includes—(a) a tenancy granted for a term of more than seven years but subject to a subsisting right of the landlord to determine the tenancy . . . ; (b) a tenancy from year to year ; (c) a tenancy at will ; (d) a tenancy granted for a term limited to expire . . . not later than seven years after [certain occasions].”

A Finally, a tenancy, according to s. 123 :

“includes a tenancy under an underlease and a tenancy under an agreement for a lease or underlease, but does not include an option to take a tenancy and does not include a mortgage.”

B If, in this case, the proper significance to attach to the deed of Dec. 3, 1935, is that it extended an existing term from five years to twelve years, or extended an existing term of five years by an additional seven years, I do not think it can be disputed that the respondent, in whom that term was vested, is a person entitled to a tenancy which is not “a short tenancy.” On the other hand, if the true effect of that deed of Dec. 3, 1935, is that it created de novo a fresh lease giving a tenancy to another lessee, I do not think it can be disputed that the tenant had a short tenancy.

C The rather difficult question which I have to decide is : Did the deed of 1935 extend an existing term, or did it create a new term—i.e., was it a tenancy granted for a term of seven years and no more, or was it an extension of an existing term to more than seven years ? Counsel for the applicants has referred me to the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 149, which, by sub-s. (1), abolished the ancient conception of interesse termini, and then by sub-s. (2) provided that, as from the commencement of the Act (Jan. 1, 1926), all terms of years absolute should take effect at law or in equity “from the date fixed for commencement of the term, without actual entry.” To remind me of the law as it stood before that legislation counsel called my attention to the judgment of SWINFEN EADY, J., in Lewis v. Baker (1) where the law as it then existed was stated with all the clearness and conviction which judgments of that very learned judge always commanded. In the headnote to that case it is stated ([1905] 1 Ch. 46) :

“As a reversionary lease merely creates an interesse termini until entry thereunder, it does not enlarge the term of the original lease.”

F A question arose there as regards the right to distrain and as regards the existence or non-existence of a proper legal reversion to support the right of distraint. Counsel also referred me to the decision of MAUGHAM, J., in Terroni & Necchi v. Corsini (2) where the matter was debated in the light of the change of the law effected by the Act of 1925.

G The enlargement of a term is, of course, a sort of metaphor. It is only a metaphorical way of examining the significance and operation of the later of two deeds. It is true to say that, whichever way you describe the later of these two deeds, you get to the same practical result. It is, indeed, nothing more than a method of approach. I think one ought to look at the realities of the case. If this had been a fresh lease granted to the present respondent without regard to the past history of the matter, it is rather surprising to find recitals as to the then existing lease (though that, no doubt, was a useful way of shortening the document), and, more especially, the reference to the respondent as being the successor in title of his father. I do not think it is without significance, though I do not think it is the determining factor in this case, that both parts of this document of Dec. 3, 1935, which must, undoubtedly, have been prepared by the applicants, are endorsed in the terms which I have already stated, to the effect that it was a deed extending the term of an existing lease. It seems to me that while various lawyers' descriptions of the effect of that deed are accurate so far as they go, one is driven back to the realities of the situation which were that the applicants had created a lease for five years, and that, before the expiration of that five years, an arrangement was made with the successor in title of the lessee for extending to twelve years the five years' term of the existing tenancy. I think the result of that was that at the material date—i.e., immediately before the war damage occurred—the respondent was in possession of a tenancy which was a proprietary interest, because it was not, in my view, a short tenancy, that is to say, not a tenancy granted for a term of seven years or less, but a tenancy granted for twelve years. It seems to me that, whereas the other description which has been suggested as applicable to this document is a perfectly appropriate and adequate description of its general effect, on the whole the right conclusion to come to on the facts and having regard to the purpose and intention of the War Damage Act, 1943, is that at the relevant date there was an unexpired term of twelve years and not seven years.

I have been referred to Lawrence v. Sinclair (3), a case under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. There the decision of the Court of Appeal was that the tenant under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 4, was entitled to be treated as a tenant for a period of not less than five years when the facts were that he had had a lease which was extended from time to time by a series of yearly tenancies. Although I do not know that that case binds me, I think it guides me, and throws some light on the kind of approach which should be made to the problem which I have to consider, indicating, as it does, that one should look at the realities of the case. The learned judges in the Court of Appeal there said that the argument was that into the words in s. 4 (1) "for a period of not less than five years" there must be read the words "under one and the same title," and they said that there was no ground for reading the sub-section in that way. So, here, I think that the period of seven years mentioned in the definition of proprietary interest is not necessarily a term of seven years in one and the same instrument, but that it may be a term of more than seven years subsisting under the combined effect of two or more instruments. So far as I can make out the sum paid into court, which represents, of course, only part of the value payment, has been determined by the War Damage Commission as that portion of the value payment which is attributable to the proprietary interest of the respondent, assuming that he had such an interest. If I had held that he had no proprietary interest, I should have had to order that sum to be paid out to the applicants, but, as I have held that he was entitled at the material date to a proprietary interest, I order that that sum be paid out to him. I think I must also order the applicants to pay his costs.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors : Scadding & Bodkin (for the applicants) ; Bridges, Sawtell & Co. (for the respondent).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

TUDOR FURNISHERS LTD. v. MONTAGUE & CO. AND FINER PRODUCTION CO., LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), December 6, 1949.]

Costs—Security for costs—Interpleader—Issue directed—Parties in substance both claimants—Discretion of court—Corresponding security offered by respondent to application.

A T. Ltd. issued a writ against M. Co. claiming a sum of money representing the proceeds of the sale of certain leasehold property. F. Co. also laid claim to the money, and an interpleader was directed and also an issue in the interpleader proceedings between T. Ltd. and F. Co. in which T. Ltd. were plaintiffs and F. Co. were defendants. M. Co. paid the money into court. F. Co. now applied under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 447, for an order that T. Ltd. should give security for costs. It appeared in evidence that the financial position of T. Ltd. gave reason to believe that T. Ltd. would be unable to pay the costs of F. Co. if F. Co. were successful, and F. Co. itself was in compulsory liquidation. At a late stage of the present proceedings F. Co. offered to give security to the same amount as might be ordered against T. Ltd.

B C D HELD : it was necessary in view of the interpleader proceedings to look at the substance of the matter and not merely at the form ; in substance F. Co. and T. Ltd. were both claimants ; therefore, the court had a discretion either to direct that no security be given by either party, or that security be given by T. Ltd. only if corresponding security were given by F. Co. ; and, in view of the offer to give security made by F. Co., it was proper to order T. Ltd. to give security.

Dictum of BANKES, L.J., in Maatschappij Voor Fondsenbezit v. Shell Transport & Trading Co. ([1923] 2 K.B. 175), applied.

[AS TO WHEN SECURITY FOR COSTS WILL BE ORDERED, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 18, pp. 628-630, para. 1039 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, E Vol. 29, pp. 480-482, Nos. 304-320.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Tomlinson v. Land and Finance Corpn., (1884), 14 Q.B.D. 539 ; 53 L.J.Q.B. 561 ; 29 Digest 482, 316.
- (2) Universal Aircraft Ltd. v. Hickey, (1943) (unrep.), see ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1948, p. 1530.
- F (3) Maatschappij Voor Fondsenbezit v. Shell Transport & Trading Co., [1923] 2 K.B. 166 ; 92 L.J.K.B. 685 ; 129 L.T. 257 ; Digest, Practice, 904, 4451.
- (4) Belmonte v. Aynard, (1879), 4 C.P.D. 352 ; 29 Digest 482, 318.

PROCEDURE SUMMONS for an order that the plaintiffs in the action and issue should give security for costs.

G WYNN-PARRY, J., held that in substance both the applicants (the defendants in the action, Finer Production Co., Ltd.) and the respondents (the plaintiffs, Tudor Furnishers Ltd.) to the summons were claimants in the issue and that he had a discretion either not to order security to be given or to order security to be given only on the applicants giving like security. The applicants offered to give security in the same sum as the respondents might be ordered to give, and WYNN-PARRY, J., ordered security to be given by the respondents. The relevant facts appear in the judgment.

M. M. Wheeler for the applicants.

Quintin Hogg for the respondents.

WYNN-PARRY, J. : This is a summons taken out by the defendants in the action, Finer Production Co., Ltd., as applicants, against the plaintiffs, Tudor Furnishers Ltd., as respondents, for an order that Tudor Furnishers

Ltd. should give security for costs. By the writ in the action Tudor Furnishers Ltd., as plaintiffs, sued a firm, Montague & Co., as defendants, for a sum of money representing the net proceeds of the sale of the goodwill of a business and the leasehold interest in certain premises in Eastbourne. In the upshot an interpleader was directed and also an issue in the interpleader proceedings. Montague & Co., to use BOWEN, L.J.'s phrase in Tomlinson v. Land and Finance Corpn. (1) (14 Q.B.D. 542), slipped out of the matter by paying the sum in dispute into court, and the issue which has to be tried is between Tudor Furnishers Ltd. and Finer Production Co., Ltd., and relates to which of those two companies is entitled to have the sum in court paid out to it. In that issue Tudor Furnishers Ltd., the original plaintiffs, are plaintiffs, and Finer Production Co., Ltd., are defendants.

In support of the application, Finer Production Co., Ltd., have produced evidence which shows that, not merely have Tudor Furnishers Ltd. issued a debenture charging their assets (a circumstance which, by itself, would be insufficient to give the court any jurisdiction under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 447, in view of the unreported decision of MORTON, J., in Universal Aircraft Ltd. v. Hickey (2)) but, further, that a receiver and manager of the whole, or substantially the whole, of the company's property charged by the debenture was appointed in July, 1949, and the financial position of the company is such that, in the words of the section, it appears by credible testimony that there is reason to believe that the company would be unable to pay the costs of the Finer Production Co., Ltd., if the latter were successful in their defence. On the evidence before me, if the relations between the applicants and the respondents were those of defendants and plaintiffs in an ordinary action, I should have no hesitation in concluding that a case had been made out for ordering security for costs under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 447, but the matter does not end there. In view of the interpleader proceedings, I have, as directed by the authorities, to look at the substance of the matter and not merely at the form in order to see what is the true position in the issue between Tudor Furnishers Ltd. and Finer Production Co., Ltd. I find that the position of each party as regards the point in dispute in the issue is the same. They are, in effect, both claimants, and it is a fortuitous circumstance that in the issue Tudor Furnishers Ltd. appear as plaintiffs and Finer Production Co., Ltd., appear as defendants.

In those circumstances and having regard to the authority of Maatschappij Voor Fondsenbezit v. Shell Transport and Trading Co. (3) and, particularly, the judgment of BANKES, L.J., where he reviewed the two earlier authorities of Tomlinson v. Land and Finance Corpn. (1) and Belmonte v. Aynard (4), this is a case in which I ought to exercise my discretion either by directing that no security should be given by either of the parties, the Finer Production Co., Ltd., being itself in compulsory liquidation, or that I ought not to order security to be given by Tudor Furnishers Ltd. except on the basis that corresponding security is given by Finer Production Co., Ltd. BANKES, L.J., in the course of his judgment said ([1923] 2 K.B. 174) :

"The real question, as it seems to me, in this appeal is whether, having regard to the peculiar circumstances of the case, the court is not entitled to look at the substance of the dispute and to say that though the action remains an action in form it is in substance indistinguishable for the present purpose from an interpleader proceeding. When once the defendants admitted liability the whole character of the proceedings in my opinion changed. Had the defendants applied under Ord. 57, r. 7, for an order that the Perlak Co. should be substituted as defendants instead of themselves, I can see no reason why the order should not have been made. Can it make any difference in the jurisdiction of the court that instead of the defendants applying for such an order the Perlak Co. apply for leave to intervene as defendants? I think not. Speaking for myself only, I think that the order of this court allowing the Perlak Co. to intervene was made because the court was of opinion that after the admission of liability by the defendants the dispute had resolved itself into a question of whether the Fondsenbezit Co. or the Perlak Co. were entitled to receive the money owing by the defendants to the plaintiff Deen."

A That discloses an almost similar position to that which has arisen in the present case. The lord justice goes on:

"As a result I think that the court has jurisdiction in the present case, without in the least infringing on the accepted rule that a foreigner who is made a defendant should not be ordered to give security for costs, to make an order requiring the Perlak Co. to give security."

B Applying that to this case, it is clear that I have jurisdiction to order Tudor Furnishers Ltd. to give security. The learned lord justice continues:

"... but having regard to the fact that the plaintiffs who are applying for the order are themselves in precisely the same position in relation to the dispute as the Perlak Co. are and are not offering themselves to give security, I think that the court should exercise its discretion as it did in the case of Belmonte v. Aynard (4) and refuse to make any order."

C It is clear from that latter passage which I have read that a reason which militated in the mind of BANKES, L.J., against making any order for security was that the party applying for security did not itself offer to give security. Nobody disputes that the Finer Production Co., Ltd., being in liquidation, could themselves be the object of an application for an order that they give security for costs. The question has been expressly left open by BANKES, L.J., and it is clear from his reasoning that the court in a case such as the present has the alternatives I have mentioned, either to see that security is provided by both or to make no order against either.

D At a late stage of the proceedings, faced with this judgment, counsel for Finer Production Co., Ltd., offered that that company should give security to the same amount as might be ordered against Tudor Furnishers Ltd. Counsel for Tudor Furnishers Ltd., argued that, even in face of that offer, it was not right to make any order his ground being that, owing to some fortuitous circumstance, one party might be able to offer security for costs while the other was unable to do so, and that might produce the result that an impecunious litigant

E would be unable to pursue his claim. On the other hand, as the parties are in the same position, I do not myself see why the plaintiffs, Tudor Furnishers Ltd., should be enabled to pursue their claim, their financial position being as I have already mentioned, without providing some sort of security for the costs which will necessarily be incurred by the Finer Production Co., Ltd., on the issue. Therefore, I think this is a case in which, having regard to the fact that Finer

G Production Co., Ltd., have offered to provide security for costs, I should make an order against Tudor Furnishers Ltd. to give security for costs. The action has only reached the stage when the pleadings have been closed and discovery has not yet been had. Having regard to that circumstance, only a small sum should be ordered at this stage, and I propose to order that Tudor Furnishers Ltd. should give security for costs in the sum of £50 conditional on the payment into court of a similar sum by Finer Production Co., Ltd., and that there be liberty to renew the application at the close of discovery.

H

Order for security to be given accordingly. Costs to be costs in the action.

Solicitors: Sidney Pearlman (for the applicants); Herbert Baron & Co. (for the respondents).

[Reported by H. McL. MORRISON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re ITTER (deceased). DEDMAN AND OTHERS v. GODFREY AND ANOTHER.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Ormerod, J.), November 10, December 2, 1949.]

Will—Alteration after execution—Evidence of original contents—“ Apparent ”—Original words photographed by use of infra-red rays—Not visible on document itself unless slips removed—Wills Act, 1837 (c. 26), s. 21.

Where a will or codicil has been altered after the execution thereof and the words or effect of the will before such alteration can only be read or ascertained by such scientific means as the photographing of the document by the use of infra-red rays such words or effect are not “ apparent ” within s. 21 of the Wills Act, 1837.

The testatrix, who died on Apr. 6, 1946, made her will on Nov. 5, 1942, and a codicil thereto on Feb. 22, 1944. By the codicil she gave certain pecuniary legacies to the plaintiffs, but, after executing the codicil, she pasted a slip of paper over the amount given in each case. A sum of money was written on each slip, which was signed by the testatrix, but was not attested, as required by the Wills Act, 1837, s. 9 and s. 21. Pursuant to an order of the court, the codicil was examined by a handwriting expert who was not able to ascertain what was under the slips by looking at the document itself and without removing the slips, but he was able, by the use of infra-red rays, to take a photograph (which was produced to the court) of the parts of the codicil which were under the slips. It was thus shown that in some of the cases alterations had been made in the codicil itself before the slips were pasted on.

HELD : “ apparent ” in s. 21 of the Wills Act, 1837, meant “ apparent on the face of the instrument itself,” and, as the words which had been covered over by the slips could be read only on the creation of a new document, i.e., a photograph of the original writing on the codicil, they were not “ apparent ” within the meaning of s. 21 of the Act of 1837.

Townley v. Watson, (1844) (2 L.T.O.S. 376), applied.

[AS TO ALTERATIONS IN WILL, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 70-73, paras. 94-97 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 306-309, Nos. 1369-1406.]

AS TO DEPENDENT RELATIVE REVOCATION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 89, 90, para. 127 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 361-365, Nos. 1944-1978.]

Case referred to :

- (1) Townley v. Watson, (1844), 3 Curt. 761 ; 3 Notes of Cases, 17 ; 2 L.T.O.S. 376 ; 44 Digest 306, 1374.

PROBATE ACTION.

The plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to certain legacies under a codicil to the will of the testatrix, who died on Apr. 6, 1946. On some date after she had executed the codicil the testatrix covered the amounts given by the legacies with slips of paper on each of which a sum of money had been written, but the new bequests could not take effect as they had not been duly executed, and letters of administration were granted to the defendants with blanks referring to the matter covered by the slips. On an application by the plaintiffs, ORMEROD, J., made an order, dated Nov. 10, 1948, and reported ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1052), for a handwriting expert to be appointed to examine the codicil. The expert was unable to find out what was under the slips by looking at the document itself without removing the slips, but he was able to produce a photograph, taken by infra-red rays, of the parts of the codicil under the slips. ORMEROD, J., now held (a) that the words and figures under the slips were not "apparent" within the meaning of the Wills Act, 1837, s. 21, and (b) that it was the intention of the testatrix to revoke the original bequests only if new bequests were effectually substituted, and, accordingly, he gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and made an order revoking the original grant of letters of administration and granting to the defendants letters of administration of the will and codicil annexed, with the inclusion of the original writing in the codicil. The facts appear in the judgment.

Middleton, K.C., and Sophian for the plaintiffs.

Tyndale, K.C., and R. J. A. Temple for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 2. ORMEROD, J., read the following judgment. In this case the plaintiffs claim as legatees under a codicil of Feb. 22, 1944, to the will, dated Nov. 5, 1942, of Ivy Eveline Itter, deceased, and ask that the letters of administration for the said will and codicil annexed should be granted to the defendants, or some other proper person, with the inclusion of the original writing in the codicil. The defendants, on the other hand, claim that the testator revoked certain legacies by pasting slips of paper over the amounts of the legacies.

On Nov. 5, 1942, the deceased executed her will, which was duly signed and attested, and no question arises on it. On Feb. 22, 1944, she executed a codicil to her will, the codicil being attested by Miss Ethel Leach and Miss E. M. Weir, both of whom worked at the office where the testator was employed. It is agreed for both parties that both the will and the codicil were properly executed. It should be noted, however, that Mr. Harrison, one of the witnesses to the will, and the two witnesses to the codicil gave evidence of the circumstances in which the will and codicil were signed, but no one was able to give to the court any information about the testatrix or her intentions, and no such evidence appeared to be available. At some time after executing the codicil the testatrix pasted slips of paper over the amounts of certain legacies. There were six slips in all, and in each case they appeared to be pasted over the amounts of the legacies only. In each case a sum of money had been written on the slip and each slip had been signed by the testatrix. I think it is fair to say that it appeared to be clear that it was the intention of the testatrix to bequeath to the respective legatees the amounts written on the slips of paper, but her signatures on these slips were not attested, as required by the Wills Act, 1837, s. 9 and s. 21.

Before the hearing an examination of the codicil was made by Captain Wilkins, a handwriting expert appointed for the purpose. He took photographs of the document by the use of infra-red rays and was able to produce to the court a photograph of the parts of the codicil which were under the slips of paper. I accepted Captain Wilkins' evidence of the original figures, and, indeed, his evidence was not disputed by counsel on either side on this point. He said, however, that he was only able to find out what was under the slips by taking the photograph. He could not, by the assistance of any modern scientific means in his possession or known to him, see what was on the codicil by looking at the document itself without removing the slips. I am asked by the plaintiffs to say that in these circumstances the words and figures under the slips are "apparent" within the meaning of s. 21 of the Wills Act, 1837. I cannot accept this contention. As SIR H. JENNER FUST said (3 Curt. 764) in Townley v. Watson (1), which deals with this point, "apparent" must mean "apparent on the face of the instrument itself." If the words of the document can be read by looking at the document itself, then they are, I think, "apparent" within the meaning of the section, however elaborate may be the devices used to assist the eye and however skilled the eye which is being used, but, if they can only be read by creating a new document, e.g., by producing a photograph of the original writing on the codicil, as in this case, then I cannot find that the words are "apparent." They may be discoverable, and in this case they have been proved to be so, but that is not the word used in the section.

It is, however, argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that, even if the original words on the codicil are not apparent, they should, nevertheless, be admitted to probate, since it was the clear intention of the testatrix to revoke the parts of the codicil covered by the slips of paper only in the event of her having effectively substituted other words to take their place. It is said that, if the slips were pasted on the codicil with the intention of revoking the legacies completely and it was only at a later date that the testator attempted to revive them in a modified form by writing on the slips, there would still be a revocation, but, if, on the other hand, she pasted the slips over the amounts of the legacies with the intention of substituting other amounts, the original legacies would still be in existence until there was an effective alteration of the codicil. The only evidence available in this case is the evidence of the document itself. It is to be noticed that on the first of the slips the top portion of the letter "P" is missing in such a way as to indicate that the letter was written before the slip was cut from the original piece of paper. On four of the slips the amount written in is the same under the slip in each case, although in three of these cases alterations had been made on the original before the slip was pasted on. I think what probably happened was that the testatrix decided to make some alterations to the amounts of the legacies and, after making the alterations on some of them on the face of the document, pasted the slips over the amounts and wrote the final amounts on the slips. It may well be that she wrote the amounts on the slips before they were pasted on the document, as the shortened letter "P" on the first slip appeared to show. I do not think it is necessary, however, to go so far. From the fact that the amounts of the legacies only were obliterated in this way and not the whole of the bequests, I think that the inference should be drawn that it was the intention of the testatrix to revoke the part of the bequests covered by the slips only if new bequests were effectually substituted. This seems to me to be the only reason that the testatrix could have for dealing with the codicil in the way in which she did. If this be so, it follows that the slips may be taken off the document, if necessary, or any other means used to ascertain the writing which was on the document before the slips were pasted on, and, accordingly, there must be judgment for the plaintiffs. In view of the evidence which has been given by Captain Wilkins and which has been accepted by counsel for the defendants, it would hardly seem necessary to go so far as to direct that the slips should be removed, but they can be removed if necessary. The form of the order should be that I revoke the original grant of letters of administration with the will annexed and pronounce for the will and codicil in solemn form, in the form in which the words were originally in the codicil, the letters of administration being granted to the defendants.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors : Mount, Sterry & Co. (for the plaintiffs) ; Kingsford, Dorman & Co., agents for Shepheards & Bingley, Kensington (for the defendants).

[Reported by R. HENDRY WHITE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

JONES v. WHITEHILL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.J.J.), December 15, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Death of tenant—“Member of tenant’s family”—Niece of tenant’s wife—Nursing of tenant and wife for substantial period—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (g).

A

In 1947 the defendant, a niece of the tenant’s wife, went to live with the tenant of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Acts applied, and nursed him and his wife until their deaths between eighteen months and two years later. At the time of his death the tenant had become a statutory tenant of the premises. In an action by the landlord for possession, the defendant claimed the protection of the Rent Acts on the ground that she was a “member of the tenant’s family” within the meaning of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920.

B

HELD : in the circumstances the defendant was a “member of the tenant’s family” within the meaning of s. 12 (1) (g), and, therefore, was entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts.

C

Dicta of WRIGHT, J., in Price v. Gould, (1930) (143 L.T. 334) and COHEN, L.J., in Brock v. Wollams ([1949] 1 All E.R. 718), applied.

[AS TO STATUTORY TENANTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 334, 335, paras. 400, 401 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 31, pp. 575, 576, Nos. 7226-7255.]

D

Cases referred to :

(1) Brock v. Wollams, [1949] 1 All E.R. 715 ; [1949] 2 K.B. 388.

(2) Price v. Gould, (1930), 143 L.T. 333 ; 94 J.P. 210 ; Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the defendant, the niece of a deceased tenant’s wife, from an order of His Honour JUDGE FORBES, made at Birmingham County Court, on July 21, 1949, granting the landlord possession of a dwelling-house subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts. The Court of Appeal now held that the defendant should be regarded as a “member of the tenant’s family” within the meaning of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g) and so entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.

F

C. G. Heron for the landlord.

Blennerhassett for the niece of the deceased tenant’s wife.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. : The short question raised on this appeal is whether the interpretation given to the phrase “member of the tenant’s family” in s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, is to be carried a stage further than hitherto.

G

The defendant, Mrs. Whitehill, was the niece of a Mrs. Bailey, the wife of the tenant of the premises here in suit. Mrs. Bailey died in July, 1948, and her husband some five months later. At the time of his death he had become a statutory tenant of the premises. He died intestate. The defendant went to live with Mr. and Mrs. Bailey early in 1947 to look after them because they were in poor health. No child of their own was at any material time living with them in the house. There is no question that the residence qualification required by s. 12 (1) (g) is satisfied, but there remains the point whether the defendant is fairly and properly to be described as a member of the tenant’s family.

H

In answering this question we are much assisted by the recent decision in this court of Brock v. Wollams (1). In the course of his leading judgment in that case, BUCKNILL, L.J., cited ([1949] 1 All E.R. 717) these observations of WRIGHT, J., in Price v. Gould (2) (143 L.T. 334) :

"It has been said in a number of equity cases, relating principally to wills or to settlements under powers of appointment, that the word 'family' is a popular, loose, and flexible expression, and not a technical term. It has been laid down that the primary meaning of the word 'family' is children, but that primary meaning is clearly susceptible of wider interpretation, because the cases decide that the exact scope of the word must depend on the context and the other provisions of the will or deed in view of the surrounding circumstances . . . I hold that in the section now under consideration the word 'family' includes brothers and sisters of the deceased living with her at the time of her death. I think that that meaning is required by the ordinary acceptance of the word in this connection, and that the legislature has used the word 'family' to introduce a flexible and wide term."

COHEN, L.J., in his judgment ([1949] 1 All E.R. 718), also referred to that language of WRIGHT, J., and agreed with it, rejecting the alternatives with which it was suggested he was faced, namely, either that the word meant consanguinity or extended to cover anybody in the household. The lord justice said that another view appealed to him, namely, that the question whether a particular individual was a member of the tenant's family should be answered according to the ordinary sense of the word. Taking that test, on the facts I have stated, can the defendant fairly be described according to the ordinary use of language as a member of Mr. Bailey's family? It was strongly urged by counsel for the landlord that, if we gave an affirmative answer to that question, it would follow that we had laid it down that nephews and nieces of the wives or husbands of tenants were within the phrase "members of the tenant's family" in all cases and for all purposes, thus describing another circle in a widening series of rings. I am not saying whether or not that would be so. I am not suggesting necessarily that all nephews and nieces by marriage should be regarded as members of the tenant's family, but be it observed here that the defendant, a niece of Mrs. Bailey, assumed, out of natural love and affection, the duties and offices peculiarly attributable to members of a family, namely, she went to live with her uncle and aunt and looked after them in their declining years. On those facts I think that, if it were asked in an ordinary conversation: Was the defendant a member of Mr. Bailey's family?, an affirmative answer would be given. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that the defendant should be regarded as within the protection of s. 12 (1) (g), and that this appeal should be allowed.

COHEN, L.J. : I am of the same opinion. I do not think we are differing from the learned judge on a question of fact. As I read his note he seems to have come to the conclusion that the defendant could not be a member of the family because she was only a daughter of a sister of the wife and no blood relation of the deceased tenant. In other words, I think he went wrong in principle, and, on the facts of this case, that this particular niece by marriage is a member of the family within the meaning of s. 12 (1) (g).

ASQUITH, L.J. : I also agree.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors : Underwood & Co., agents for J. Foley Egginton, Sutton Coldfield (for the landlord) ; Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for Bailey, Cox, Bosworth & Co., Birmingham (for the niece).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

WIGLEY v. LEIGH.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), December 15, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Personal occupation—Tenant unable to live in house owing to illness—Intention to return—House kept in readiness for return—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 3 (1).

A A married woman was the statutory tenant of a dwelling-house in which she lived with her husband until 1940. From 1940 to 1945, while the husband was away on war service, she sub-let the house and went to live with friends in Northern Ireland. In 1945, when the husband was demobilised, she gave the sub-tenant notice to quit, as she intended to return to the house with her husband, but she was unable to carry out her intention as she fell ill and had to remain in Northern Ireland for the sake of her health. Since then she had spent only three months in the house—in the summer of 1947, but she and her husband intended to live there as soon as her health improved or living conditions in England improved. In the meanwhile, the husband stayed with his mother, going to the house for two or three weeks each year and sometimes for the week-end. The tenant employed a servant to remain in the house and keep it always ready for occupation, and she had spent a considerable sum of money on the upkeep of the house and on improvements. The landlord claimed possession of the house on the ground, inter alia, that the tenant was not entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts as she was no longer in occupation.

B Held : although the tenant was away from the house because of illness, the house remained the matrimonial home, and, as she clearly had the intention to return and had kept the house in readiness for her return and there was no reason to suppose that she would not return within a reasonable time, she was in occupation of the house and entitled to the protection of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1).

Skinner v. Geary ([1931] 2 K.B. 546), distinguished.

E [AS TO POSITION OF STATUTORY TENANT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 334, 335, para. 401, and 1949 Supplement ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 31, p. 563, Nos. 7100-7103, and Supplement.]

Case referred to :

(1) Skinner v. Geary, [1931] 2 K.B. 546 ; 100 L.J.K.B. 718 ; 145 L.T. 675 ; 95 J.P. 194 ; Digest Supp.

F APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE TUCKER, at Leek County Court, on July 25, 1949, whereby he granted to the landlord possession of a house subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts on the ground that the tenant was no longer in occupation. The tenant left the house in 1940 when her husband went into the army and she intended to return there with him in 1945 when he was demobilised. She fell ill, however, and had not yet been able to return G (except for a short while in 1947), but she intended to do so as soon as she was better. She and her husband continued to regard the house as their home and kept a servant there to have it always ready for their return. The Court of Appeal now held that the tenant was still in occupation and allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

H Fearnley-Whittingstall, K.C., and Openshaw for the tenant.
Scott Cairns, K.C., and Shorrocks for the landlord.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal by the tenant, Vida Mary Leigh, from an order of His Honour JUDGE TUCKER, who gave judgment for possession of a certain house, called "The Hut," to the landlord on the ground, to put it briefly, that the tenant was no longer in occupation of the house of which she was the statutory tenant. The appeal is put forward on the ground that there was no evidence on which the judge could properly come to that conclusion.

Before considering the facts, I think it is as well to state shortly the principles on which the court may act in granting possession to the landlord of a rent-restricted house on grounds such as those on which the judge has acted. The leading case on the subject is Skinner v. Geary (1), and the judgment most frequently referred to is that of SCRUTTON, L.J. It is not necessary to state the facts in that case, except to say that there the tenant had for the last ten years been living elsewhere with his wife—some ten miles away—and that at no time did he contemplate residing in the house again. On those facts, SCRUTTON, L.J., had some remarks to make in general which are applicable to this case. He said ([1931] 2 K.B. 561) :

“A non-occupying tenant was in my opinion never within the precincts of the [Rent Restrictions] Acts, which were dealing only with an occupying tenant who had a right to stay in and not be turned out. This case is to be decided on the principle that the Acts do not apply to a person who is not personally occupying the house and who has no intention of returning to it. I except, of course, such a case as that to which I have already referred—namely, of temporary absence, the best instance of which is that of a sea captain who may be away for months but who intends to return, and whose wife and family occupy the house during his absence.”

Later in his judgment SCRUTTON, L.J., said (ibid., 564) :

“For the reasons I have given the Act does not in my opinion apply to protect a tenant who is not in occupation of a house in the sense that the house is his home and to which, although he may be absent for a time, he intends to return. If it were to be held otherwise odd consequences would follow.”

One could reverse that statement and say that, if he is in occupation of the house in the sense that the house is his home, he is protected.

The learned judge in this case had those statements of the law before him because he referred to them in a note of his judgment, but he said :

“On careful consideration of the whole of the evidence, including the above-mentioned and the rest of the evidence before me, and including also the admitted facts, . . . I was of opinion and found that the [tenant] was not living in or occupying the house as her home and was not an occupying tenant and had no intention of returning to live there within any time that could be estimated.”

With due respect to the learned judge, I am of opinion that the facts do not justify that conclusion.

The tenant, Mrs. Leigh, who has at all times been the statutory tenant, is a married woman, and until 1940 she and her husband lived in this house, which is in the open country about twenty-five miles from Manchester. The husband carries on his profession in Manchester and, therefore, the house is a suitable place for them to live in. In May, 1940, the husband was sent as a soldier to the Orkneys, and the tenant then went to Ireland to live with friends whilst he was away, and they sub-let the house furnished. The husband continued to serve in the army until he was demobilised in 1945, and he and the tenant then intended to return to “The Hut.” They gave notice to the sub-tenant to quit and the sub-tenant left. Unfortunately, whilst the husband was on his way home, the tenant had a haemorrhage, and the doctors refused to allow her to go back to “The Hut.” It appears that she had suffered from pulmonary tuberculosis prior to 1945, and I presume that she had been temporarily cured. From that time she has lived in “The Hut” only once, for three months in the summer of 1947. The husband said that she intended to come over each year in the summer, but had not been well enough to do so, but that it has always been their intention to live at “The Hut” when her health permits, and, pending her complete cure, to go there in the summer months, provided that the doctors agree to it. Meanwhile, the husband has been living with his mother at Wilmslow, but has been going from time to time to "The Hut." He said that he generally stayed there for periods of two to three weeks each year and also spent some week-ends and odd nights there, and occasionally he has taken a friend there. The tenant and her husband employ a man who is there the whole time and keeps the house ready for occupation, and they have spent quite a considerable sum of money on the upkeep of the house. It is not necessary to state all the moneys spent, but it is sufficient to say that in 1948 the tenant spent £65 in putting in a new copper boiler and in 1947 she had a telephone extension put into her bedroom when she expected to come over. I think that there is not the slightest doubt that the tenant and her husband regard "The Hut" as their home, and their only home, and that they intend to live there when the tenant is well enough to go. The advice given by the medical advisers, as it appears in the admitted statement of facts, is as follows :

"Her said medical advisers have further advised that she should not return to the said premises permanently until her health further improves or living conditions in England sufficiently improve."

C There does not seem to me any reason to suppose that her health will not improve, and I hope that there is no reason for saying that living conditions in England will not improve in the future. I take "living conditions" to mean, in this particular case, the conditions, as regards milk and butter and other foods which people suffering from this complaint need.

D In these circumstances, it seems to me that the tenant is in occupation of the house because she has clearly the intention to return. That intention is not unreasonable, and there is no reason to suppose that she will not return within a reasonable time. That being so, it seems to me that the principle applied in Skinner v. Geary (1) has no application to this case. As regards the policy of the Rent Restrictions Acts, which is to prevent persons from being turned out of their homes, it is quite true that, if a tenant is not in occupation of the house, he is in effect keeping other people who need a home out of it, and, therefore, he is not entitled to the protection of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1), but it would be a very bad policy to hold in a case of this kind that a home occupied, so far as it could be, by a husband and wife is to be taken from them merely because the wife is suffering from illness.

F SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree.

DENNING, L.J. : There are many cases where a husband, who is a statutory tenant, is, by force of circumstances, not able to live in the matrimonial home, but is nevertheless protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts. The naval man who is away for two or three years at sea, or the soldier who is taken prisoner in war, does not lose the protection of the Acts, and his wife cannot be turned out. So, also, if the husband becomes a chronic invalid and is removed to hospital. In this case, therefore, although the wife, who is the tenant, is away because of illness, nevertheless the house remains the matrimonial home. They have no other home, and they have kept the house ready for occupation in the hope that the wife will be cured and come to live there. The husband sleeps there occasionally, it is all kept in readiness for their return, and it cannot be said that the tenant is not in occupation. She is, therefore, entitled to the protection of the Acts, and I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs in the Court of Appeal and below.

Solicitors : Gregory, Rowcliffe & Co., agents for Pattinson, Harrison & Milne, Macclesfield (for the tenant) ; Burton, Yeates & Hart, agents for Barclay, May & Co., Macclesfield (for the landlord).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister at-Law.]

PILLING v. ABERGELE U.D.C.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Cassels, JJ.), December 15, 1949.]

Housing—Moveable dwelling—Licence—Consideration of local amenities—Public Health Act, 1936 (c. 49), s. 269 (1), (2).

The appellant, who was the owner and occupier of certain land forming part of a field, applied to the respondents under s. 269 (1) of the Public Health Act, 1936, for the grant of a licence to allow him to use the land as a site for moveable dwellings. The respondents refused the licence on the ground that the site was unsuitable because such use would be detrimental to the amenities of the district, particularly on account of the close proximity of other dwellings. The justices affirmed this decision. On appeal,

HELD : on the application for the grant of a licence under s. 269 (1) of the Act of 1936, a local authority were empowered only to take into consideration matters relating to public health and sanitary conditions and not matters relating to local amenities, and, therefore, the respondents should have granted the licence.

[FOR THE PUBLIC HEALTH ACT, 1936, s. 269 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 29, p. 494.]

CASE STATED by Abergele (Denbigh) justices.

On June 4, 1949, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Abergele, the appellant appealed against the refusal of the respondents to grant him a licence under s. 269 (1) of the Public Health Act, 1936, authorising him to allow a certain piece of land in his occupation to be used as a site for moveable dwellings. The appellant contended that the sole ground on which the respondents had refused the application was that the site was unsuitable because its use would be detrimental to the amenities of the district and that that was a ground of refusal not contemplated by the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 269 (1), and so not one which the respondents were lawfully entitled to consider. The justices refused to accept this contention and dismissed the appeal. The Divisional Court now allowed the appeal.

H. A. Hill for the appellant.

A. E. Boucher for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Denbigh to whom an appeal lay under s. 269 (4) of the Public Health Act, 1936, against the refusal of the local authority to grant the appellant a licence authorising him to use or allow his land to be used as a site for moveable dwellings—caravans, camping huts, and so forth. The respondents refused the applicants' application for a licence on the ground that "the site is unsuitable because such use would be detrimental to the amenities of the district particularly on account of the close proximity of other dwellings."

In other words, they refused the licence for what may be compendiously called town planning reasons, and the question is whether they have power to consider those matters in coming to a conclusion whether or not they should grant a licence. If the local authority had merely refused the licence without giving any grounds it might have been very difficult for the appellant to have brought an appeal successfully, but I have always understood the law to be that where a duty to hear and determine a question is conferred on a local authority and they state reasons which show that they have taken into account matters which they ought not to have taken into account or have failed to take into account matters which they ought to have taken into account, the court to whom an appeal lies ought to allow an appeal. The appellant appealed under s. 269 (4) to the justices who gave this opinion :

“(i) Local authorities are not restricted under s. 269 of the Public Health Act, 1936, as to the grounds on which they may refuse a licence. (ii) The local authority have exercised their discretion in a fair and reasonable manner.”

Therefore, they dismissed the appeal.

- A The real question arises under the first reason which the justices gave, namely, that local authorities are not restricted by the section as to the grounds on which they can refuse a licence. When s. 269 is considered, especially in relation to the other sections in the Act, I think it is clear that it deals with sanitary matters only. Counsel for the appellant points out that the Act of 1936, the title of which is “An Act to consolidate with amendments certain enactments relating to public health,” is, unlike the Public Health Act, 1875, an Act dealing with sanitary matters only. The Act of 1875 deals with a variety of other matters
- B which come within the purview of local sanitary authorities, such as the paving and making up of private streets, but the Act of 1936 is a sanitary Act purely and simply. Part XI of the Act of 1936, of which s. 269 forms a part, is headed
- C “Miscellaneous,” and it starts with s. 259 which deals with nuisances in connection with watercourses, ditches and ponds which are so foul as to be prejudicial to health or a nuisance, and s. 260 gives a local authority or parish council power to deal with them. Section 262 gives a local authority power to require the culverting of watercourses and ditches where building operations are in prospect so as to prevent houses becoming damp or being flooded. Sections 264 and 265 empower the authority to do the work themselves if it is not done.
- D Section 267 makes ships and boats lying in any inland or coastal waters subject to the authority of the port health authority, and, so far as boats used for human habitation are concerned, it applies the provisions of pt. II of the Act relating to filthy or verminous premises or articles and verminous persons, and provides that the provisions of pt. III with regard to smoke nuisances shall not apply in relation to a vessel habitually used as a seagoing vessel subject to certain exceptions. Section 268, the first section in the group of sections headed :
- E “Tents, vans, sheds, etc.,” provides :

“(1) The provisions of Parts III, V, VII and XII of this Act and the provisions of Part II relating to filthy or verminous premises or articles and verminous persons, shall apply in relation to tents, vans, sheds and similar structures used for human habitation as they apply in relation to other premises and as if a tent, van, shed or similar structure used for human habitation were a house or a building so used.”

So those provisions are applied to vans and so forth, and, it may be, to moveable dwellings.

Section 269 provides :

- G “(1) For the purpose of regulating in accordance with the provisions of this section the use of moveable dwellings within their district, a local authority may grant—(i) licences authorising persons to allow land occupied by them within the district to be used as sites for moveable dwellings ; and (ii) licences authorising persons to erect or station, and use, such dwellings within the district ; and may attach to any such licence such conditions as they think fit—(a) in the case of a licence authorising the use of land, with respect to the number and classes of moveable dwellings which may be kept thereon at the same time, and the space to be kept free between any two such dwellings, with respect to water supply, and for securing sanitary conditions ; (b) in the case of a licence authorising the use of a moveable dwelling, with respect to the use of that dwelling (including the space to be kept free between it and any other such dwelling) and its removal at the end of a specified period, and for securing sanitary conditions.”
- H

Except for the words "its removal at the end of a specified period," it is clear that the whole of sub-s. (1) deals with sanitary matters.

By sub-s. (2)

"... a person shall not allow any land occupied by him to be used for camping purposes on more than forty-two consecutive days or more than sixty days in any twelve consecutive months, unless either he holds in respect of the land so used such a licence from the local authority of the district as is mentioned in para. (i) of the preceding sub-section."

That shows that a person may use his land for six weeks if he uses it continuously, or altogether in the year sixty days without getting a licence. That, I suppose, is because it is considered that six weeks will not be sufficient to cause a nuisance or to foul the land to such an extent that the land may be a nuisance. I think that counsel for the appellant was justified in saying that that is a very odd provision to find in this Act if the local authority are entitled to take amenities into account, because the detriment to the amenities or disfigurement of the neighbourhood would be permitted for six weeks or for sixty days during the whole of the year. Sub-s. (6) provides :

"If an organisation satisfies the Minister that it takes reasonable steps for securing—(a) that camping sites belonging to or provided by it, or used by its members, are properly managed and kept in good sanitary condition ; and (b) that moveable dwellings used by its members are so used as not to give rise to any nuisance, the Minister may grant to that organisation a certificate of exemption."

That, again, seems to point entirely to this being a public health or sanitary section.

We have to construe this Act and to consider whether or not the section gives the local authority when they are considering an application for a licence power to take into consideration the amenities of the district or whether they are confined to public health matters. I am not going to refer in any detail to the very complicated town planning legislation which has been the subject of various Acts of Parliament since 1932 beyond saying that it is to those Acts that I think appeal must be made if a question with regard to amenities arises. It may be that the local authority as a town planning authority may have some power. On that I need not express any opinion because this was purely an application under s. 269 of the Public Health Act, 1936, and the justices have held that the local authority have an uncontrolled, unrestricted discretion. In my opinion, that was wrong. I think that the discretion which the section gives to the local authority is to consider the application for the grant of a licence from the point of view of public health and the sanitary conditions at the site, and that they are not entitled to take into account any question of local amenities under this section. In my view, therefore, the justices ought to have allowed the appeal, and we now do so.

HILBERY, J. : I concur.

CASSELS, J. : I agree.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors : Vizard, Oldham & Co., agents for Chamberlain, Johnson & Parke, Llandudno (for the appellant) ; Jaques & Co., agents for Cyril Jones, Son & Williams, Wrexham (for the respondents).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ST. AUBYN
(SIR JOHN MOLESWORTH)

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), November 22, 23, December 14, 1949.]

Estate Duty—Determination of life interest—Successive dispositions of life interest—

A Transfer of life interest to company—Transfer of assets by company to new company—Life interest merging with reversion by virtue of ultimate disposition by new company—Life tenant owning all issued capital of new company at date of ultimate disposition—Exclusion of benefit to “person who had interest”—Guarantee of payment of annuity—Finance Act, 1940 (c. 29), s. 43 (1), (2), s. 56 (1), (2).

B The Finance Act, 1940, s. 43, provides: “(1) . . . where an interest limited to cease on a death has been disposed of or has determined, whether by surrender, assurance, divesting, forfeiture or in any other manner (except by the expiration of a fixed period at the expiration of which the interest was limited to cease), whether wholly or partly, and whether for value or not, after becoming an interest in possession,—(a) if apart from the disposition or determination the property in which the interest subsisted would have passed on the death under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, that property shall be deemed by virtue of this section to be included as to the whole thereof in the property passing on the death . . . (2) Where the relevant disposition or determination was bona fide effected or suffered three years before the death (or, if it was effected or suffered for public or charitable purposes, one year before the death), the preceding sub-section shall not have effect—(a) if bona fide possession and enjoyment of the property in which the interest subsisted was assumed immediately thereafter by the person becoming entitled by virtue of or upon the disposition or determination and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the person who had the interest and of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise ; . . .”

E Section 56 of the Act provides: “(1) For the purposes of s. 3 of the Finance Act, 1894 . . . if a company to which this section applies was concerned in a transaction in relation to which it is claimed that the provisions of that section have effect . . . those provisions shall have effect in relation thereto if and only if . . . the commissioners are satisfied that those provisions would have had effect in the following circumstances, namely, if the assets of the company had been held by it on trust for the members thereof and any other person to whom it is under any liability incurred otherwise than for the purposes of the business of the company wholly and exclusively, in accordance with the rights attaching to the shares in and debentures of the company and the terms on which any such liability was incurred, and if the company had acted in the capacity of a trustee only with power to carry on the business of the company and to employ the assets of the company therein. (2) Where a company to which this section applies was concerned in the disposition or determination of an interest limited to cease on a death effected or suffered as mentioned in sub-s. (2) of s. 43 of this Act, or in a surrender made as mentioned in sub-s. (3) of s. 48 of this Act, or was concerned in any one or more of associated operations of which the disposition or determination or surrender formed one, the conditions as to the entire exclusion of the person who had the interest or of the deceased, and of any benefit to him, specified in the said sub-s. (2) or in the said sub-s. (3) as the case may be, shall be treated as having been satisfied if and only if they would have been so treated in the circumstances aforesaid.”

H

Up to 1926, H. was tenant for life of the P. and T. estates with remainder to his son J. in tail male with remainders over. By an assignment dated

Aug. 14, 1926, H. assigned his life interest to a private unlimited company ("the old company") in consideration of an annuity of £7,000 and the issue to him of one-hundred shares of the old company. By a further deed dated June 20, 1929, the old company covenanted with H. to pay him during his life an additional annuity of £2,000 in consideration of his surrendering the one-hundred shares to the old company, the effect of which surrender was to reduce the issued share capital of the company to three shares, all of which were in the beneficial ownership of H. Under an agreement dated Aug. 17, 1929, the old company transferred to a new company (specially formed for the purpose) all the assets of the old company subject to any liabilities affecting the same, in consideration of the new company's satisfying all the liabilities of the old company and allotting to every member of the old company one £1 share of the new company for every share in the old company held by him. Besides the three shares of the new company allotted pursuant to the said agreement, the only shares of the new company issued were two issued to the signatories to the new company's memorandum of association. All five issued shares were in the beneficial ownership of H. Pursuant to a deed of family arrangement dated Oct. 25, 1930, by a deed dated Oct. 29, 1930, the new company conveyed H.'s life interest in the T. estate to J. to the intent that such life interest might merge and be extinguished in the remainder expectant thereon, and, by a further deed of Oct. 29, 1930, J. assigned his reversionary interest in the P. estate to the new company, for which the assignment of H.'s life interest in the T. estate was partial consideration, the remaining consideration being the allotment to J. of all the unissued capital of the new company, to be held by J. in trust for himself absolutely in the event (which happened) of his surviving H. By a further deed of the same date, J. guaranteed the payment to H. during his life of the aggregate annuity of £9,000. The five shares in the new company to which H. was beneficially entitled were agreed to be transferred to J. By a deed dated Nov. 17, 1930, H. released the new company from the said annuity. On Jan. 5, 1942, H. died and the Crown claimed estate duty in respect of the T. estate under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1. It was admitted that the new company was a company to which s. 56 of the Act of 1940 applied.

HELD : (i) section 43 (1) was addressed to a situation in which property had in the first instance been settled in such a way that it would have passed on the death of the deceased under s. 1 of the Act of 1894, but there had been some disposition or determination of the deceased's interest in his lifetime which had prevented the property from so passing, and, therefore, the words "if apart from the disposition" in s. 43 (1) (a) must be construed as meaning "if but for the disposition," and the disposition for the purposes of s. 43 (1) and s. 43 (2) could not be H.'s assignment of his life interest to the old company or the old company's assignment to the new company because neither of those transactions would have prevented the property from passing on H.'s death, but it must be the new company's surrender to J.

(ii) by virtue of s. 56 (2) and the assumption of the hypothetical circumstances specified in s. 56 (1), the new company was to be treated as having held its assets prior to the transactions effected pursuant to the deed of family arrangement of Oct. 25, 1930, in trust to pay thereout the £9,000 annuity to H. during his life, and, subject to such annuity, in trust for H. absolutely, subject only in effect to its powers of management, and, therefore, immediately before the surrender of the life interest to J., H. was "the person who had the interest" within the meaning of s. 43 (2), and, as H. received a benefit in the form of a guarantee of the annuity by J., he, as "the person who had the interest," was not excluded from all benefit, and the claim which prima facie arose under s. 43 (1) was not defeated by lapse of time under s. 43 (2).

[FOR THE FINANCE ACT, 1940, ss. 43 and 56, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 33, pp. 110-112, 124.]

Cases referred to :

- A (1) Cowley (Earl) v. Inland Revenue Comrs., [1899] A.C. 198 ; 68 L.J.Q.B. 435 ; 80 L.T. 361 ; 63 J.P. 436 ; 21 Digest 7, 27.
- (2) A.-G. v. Beech, [1899] A.C. 53 ; 68 L.J.Q.B. 130 ; 79 L.T. 565 ; 63 J.P. 116 ; 21 Digest 7, 26.
- (3) A.-G. v. De Preville, [1900] 1 Q.B. 223 ; 69 L.J.Q.B. 283 ; 81 L.T. 266, 690 ; 21 Digest 10, 42.
- B (4) Sudeley (Lord) v. A.-G., [1897] A.C. 11 ; 66 L.J.Q.B. 21 ; 75 L.T. 398 ; 61 J.P. 420 ; 21 Digest 122, 917.

APPEAL by the taxpayer from an order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dated May 4, 1949, and made on an English Information laid by the Attorney-General.

C CROOM-JOHNSON, J., held that estate duty was payable under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, in respect of property in which the deceased at one time had a life interest, although that interest had been determined some twelve years before his death. The learned judge accepted the argument of the Crown based on the Finance Act, 1940, s. 43 (1). The Court of Appeal now refused to accept that argument, but accepted the alternative argument of the Crown based on both s. 43 (1) and s. 56 (2) of the Act of 1940, and, therefore, affirmed the decision of CROOM-JOHNSON, J.

D Millard Tucker, K.C., and N. C. Armitage for the taxpayer.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Frank Soskice, K.C.), Upjohn, K.C., and J. H. Stamp for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 14. JENKINS, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from a judgment of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dated May 4, 1949, to the effect that on the death on Jan. 5, 1942, of Sir Hugh Molesworth St. Aubyn, Bart., the former tenant for life of property in Devonshire and Cornwall known as the Tetcott estate, estate duty became payable on the principal value of the Tetcott estate under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, in conjunction with the Finance Act, 1940, s. 43, notwithstanding that Sir Hugh's life interest had prior to his death been surrendered and merged in the interest in remainder of his son, the defendant and present appellant, Sir John Molesworth St. Aubyn, Bart.

G H The Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, is, of course, the familiar section imposing the charge of estate duty on the principal value of all property settled or not settled which "passes on the death" of any person (i.e., changes hands on the death : Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) ) ; while s. 2 of the same Act (of which the Finance Act, 1940, s. 43, is in effect an extension) enlarges the area of charge by declaring that property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include property falling within any of the various descriptions therein mentioned, although it may not actually change hands on the death so as to be property "passing on the death" within the meaning of s. 1 itself. Sub-section (1) (c) of s. 2 of the Act of 1894 included in the category of property deemed to pass on the death property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38, as amended by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11 (with certain modifications to which we need not refer) and the provisions thus incorporated in the estate duty legislation had the effect of bringing into charge (inter alia) property comprised in gifts inter vivos made within twelve months before the death of the deceased and also property taken under any gift whenever made of which bona fide possession and enjoyment should not have been assumed by the donee immediately on the gift and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor and of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise.

The decisions in A.-G. v. Beech (2) and A.-G. v. De Preville (3) having shown that the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1), did not suffice to bring into charge property in which the deceased had a life interest which had been surrendered and extinguished by a disposition inter vivos, this omission was made good by the Finance Act, 1900, s. 11, which, to put it shortly, provided, in effect, that property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest limited to cease on the death of the deceased should be deemed to pass on the death of the deceased, notwithstanding that it had been surrendered or otherwise disposed of whether for value or not to or for the benefit of the remainderman or reversioner, unless the same conditions were fulfilled as were required to exempt property comprised in a gift inter vivos from liability to duty under s. 2 (1) (c) of the Act of 1894. By the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 59 (1), the period of three years was substituted for twelve months as the period preceding the death of the deceased before which a gift inter vivos under s. 2 (1) (c) of the Act of 1894, or a surrender of an interest limited to cease on the death of the deceased under s. 11 of the Act of 1900, must have been made or effected in order to escape liability to duty.

The Finance Act, 1940, s. 43, replaced, and substantially extended the scope of, the Finance Act, 1900, s. 11, with a view, no doubt, to defeating various methods which had been evolved of evading the operation of the old section, e.g., by means of assignments by tenant for life and remainderman of their respective interests to a third party, or other indirect methods of effecting a merger of the life interest. The common expedient of making such assignments to a company formed for the purpose had already been specifically dealt with by the Finance Act, 1930, s. 35. For the present purpose it is only necessary to refer to sub-ss. (1), (2) and (6) of s. 43 of the Act of 1940 which are in these terms :

“(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, where an interest limited to cease on a death has been disposed of or has determined, whether by surrender, assurance, divesting, forfeiture or in any other manner (except by the expiration of a fixed period at the expiration of which the interest was limited to cease), whether wholly or partly, and whether for value or not, after becoming an interest in possession,—(a) if apart from the disposition or determination the property in which the interest subsisted would have passed on the death under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, that property shall be deemed by virtue of this section to be included as to the whole thereof in the property passing on the death ; or (b) if apart from the disposition or determination the property in which the interest subsisted would have been deemed by virtue of para. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 2 of the said Act to be included to a particular extent in the property passing on the death, the property in which the interest subsisted shall be deemed by virtue of this section to be included to that extent in the property passing on the death. (2) Where the relevant disposition or determination was bona fide effected or suffered three years before the death (or, if it was effected or suffered for public or charitable purposes, one year before the death), the preceding sub-section shall not have effect—(a) if bona fide possession and enjoyment of the property in which the interest subsisted was assumed immediately thereafter by the person becoming entitled by virtue of or upon the disposition or determination and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the person who had the interest and of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise ; or (b) in the case of a partial determination, if the conditions specified in the preceding paragraph were not satisfied by reason only of the retention or enjoyment by the deceased of possession of some part of the property, or of some benefit, by virtue of the provisions of the instrument under which he had the interest : Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall be construed as affecting any charge of estate duty arising otherwise than by virtue of the provisions of the preceding sub-section. . .

(6) This section shall have effect only in relation to a person dying after the commencement of this Act, and s. 11 of the Finance Act, 1900, and ss. 35 and 39 of the Finance Act, 1930, shall not have effect in relation to such a person."

A Section 43 of the Finance Act, 1940, must be read in conjunction with s. 56 (2) of the same Act, which provides :

"Where a company to which this section applies was concerned in the disposition or determination of an interest limited to cease on a death effected or suffered as mentioned in sub-s. (2) of s. 43 of this Act, or in a surrender made as mentioned in sub-s. (3) of s. 48 of this Act, or was concerned in any one or more of associated operations of which the disposition or determination or surrender formed one, the conditions as to the entire exclusion of the person who had the interest or of the deceased, and of any benefit to him, specified in the said sub-s. (2) or in the said sub-s. (3) as the case may be, shall be treated as having been satisfied if and only if they would have been so treated in the circumstances aforesaid."

C The "circumstances aforesaid" referred to in this sub-section are those stated in sub-s. (1) of s. 56 as

"...the following circumstances, namely, if the assets of the company had been held by it on trust for the members thereof and any other person to whom it is under any liability incurred otherwise than for the purposes of the business of the company wholly and exclusively, in accordance with the rights attaching to the shares in and debentures of the company and the terms on which any such liability was incurred, and if the company had acted in the capacity of a trustee only with power to carry on the business of the company and to employ the assets of the company therein."

D Sir Hugh having died on Jan. 5, 1942 (and thus after the commencement of the Finance Act, 1940), it was claimed that, in the circumstances stated below, estate duty became payable on his death on the principal value of the Tetcott estate either by virtue of the Finance Act, 1940, s. 43 (1), alone or, alternatively, by virtue of that sub-section read in conjunction with s. 56 (2) of the same Act. The circumstances relevant to the claim are these :—(i) Immediately

F before the execution of the next-mentioned assignment, Sir Hugh was beneficially entitled for life to the Tetcott estate, the Pencarrow estate in Cornwall, and certain personal property, with remainder to Sir John in tail male with remainders over. (ii) By an assignment dated Aug. 14, 1926, Sir Hugh assigned his life interest in the Tetcott estate, the Pencarrow estate, and the above-

G mentioned personal property, to the Molesworth St. Aubyn Estates Co. (a private unlimited company incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1908 to 1917 below referred to as "the old company") in consideration of an annuity of £7,000 and the issue to him of one-hundred shares of the old company of £1 each credited as fully paid up, and the old company covenanted to pay to Sir Hugh during his life the said annuity of £7,000 as therein mentioned. (iii) By a further deed dated June 20, 1929, the old company covenanted with Sir Hugh to pay

H him during his life an additional annuity of £2,000 in consideration of his surrendering one-hundred shares of the old company credited as fully paid. The effect of this surrender was to reduce the issued share capital of the old company to three shares, all of which were in the beneficial ownership of Sir Hugh. (iv) The two annuities amounting together to £9,000 per annum were approximately equal to the net income of the old company. (v) On July 16, 1929, the old company went into voluntary liquidation with a view to reconstruction and on July 24, 1929, a limited company called the Molesworth St. Aubyn

Estates Co., Ltd. (below referred to as "the new company") was registered under the Companies Acts, 1908 to 1917, with a view to the acquisition of the undertaking of the old company. (vi) The terms of such acquisition were set out in an agreement dated Aug. 17, 1929, and made between the old company of the first part, its liquidator of the second part, and the new company of the third part, which provided for the transfer to the new company of all the assets of the old company, subject to any liabilities affecting the same, in consideration of the new company paying, satisfying and discharging all the debts, liabilities and obligations of the old company, and allotting to every member of the old company one £1 share of the new company credited as fully paid up for every share in the old company held by him. (vii) Pursuant to this agreement, the new company allotted three of its shares credited as fully paid to the holders of the three issued shares of the old company, and by an assignment dated Aug. 17, 1929, the old company and its liquidator assigned to the new company Sir Hugh's life interest in the Tetcott estate, the Pencarrow estate and the personal property above mentioned (or in the property then representing the same respectively) including all income accrued therefrom and then owing to the old company. (viii) Until after Oct 25, 1930, the only issued shares of the new company were the three shares allotted to the holders of the three issued shares of the old company, and the two shares issued to the signatories of the memorandum of association of the new company, and all these five issued shares of the new company were in the beneficial ownership of Sir Hugh until dealt with as mentioned below. (ix) By a deed of family arrangement dated Oct. 25, 1930, Sir John and Sir Hugh agreed (so far as material for the present purpose) :—

(a) that Sir Hugh should procure the new company (1) to purchase Sir John's reversionary interest in the unsold parts of the Pencarrow estate and in certain investments and heirlooms, and (2) to surrender Sir Hugh's life interest in the Tetcott estate to Sir John, such life interest to be taken, at the full market value thereof, in part satisfaction of the consideration for the sale of the said reversionary interest ; (b) that the balance of the consideration for the property to be purchased by the new company, taken at its full market value, was to be satisfied by the allotment to Sir John of all the unissued share capital of the new company credited as fully paid up and of income debentures as therein mentioned, such shares and debentures to be held by Sir John in trust for himself absolutely in the event (which happened) of his surviving Sir Hugh ; (c) that Sir Hugh should concur in the assurance or assurances to the new company for the purpose of vesting in it the absolute beneficial interest in all the property in which the reversionary interest was to be purchased from Sir John ; (d) that the payment of the above-mentioned annuity of £9,000 should be unconditionally guaranteed by Sir John to Sir Hugh who should be at liberty (without affecting such guarantee) to release the new company (if he thought fit) from all liability to pay the same ; (e) that the five shares in the new company to which Sir Hugh was beneficially entitled should be forthwith transferred to Sir John or his nominees ; (f) that, during the lifetime of Sir Hugh, his powers as governing director of the new company should not be affected without his consent, but that he should not be entitled to receive any payment from the new company by way of remuneration or otherwise ; (g) that the Tetcott estate and investments, Sir Hugh's life interest in which was to be surrendered by the new company to Sir John, should be disentailed by Sir John with Sir Hugh's concurrence, but should not be transferred to the new company or re-settled. (x) Pursuant to the deed of family arrangement :—(a) by a deed dated Oct. 29, 1930, and made between the new company of the one part and Sir John of the other part, the new company surrendered and conveyed to Sir John Sir Hugh's life interest in the Tetcott estate to the intent that such life interest might merge and be extinguished in the remainder expectant thereon. (From a recital in this deed it appears that the assignment by Sir John to the new company of the reversionary interest agreed to be sold by him had been completed by a deed of the same date). (b) by a further deed dated Oct. 29, 1930, and made between Sir John of the one part and Sir Hugh of the other part, Sir John guaranteed the payment to Sir Hugh during his life of the above-mentioned aggregate annuity of £9,000. (c) by a deed dated Nov. 17, 1930, and made between Sir Hugh of the one part and the new company of the other part, Sir Hugh released the new company from the said annuity and all claims and demands in respect thereof.

A In these circumstances, inasmuch as Sir Hugh's life interest in the Tetcott estate had, after becoming an interest in possession, been determined in his lifetime by means of the new company's surrender in favour of Sir John, and apart from such surrender the Tetcott estate would clearly have passed on the death of Sir Hugh under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, it was not in dispute that
B the case fell within the Finance Act, 1940, s. 43 (1), with the result that the Tetcott estate must be deemed to pass on the death of Sir Hugh by virtue of s. 43, unless the exemption from the operation of sub-s. (1) of that section afforded by sub-s. (2) was applicable. The question at issue was, therefore, whether the circumstances of the case were such as to fulfil the conditions on which that exemption depends. So far as material for the present purpose,
C three conditions of exemption are prescribed by sub-s. (2). The first is that the relevant disposition or determination should have been bona fide effected or suffered three years before the death. The second is that bona fide possession or enjoyment of the property in which the interest subsisted should have been assumed immediately thereafter by the person becoming entitled on the disposition or determination. The third is that the person so becoming entitled should
D thenceforward have retained such possession or enjoyment to the entire exclusion of the person who had the interest and of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise. Of these conditions it is not in dispute that the first two were fulfilled in the present case, as, whatever is meant by "the relevant disposition," the latest in date of the three dispositions here in question, namely the surrender of Oct. 29, 1930, by the new company to Sir John, was effected more than three
E years before the death of Sir Hugh on Jan. 5, 1942, and Sir John admittedly assumed bona fide possession and enjoyment of the Tetcott estate immediately on such surrender.

It is, however, claimed for the Crown that the third condition was not fulfilled because Sir Hugh was "the person who had the interest" within the meaning of sub-s. (2) and he received a benefit in the shape of the annuity (originally of F £7,000 and later increased to £9,000) which continued to be payable to him from the date of the assignment by him of his life interest to the old company on Aug. 14, 1926, down to the date of his death. The Crown's primary contention in support of this claim, both as formulated in the information and as argued before CROOM-JOHNSON, J., and in this court, was founded on s. 43 alone, without recourse to s. 56 (2), and (as developed in argument) was substantially of this
G nature :—(i) Apart from special cases of determination of life interests otherwise than by disposition, which have no relevance here, s. 43 (1) applies wherever it is found on a death (a) that the deceased had a life interest in property ; (b) that such life interest was disposed of in the lifetime of the deceased; and (c) that such life interest was determined in the lifetime of the deceased (whether by the deceased's own disposition or by some subsequent disposition
H made by a person claiming through him) with the result that the property did not pass on the death of the deceased under s. 1 of the Act of 1894 as it would have done if his life interest had remained on foot until his death. (ii) If these conditions are satisfied, then, in a case in which there have been successive dispositions of the life interest, the last of them bringing about its determination (as, for example, in the present case the assignment by Sir Hugh to the old company, the assignment by the old company to the new company, and finally the surrender by the new company to Sir John), any one of the successive dispositions (and not necessarily the disposition which in itself brought about the determination of the life interest) can be relied on by the Crown, not only as being a disposition of the life interest within the broad terms of the opening words of s. 43 (1) (which it obviously must be), but also as being a disposition "apart from" which the property would have passed on the death under s. 1 of the Act of 1894, and further as being "the relevant disposition" within the meaning of sub-s. (2). In particular the Crown can in such a case rely simply on the initial disposition under which the deceased parted with his life interest and need not concern itself with the subsequent dispositions through which the determination was ultimately brought about. (iii) The Crown is therefore entitled in the present case to rely on Sir Hugh's assignment to the old company as being a disposition within the meaning of s. 43 (1) in general, and in particular as being a disposition "apart from" which the Tetcott estate would have passed on his death under s. 1 of the Act of 1894, because, if Sir Hugh had not made this assignment, the old company could not have assigned to the new company, and the new company could not have surrendered to Sir John. (iv) Sir Hugh's assignment to the old company is "the relevant disposition" for the purposes of sub-s. (2) because it is the disposition relied on by the Crown for the purposes of sub-s. (1) (a) and the disposition referred to in both places must as a matter of construction be the same. (v) Sir Hugh's assignment to the old company thus being "the relevant disposition" for the purposes of sub-s. (2), Sir Hugh was clearly "the person who had the interest" within the meaning of the same sub-section, inasmuch as he was the person who had owned the life interest down to the date on which it was assigned to the old company. (vi) In view of the annuity, Sir Hugh as "the person who had the interest" was clearly not excluded from all benefit. The third condition of exemption prescribed by sub-s. (2) was therefore not fulfilled, and the property was accordingly deemed to pass on his death by virtue of sub-s. (1).

This contention seems in effect to have been accepted by the learned judge, who decided the case in favour of the Crown, substantially on the short ground that Sir Hugh's assignment of his life interest to the old company was a disposition to which s. 43 (1) applied, notwithstanding that it did not in itself prevent the property from passing under s. 1 of the Act of 1894, that Sir Hugh received a benefit in the shape of the annuity, and that the two subsequent dispositions of the life interest, while possibly providing the Crown with alternative grounds for its claim under s. 43 (1), were immaterial for the purposes of the claim based on Sir Hugh's assignment. With respect to the learned judge, we find it difficult to accept the reasoning on which his conclusion was based, or the argument for the Crown by which he was presumably led to adopt that reasoning. After all due allowance is made for the greater width of expression manifested in the Finance Act, 1940, s. 43, as compared with the Finance Act, 1900, s. 11, and, in particular, the inclusion in the later section of all dispositions, no matter to whom they are made, and not merely dispositions to or for the benefit of the remainderman or reversioner as in the earlier one, the fact remains that s. 43 (1) is addressing itself to a situation in which property does not pass on the death under s. 1 of the Act of 1894, and, accordingly, in order that duty may nevertheless be exigible, must be deemed to pass on the death by an extension of the principles of s. 2 of that Act. Section 43 (1) is further addressing itself to a situation in which property has in the first instance been settled in such a way that it would have passed on the death of the deceased under s. 1 of the Act of 1894, but there has been some disposition or determination of the deceased's interest in his lifetime which has prevented the property from so passing. Section 43 (1) admittedly has nothing to say to a case in which the property does pass on the death of the deceased under s. 1 of the Act of 1894, whether it so passes because there have been no dispositions of the deceased's interest, or because the only dispositions there have been were such as merely to change the ownership of the deceased's interest while preserving its separate existence as an interest ceasing on his death—for instance, where a life tenant has merely assigned his interest, not to the remainderman but to a third party, who or whose successors in title (none of them being the remainderman) have retained it intact down to the original life tenant's death.

It, therefore, seems to us difficult to resist the conclusion that sub-s. (1) (a) in providing that “if . . . apart from the disposition . . . the property . . . would have passed on the death under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, it shall be deemed by virtue of this section to be included . . . in the property passing on the death ”

means that if, apart from the disposition which prevented it from doing so, the property would have passed on the death under s. 1 of the Act of 1894 it shall be deemed to pass by virtue of s. 43. In other words, we think that “if apart from the disposition” should be construed as equivalent to “if but for the disposition,” and that a disposition cannot for this purpose be regarded as one “apart from” which or “but for” which the property would have passed under s. 1 of the Act of 1894 unless it was a disposition which prevented the property from so passing, so as to make it appropriate that the property, not actually passing, should be deemed to pass. It was argued for the Crown that “apart from the disposition” has a different meaning from “but for the disposition,” but in this context we think there is no distinction. To construe “apart from the disposition” as meaning “irrespective of the disposition” or “whether the disposition had been made or not” seems to us hardly to accord with the sense of the sub-section. Nor can we accept the Crown's argument to the effect that Sir Hugh's assignment was a disposition “apart from” or “but for” which the property would have passed on his death under s. 1 of the Act of 1894, because otherwise the old company could not have assigned to the new company and the new company could not have surrendered to Sir John. The true position, as it seems to us, is that “apart from” or “but for” the new company's surrender to Sir John, which prevented it from doing so, the property would have passed on Sir Hugh's death under s. 1 of the Act of 1894 notwithstanding Sir Hugh's assignment to the old company and the old company's assignment to the new company.

In our opinion, therefore, there are cogent grounds for the view that the disposition which in the present case is relevant for the purposes of s. 43 (1), and is also “the relevant disposition” for the purposes of sub-s. (2), is the new company's surrender to Sir John. The language of s. 43 (2) suggests that “the person who had the interest” must be the person who was the beneficial owner of it immediately before the relevant disposition. That view accords with the requirement that possession and enjoyment must be assumed and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the person who had the interest, which implies that the person who had the interest must have possessed and enjoyed it down to the date of the disposition, and thereafter have been excluded from such possession and enjoyment by the person becoming entitled under the disposition. Accordingly, on the footing that the surrender was the relevant disposition, it might well follow that the new company was “the person who had the interest.”

But the new company (as is admitted by the Crown) received no benefit apart from the provision in the deed of family arrangement to the effect that Sir Hugh, while retaining his powers as governing director, should not be entitled to receive any payment from the new company by way of remuneration or otherwise, which, in our view, clearly could not be regarded as a benefit for the purposes of sub-s. (2). This difficulty might be surmounted if the Crown could successfully contend that “the person who had the interest” in sub-s. (2) means “the person who originally had the interest” (i.e., Sir Hugh) or alternatively “any person who at any time had the interest” (i.e., including Sir Hugh), but it seems to us far from easy, as a matter of construction, to justify either of these two meanings for the words in question. Again, the Crown might succeed in making Sir Hugh "the person who had the interest" if the two assignments and the surrender could properly be treated as together constituting one composite disposition, or if the word "disposition" could be read in the plural as including all dispositions from the original assignment by the life tenant, so that, for the purpose of sub-s. (2), the effect of all the dispositions could be considered. These are difficult points and we find it unnecessary to express any final conclusion in the present case on the question whether the Crown could have made good its claim under s. 43 (1) alone, without recourse to s. 56 (2), as it seems to us reasonably plain that the alternative claim based on s. 43 (1) in conjunction with s. 56 (2) is well founded. We, therefore, prefer to leave the various points of difficulty, to which we have adverted, open for resolution one way or the other in some future case in which s. 56 (2) will not be available, and the result will, therefore, turn on the unaided scope and effect of s. 43.

As to the alternative claim under s. 43 (1) in conjunction with s. 56 (2), the matter stands thus. The new company was admittedly a company to which s. 56 applied, which makes it unnecessary for us to refer to the complicated referential definition of such companies contained in s. 58. Sir Hugh was admittedly the beneficial owner of all the issued shares of the new company from its incorporation until Oct. 25, 1930 (i.e., the date of the deed of family arrangement which must, we think, be the critical date for this purpose) and although the date of the allotment to Sir John of the unissued shares of the new company pursuant to the deed of family arrangement is not in evidence, this presumably did not take place until Oct. 29, 1930, when the assurances by the new company to Sir John, and by him to the new company, were completed, and the five issued shares, or the beneficial interest therein, were transferred by Sir Hugh to Sir John. Finally, the new company as the actual surrenderor was clearly "concerned" within the meaning of s. 56 (2) in the disposition of Sir Hugh's life interest constituted by the new company's surrender of it to Sir John. It follows that, by virtue of s. 56 (2), the condition as to the entire exclusion of the person who had the interest and of any benefit to him, specified in s. 43 (2), is to be treated as having been satisfied if and only if it would have been so treated in the circumstances stated in s. 56 (1). In view of the fact that Sir Hugh was the beneficial owner of all the issued shares of the new company, the assumption of those hypothetical circumstances in the present case produces the result that the new company is to be treated as having held its assets (i.e., Sir Hugh's life interest in the Pencarrow and Tetcott estates, and the other property above referred to) in trust to pay thereout the £9,000 annuity to Sir Hugh during his life, and, subject to such payment, in trust for Sir Hugh absolutely, with power to the new company as such trustee to carry on its business and employ its assets therein. In other words, the new company is to be regarded (in effect) as having held its assets in trust for Sir Hugh absolutely as sole beneficiary, subject only to the powers just mentioned, which amount in substance to general powers of management. If these hypothetical circumstances had existed in reality, it seems to us reasonably plain that Sir Hugh, as the sole beneficiary under the hypothetical trust of the new company's assets, would, in relation to the surrender of his life interest by the new company to Sir John, have been "the person who had the interest" within the meaning of s. 43 (2). It further seems to us reasonably plain that Sir Hugh as "the person who had the interest" would not have been excluded from all benefit since he received a palpable benefit in the form of Sir John's guarantee of the £9,000 annuity. We should here note that the question was raised in the course of the argument whether the new company ever assumed any direct liability to Sir Hugh for the annuity as opposed to a mere liability to the old company for its payment. This seems to us to be immaterial for the present purpose, except in the sense that, if the new company was under no direct liability to Sir Hugh for the annuity, the benefit represented by Sir John's guarantee was all the more valuable.

- Counsel for Sir John contested the claim under s. 43 (1) in conjunction with s. 56 (2) on (in effect) three grounds. First, he said that "the person who had the interest" must be identified by reference to s. 43 alone, and that s. 56 (2) was only available for the purpose of ascertaining whether the person so identified
- A was excluded from all benefit. We see no justification for placing this restricted construction on the language of s. 56 (2). The identity of "the person who had the interest" must necessarily depend on the beneficial ownership of the interest, and the provisions of s. 56 (2) are on the face of them directed to imputing beneficial ownership to some person or persons other than the company concerned in the disposition. If the interest in question was comprised in the company's
- B assets so that the effect of applying s. 56 (2) is to bring about a notional change in the beneficial ownership of such interest, the identity of "the person who had the interest" must necessarily suffer a corresponding notional change. Secondly, counsel argued that on the principle of Sudeley v. A.-G. (4), Sir Hugh had no interest in the new company's assets under the hypothetical trust, but Sudeley v. A.-G. (4) was a case of an unadministered residuary estate and has no bearing
- C on a trust such as the hypothetical trust here in question relating to ascertained and specific trust property. Moreover, under the hypothetical trust in the present case, Sir Hugh as sole beneficiary could have called for the transfer to himself of the trust property at any time, subject only to the discharge of any outstanding liabilities. Thirdly, counsel contended that the facts in evidence (i.e., as no other evidence was adduced by either side the facts established by the inter-
- D rogatories and the answers thereto) did not suffice to bring the beneficial ownership of the assets home to Sir Hugh on the application of the statutory hypothesis. He suggested that (for instance) there might be, in addition to Sir Hugh's annuity, some liability of the new company, incurred otherwise than for the purposes of its business wholly and exclusively, to some person other than Sir Hugh. Apart from income tax (which we think is clearly beside the point) he
- E did not attempt to specify any such liability, but merely put the possibility to demonstrate the alleged incompleteness of the evidence on a matter with respect to which the onus of proof was on the Crown. In our judgment, this point is clearly not open to Sir John. The eighteenth interrogatory in terms raised the questions whether at the date of the deed of Oct. 25, 1930, the new company would not in the circumstances postulated by s. 56 (2) have held its interest in
- F the Tetcott estate in trust for Sir Hugh as the sole beneficial owner of its issued share capital, and whether at the same date Sir Hugh would not have been the person beneficially entitled to such interest; and Sir John's answer to this interrogatory was merely to the effect that this was immaterial, without any suggestion of the existence of any facts which would have made the effect of the application of s. 56 (2) different from that alleged in the interrogatory.
- G Moreover, no attempt was made at the hearing before the learned judge to adduce any evidence of any such facts.

Junior counsel for Sir John advanced a further argument to the effect that the £9,000 annuity was wholly referable to the Pencarrow estate which, it will be remembered, was vested in the new company absolutely pursuant to the deed of family arrangement. He relied on the facts stated in para. 11 of Sir John's

H answer, which were (shortly) to the effect that the £9,000 annuity was never paid in full to Sir Hugh in any year from Oct. 29, 1930, until his death; that by a deed dated Feb. 19, 1931, Sir John charged the annuity on the debentures of the new company; that in 1931, and subsequent years, the net distributable income of the Pencarrow estate was always insufficient to pay the annuity; and that in these circumstances Sir Hugh voluntarily submitted to an arrangement under which the amount payable by Sir John in respect of the annuity was re-considered by Sir Hugh year by year with reference to the net distributable income of the Pencarrow estate, the reduced amount accepted by Sir Hugh for each year being in practice paid by the new company, and set off against the debenture interest and dividends receivable from the new company by Sir John. Admittedly this arrangement was a purely voluntary one, with no consideration to support it, and was never embodied in any formal document. On these facts counsel contended (as we understood him) that the surrender of Sir Hugh's life interest in the Tetcott estate by the new company to Sir John took effect to the entire exclusion of any benefit to Sir Hugh, because Sir Hugh in fact received, in lieu of the £9,000 annuity, only a reduced annual sum corresponding to the net distributable income of the Pencarrow estate, which must be regarded as a benefit exclusively referable to that estate, thus leaving the surrender of Sir Hugh's life interest in the Tetcott estate as a disposition in respect of which no benefit whatever was received by Sir Hugh.

We cannot accept this contention. It is plain that in origin the £9,000 annuity represented (as to £7,000 directly and as to £2,000 by way of substitution for the one-hundred shares originally issued to Sir Hugh) the consideration for the transfer to the old company of Sir Hugh's life interest in the Tetcott estate as well as the Pencarrow estate. It is also plain that the provision in the deed of family arrangement under which Sir John guaranteed the payment of the £9,000 annuity was not exclusively referable to the Pencarrow estate. On the contrary, the reasonable inference is that the guarantee was provided for in order to make up to Sir Hugh for the diminution in the income available for payment of the £9,000 annuity by the new company occasioned by the new company's surrender to Sir John of Sir Hugh's life interest in the Tetcott estate. The fact that Sir Hugh (in exercise of the power reserved to him to do so without affecting the guarantee) released the new company from liability for the annuity, thus making Sir John principally and solely liable for it, cannot affect the question. The substance of the transaction was that Sir Hugh's right to receive the full income he had previously been entitled to, in the shape of the £9,000 annuity, was preserved to him, notwithstanding the surrender to Sir John of part of the property which had previously produced that income, namely, Sir Hugh's life interest in the Tetcott estate. This result was achieved by Sir John's guarantee and the subsequent substitution of Sir John for the new company as principal debtor in respect of the £9,000 annuity. Sir Hugh retained down to the date of his death a legally enforceable right to payment in full of the £9,000 annuity, and, in our judgment, it is immaterial for the present purpose that year by year from 1931 onwards he voluntarily accepted lesser sums than the full annual amount he was legally entitled to receive. We are, accordingly, of opinion that none of the points taken for Sir John on this part of the case provides an effective answer to the Crown's claim under s. 43 (1) in conjunction with s. 56 (2), which, for the reasons we have endeavoured to state, should, in our judgment, succeed. It follows that, as we have reached the same conclusion as the learned judge, though by a different and longer route, the order made by him should be affirmed subject only to its variation so as to declare that the duty became payable under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, in conjunction with the Finance Act, 1940, ss. 43 and 56 (2), instead of referring merely to s. 1 of the former, in conjunction with s. 43 of the latter, Act. Sir John, having in substance failed, must pay the costs of the appeal.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors : Hunters (for the taxpayer) ; Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

GRAHAM &amp; SCOTT (SOUTHGATE), LTD. v. OXLADE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Roxburgh, J., sitting as additional judge), December 15, 16, 1949.]

Agent—Estate agent—Commission—Contract to pay commission on introduction of person “willing and able to purchase”—Person willing to purchase “subject to survey”.

The plaintiffs, a firm of estate agents, after being instructed by the defendant to negotiate the sale of his property, wrote to him : “ We beg to confirm and thank you for your instructions to assist in the disposal of your property . . . We confirm that in the event of our introducing a person or persons willing and able to purchase we shall look to you for the payment of the usual commission . . . ” The defendant accepted the terms contained in this letter, and the plaintiffs introduced a person who was prepared to purchase the property “subject to contract [and] satisfactory survey.”

HELD : in view of the condition contained in the words “subject to satisfactory survey” the prospective purchaser was not “a person willing to purchase” within the meaning of the agreement, and, therefore, the plaintiffs were not entitled to their commission.

[AS TO REMUNERATION OF AGENTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 1, pp. 256-263, paras. 431-436 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 1, pp. 488-503, 508-518 ; Nos. 1664-1728, 1753-1801.]

ACTION for commission.

On Sept. 1, 1949, the plaintiffs, who were estate agents, received instructions from the defendant to sell his property, 2, Merrivale, Southgate, N.14, at the price of £5,000, nothing being then said about commission. On the same day the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant : “ . . . we beg to confirm and thank you for your instructions to assist in the disposal of your property as above. As instructed we are quoting £5,000 freehold and hope to have the pleasure of submitting an acceptable proposal within the course of a day or two. We confirm that in the event of our introducing a person or persons willing and able to purchase we shall look to you for the payment of the usual commission . . . ” The plaintiffs introduced a Mrs. Smith as a proposed purchaser, and, acting on instructions from the defendant, they arranged for the sale of the property to her for £4,650. On Oct. 3, 1949, they wrote to the defendant's solicitors : “ We have agreed a sale of the above property on behalf of Mr. D. W. H. Oxlade and we understand you will act for him in the matter. The proposing purchaser is Mrs. Dinah Smith. The purchase price agreed is £4,650, freehold, subject to contract, satisfactory survey, vacant possession on completion on or before Oct. 27 next . . . we hold £300 by way of deposit.” On the same day the defendant's solicitors had written to the plaintiffs informing them that the offer of Mrs. Smith was not acceptable to the defendant who was arranging to dispose of the property elsewhere. The defendant contended that the proposed purchaser introduced was not a person “willing and able to purchase” at the date of the withdrawal of the plaintiffs' authority because the contract she was prepared to enter into was “subject to survey.” ROXBURGH, J., upheld this contention.

Stanley Rees for the plaintiffs.

Neil McKinnon for the defendant.

ROXBURGH, J., stated the facts, held that the defendant had by his conduct accepted the terms of the plaintiffs' letter of Sept. 1, 1949, as those of the contract, and continued : That raises a question of importance which has worried me no little because I have not been able to find a statement of the ratio decidendi of the many cases on this subject which are to be found in the reports. It is clear that in more than one case a person has been held to be willing to purchase although his agreement to do so has expressly been "subject to contract." It is well settled that an agreement "subject to contract" is in law of no binding effect and that a person who agrees "subject to contract" can change his mind for any reason. It is, therefore, not clear to me why on several occasions the courts have held that a person who has only agreed "subject to contract" is to be regarded as willing to purchase. I should regard the words "subject to contract" as a condition imposed on their willingness, but the trend of authority is against that view. If that were all, I should follow the trend of those decisions without comment, but no case has dealt with a willingness "subject to satisfactory survey." I feel no doubt that that is an important condition, and, in my judgment, a person is not "willing" who only agrees to purchase if the result of a survey, which has not yet been made, is satisfactory to him, for it is well settled that, if a prospective purchaser agrees to purchase subject to satisfactory survey, he is the arbiter of whether it is satisfactory. He is only willing on a contingency. I do not think that Mrs. Smith was a willing purchaser at the date when the authority was withdrawn, because she was only willing in the event of a survey, which had not yet been made, proving satisfactory to her.

There is a considerable difference in the practical result, if not in theory, between an agreement subject to contract and an agreement subject to a satisfactory survey, because, in the normal way, an estate agent's task is completed when everything is arranged subject to contract. That is the usual condition in which a transaction passes from him to the solicitor. It is likely that the estate agent will know nothing about such serious matters as, for instance, restrictive covenants. It is a little surprising to me that a person is said to be a willing purchaser at a certain price who has made no investigation of the title, though it is manifest that, if a serious restrictive covenant was disclosed on the preliminary enquiries, he would not be a willing purchaser at the price fixed. However, that is a matter for the solicitor rather than for the estate agent, but surveys of premises—testing drains, and so on—are normally carried out under the supervision of the estate agent and before the stage at which the transaction is handed over to the solicitors. It would be strange if an estate agent could earn his commission when the necessary business of having a survey of the premises on behalf of the proposed purchase had not been carried out. There is, therefore, a difference in the practical result, but I must confess that I cannot point to the logical distinction between a person who is willing to purchase "subject to contract" and a person who is willing to purchase "subject to survey." My own feeling would have been that neither of them was willing except in a certain contingency. The point in the present case is new, and I hold that, on the true construction of this contract, Mrs. Smith was not willing to purchase the property in the circumstances I have indicated.

Judgment for the defendant with costs.

Solicitors : William White & Co. (for the plaintiffs) ; Craigén, Hicks & Co. (for the defendant).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

WAROQUIERS v. MARSDEN.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Hilbery, JJ)., December 19, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Brothel—Keeping a brothel—Right to trial by jury—Charge under Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (c. 69), s. 13 (1).

A Justices—Summary jurisdiction—Right to trial by jury—Offence triable summarily and also indictable at common law—Charge brought under Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (c. 69), s. 13 (1).

Where a statute makes an offence, which is indictable at common law, triable summarily subject to the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, the prosecution have the right to decide whether to charge the offence as an indictable offence or as an offence triable summarily. If they charge it as an offence triable summarily, the defendant has no right to claim a trial by a jury except under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 17 (1), which gives him that right if he is liable to be imprisoned for a term exceeding three months.

C By the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 13 : " Any person who (1) keeps or manages or acts or assists in the management of a brothel . . . shall on summary conviction in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts be liable " to certain penalties, and, by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1922, s. 3 (a), the penalty on a first conviction is a fine not exceeding £100 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months.

D The appellant was charged with an offence under s. 13 (1) of the Act of 1885, it being a first offence. He claimed to be tried by a jury.

HELD : although the offence was an indictable offence at common law as well as a statutory offence triable summarily, the charge having been brought, not at common law, but under s. 13 (1) of the Act of 1885, the appellant was not entitled to claim a trial by jury.

E [AS TO RIGHT TO TRIAL BY JURY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 21, pp. 592, 593, paras. 1037, 1038 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 33, pp. 318, 319, Nos. 333-344.]

Cases referred to :

(1) R. v. Norman, (1922), 17 Cr. App. Rep. 29 ; 14 Digest 242, 2316.

(2) Kerwin v. Hines, (1886), 50 J.P. 230.

F CASE STATED by the chief metropolitan magistrate.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Bow Street, London, the appellant was charged with assisting to keep a brothel contrary to the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 13 (1), under which the offence is triable summarily. At the opening of the case, the appellant claimed to be tried by a jury. The magistrate held that he had no right to trial by a jury, but agreed to state a Case for the opinion of the High Court. The Divisional Court now held that, as the charge was brought under s. 13 (1) of the Act of 1885, the appellant's right to a trial by jury could arise only under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 17 (1), and, as the maximum term of imprisonment to which he was liable if convicted of the offence charged was for a term not exceeding three months, he was not entitled to be tried by a jury.

H Salmon, K.C., and Du Cann for the appellant.
Vernon Gattie for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : The appellant was charged with an offence against the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 13 (1), and it was not suggested that it was not a first offence. The difficulty in the case, if there be a difficulty, is caused by a reference to something said in the Court of Criminal Appeal in R. v. Norman (1). Brothel keeping has always been an offence at common law and it is indictable as a common nuisance, and AVORY, J., in giving the judgment of the court in R. v. Norman (1), said (17 Cr. App. Rep. 32), with reference to s. 13 of the Act of 1885 :

“The latter sub-sections create new offences, whereas the offence under sub-s. (1) is merely the common law offence, and the sub-section only makes it an offence also triable summarily.”

There is no doubt—and I think this is what the learned judge had in mind—that, if a man is charged with keeping a brothel, the offence being laid as an offence against the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 13 (1), the magistrate may, if he thinks it a very serious case, decide not to deal with it summarily, but may send it for trial as a common law offence. He cannot send it for trial as an offence against s. 13 (1) of the Act of 1885, because that sub-section makes it an offence triable summarily. The prosecutor can decide in the first instance whether he will charge it as an offence to be tried summarily or as a common law offence. If he charges it as an offence to be tried summarily, the defendant is liable on a first conviction, to a fine not exceeding £100, or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months. If it is charged as a common law offence, the defendant would have to go for trial and would be liable to imprisonment for two years and a fine at discretion. Section 13 of the Act of 1885 provides :

“Any person who (1) keeps or manages or acts or assists in the management of a brothel . . . shall on summary conviction in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts be liable . . .”

to certain penalties, and by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1922, s. 3 (a), the penalty on a first conviction is a fine not exceeding £100, or imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months. If the prosecution elect to proceed in a summary way in a court of summary jurisdiction for the offence, it seems to me that they are entitled to do so. If they proceed on the offence as at common law, the defendant would have to go for trial, but, if they treat it as an offence triable summarily under s. 13 (1) of the Act of 1885, the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, apply and a defendant has a right to elect to be tried by a jury only if he comes within s. 17 (1) of that Act, i.e., if he is liable to be imprisoned for a term exceeding three months.

The nearest case on the subject is Kerwin v. Hines (2), where a man was charged with keeping a disorderly house, the information having been preferred under s. 13 of the Act of 1885. The Disorderly Houses Acts, 1751 and 1818 contained elaborate provisions in regard to the procedure required in laying the information, and in Kerwin v. Hines (2) the necessary procedure had not been carried out. The Divisional Court held that it was open to the prosecutor to elect whether to take proceedings by indictment under the earlier statutes or by summary procedure under s. 13 of the Act of 1885, and that, if he proceeded under the Act of 1885, the preliminary procedure required by the earlier Acts was not necessary. In his judgment, MATHEW, J., said (50 J.P. 231) :

“But the procedure under the late Act which is independent of the earlier Acts may also be taken by itself if the prosecutor pleases.”

If an offence is triable summarily, the defendant's right to claim to be tried by a jury arises, under s. 17 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, where the penalty on summary conviction is imprisonment for a term exceeding three months. In the case of the offence in question here, the prosecution can decide whether they will prosecute for an offence triable summarily or for an indictable offence, and, if the case comes before a court of summary jurisdiction, the court will deal with it summarily unless it is thought that the defendant should be committed for trial because the offence is so serious or for some other reason. If the depositions disclose that a serious offence has been committed, there is no doubt that a defendant can be committed for trial, and in that case he would be indicted, not for an offence against s. 13 (1) of the Act of 1885, but for the common law offence. In these circumstances, I think that the magistrate came to a right decision in point of law.

HUMPHREYS, J. : I am of the same opinion. It is important that no doubt should be thrown by any decision of this court on the right of a prosecutor to proceed against an accused person on any charge which in law correctly fits the facts. Section 13 of the Act of 1885 has provided that a person convicted of a number of things, including the keeping or managing or assisting in the management of a brothel :

“... shall on summary conviction in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts be liable ...”

He is liable to penalties one of which is imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months. The section gives the appellant no right to elect to be committed for trial by jury, but it was argued on his behalf that he had that right. From where does he get it ? He certainly does not get it from the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, because s. 17 (1) of that Act gives a right of election only where a person is “... charged before a court of summary jurisdiction with an offence, in respect of the commission of which an offender is liable on summary conviction to be imprisoned for a term exceeding three months ...”

He is said to derive his right to be tried by a jury from the fact that certain acts may amount to two offences, one at common law and one under the statute, and they may be precisely similar offences. I do not find any authority for that proposition. It seems to me that the law, as it has been rightly understood ever since 1885, is that a person who is brought before a court of summary jurisdiction is liable to be treated in the manner provided for a summary offence. The mere fact that different consequences might ensue if he had been charged with some other offence, or with the same offence under another Act seems to me to be quite immaterial. I think, therefore, that the magistrate was right in holding that the appellant had no right of election to go before a jury. I would add that I entirely agree with my Lord that, if a magistrate in any such case comes to the conclusion that, owing to special circumstances, it would be in the interests of justice that the defendant should be sent to take his trial before a jury, when he would be liable to a much heavier punishment, the magistrate has the right to commit him for trial, whether he likes it or not, but, in my view, unless the magistrate chooses to act in that way, or unless the prosecutor chooses to prefer a charge of keeping a brothel at common law, there is no right of election.

HILBERY, J. : I concur.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors : Albin Hunt & Stein (for the appellant) ; Allen & Son (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

---

JACOBS v. JACOBS AND CEEN (CEEN v. JACOBS).

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Pilcher, J.), December 14, 1949.]

Divorce—Damages—Claim against co-respondent—Competence—Husband not domiciled in England.

The husband, who was domiciled and resident in South Africa, filed a petition in that country for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent in England. No claim was made for damages in those proceedings, but before the action was tried the husband filed a petition in England claiming damages against the co-respondent. A decree of divorce having been granted to the husband in South Africa, the co-respondent entered an appearance under protest to the English petition, contending that the English court had no jurisdiction because the husband was not domiciled in England.

HELD : a husband who is not domiciled in England can maintain a claim for damages only against a co-respondent.

Kent v. Atkinson ([1923] P. 142), applied.

Observations of SCRUTTON, J., in Phillips v. Batho ([1913] 3 K.B. 32) and of BRAY, J., in Harris v. Taylor (111 L.T. 568), not approved.

[AS TO A HUSBAND'S PETITION FOR DAMAGES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 668, para. 985 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 304-306, Nos. 2814-2828.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Rayment v. Rayment and Stuart, Chapman v. Chapman and Buist, [1910] P. 271 ; 79 L.J.P. 115 ; 103 L.T. 430 ; 27 Digest 392, 3684.
- (2) Phillips v. Batho, [1913] 3 K.B. 25 ; 82 L.J.K.B. 882 ; 109 L.T. 315 ; 11 Digest 458, 1149.
- (3) Harris v. Taylor, [1915] 2 K.B. 580 ; 84 L.J.K.B. 1839 ; 113 L.T. 221 ; 27 Digest 306, 2827.
- (4) Kent v. Atkinson, [1923] P. 142 ; 92 L.J.P. 54 ; 129 L.T. 473 ; 27 Digest 305, 2826.
- (5) Bernstein v. Bernstein, [1893] P. 292 ; 63 L.J.P. 3 ; 69 L.T. 513 ; 27 Digest 341, 3213.
- (6) Cox v. Cox and Warde, [1906] P. 267 ; 75 L.J.P. 75 ; 95 L.T. 546 ; 27 Digest 304, 2815.
- (7) Bell v. Bell and Cooke, (1932), The Times, June 10.

TRIAL OF ISSUE.

The courts of South Africa granted the husband a decree of dissolution of marriage on the ground that his wife had committed adultery in England with the co-respondent. Both husband and wife were domiciled in South Africa. After the petition was filed in South Africa, but before the decree, the husband brought a claim for damages against the co-respondent in the Divorce Division, and, the jurisdiction of the English court being contested, it was ordered that this issue be tried, raising the question, with the co-respondent as the plaintiff and the husband as defendant. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Marnham for the co-respondent.

Loudoun for the husband.

PILCHER, J. : In this case an issue which was directed to be tried was worded as follows :

"Whereas proceedings for the dissolution of the marriage between the defendant and his wife, Fanny Evelyn Jacobs, filed in this cause were instituted in the Supreme Court of South Africa upon the same grounds as are stated in the petition, the said proceedings resulting in a final decree for the dissolution of the said marriage, no sum being prayed for by way of damages against the plaintiff herein And whereas the plaintiff denies and the defendant affirms that this Honourable Court has jurisdiction now to hear a petition for the award of damages and to grant such relief And whereas by order of the court dated June 13, 1949, it was ordered that an issue as to the jurisdiction of this court be tried herein Therefore let the same be tried accordingly."

A Stated in simpler terms I have to determine whether, in an issue in which the co-respondent in a divorce suit in South Africa has been made the plaintiff and the petitioning husband in that suit has been made defendant, the husband is entitled in this court to claim and recover damages against the co-respondent.

On Mar. 3, 1947, the husband, Israel Jacobs, married his wife, Fanny Evelyn Jacobs, in Capetown. Both husband and wife were domiciled and resident in South Africa. On Mar. 9, 1949, the husband filed a petition against his wife asking for the dissolution of the marriage on the ground of her adultery with the co-respondent whose name is Ceen. In those proceedings the husband made no claim for damages against the co-respondent. At the material time, I understand, the co-respondent was not in South Africa and the adultery which the husband sought to prove in South Africa was adultery between his wife and the co-respondent which took place in this country. On June 9, 1949, the marriage between the husband and the wife was dissolved by the South African court, but, before that took place, on Apr. 9, 1949, the husband had filed a petition here in which the only relief for which he asked was damages against the co-respondent in the South African proceedings. To that suit the co-respondent entered an appearance under protest. In due course the issue which I have read was ordered, and the matter comes before me for the trial of the issue.

It is contended on behalf of the co-respondent that this court has no jurisdiction to entertain a claim for damages simpliciter against a co-respondent in this country unless the petitioner is domiciled in this country. On the other hand, the husband says that, while domicile is a necessary pre-requisite for a petitioner in this court who seeks the dissolution of his marriage and residence in this country is a pre-requisite for a petitioner who seeks a judicial separation, where the only claim is one for damages against a co-respondent, that is a claim in tort which is not necessarily ancillary to a claim for any other kind of relief, and, consequently, provided the tort was committed in this country or the party against whom the tort is alleged is in this country, this court has jurisdiction to entertain the claim whether or not the petitioner is domiciled or resident here.

F The most material sections which I have had to consider are s. 33 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and s. 189 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. Section 33 of the Act of 1857, which was replaced by s. 189 of the Act of 1925, provides :

G "Any husband may, either in a petition for dissolution of marriage or for judicial separation, or in a petition limited to such object only, claim damages from any person on the ground of his having committed adultery with the wife of such petitioner . . ."

Pausing there, it is said by counsel for the co-respondent that the words "any husband" with which that section commences mean any husband who is domiciled in the case of a petition for dissolution or is resident in the case of a petition for judicial separation, and, therefore, where a claim is made neither for dissolution nor for judicial separation but only for damages it is necessary to construe the words "any husband" as meaning any husband who is domiciled or resident in this country—domiciled where, as in this case, the suit was for divorce. He also says that the husband here is admittedly not domiciled in this country, and, consequently, these proceedings are misconceived and the court has no jurisdiction to entertain them. Even apart from authority that submission does not appeal to me. The words "any husband" in s. 33 or "a husband" in the corresponding s. 189 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, seem to me to mean what they say, that is, any husband who can properly bring a suit for dissolution (if he brings that suit), or a suit for judicial separation (if he brings that suit), or a claim for damages if he only claims damages, so that it is impossible to say that the words "any husband" mean any husband domiciled in this country. In my view, the material words must mean, in a suit for dissolution, any husband who is domiciled in this country, in a suit for judicial separation, any husband who is resident in this country, and where the only claim is a claim for damages, any husband who is entitled to maintain an action for damages in this country.

That is the way the words of the section appeal to me, but I have been referred to a number of authorities with which I will deal shortly. The first case in point of time is Rayment v. Rayment (1). That was a claim for damages against a co-respondent and the headnote is as follows ([1910] P. 271) :

"Whatever it is that determines the jurisdiction of this court with regard to co-respondents, that jurisdiction does not depend upon the domicile of the co-respondent, nor is it to be determined by the question whether the co-respondent is or is not a British subject. So far as a co-respondent is concerned, the citation corresponds with what would have been, before the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, came into operation, the writ in an action for criminal conversation . . . The claim against a co-respondent in a divorce suit is merely a personal claim for money, and is not complicated with questions of international law arising out of status, as in the case of a petitioner and respondent."

I draw attention to a passage in the judgment of SIR SAMUEL EVANS, P., where he says ([1910] P. 286) :

"Any husband may claim damages against 'any person' on the ground of his adultery with his wife, either in a petition for dissolution of the marriage, or in a petition limited to the claim for damages only, the damages in all cases to be ascertained by the verdict of a jury (s. 33) ; and the adulterer if found guilty as co-respondent may, whether damages are claimed or not, be ordered by the court to pay the costs . . . This remedy was given to an injured spouse in place of the remedy by action for criminal conversation, which ceased to exist in England after the Act came into operation. When the claim is made against a co-respondent, or against the adulterer when not made a co-respondent, 'it shall be heard and tried on the same principles, in the same manner, and subject to the same, or the like rules and regulations' as actions for criminal conversation at common law . . . The action of criminal conversation was, of course, an ordinary action for tort, and if it had not been taken away by the Act the courts here would have inherent jurisdiction over the defendant, altogether irrespective of his domicile, nationality, or residence, if he was in England at the time of the service of the writ, wherever the tort may have been committed, assuming it was an unjustifiable act in the country where the tort complained of was committed."

The learned President is there saying that the action for criminal conversation was an ordinary action for tort and that under s. 33 a claim for damages against a co-respondent can be pursued irrespective of the nationality, domicile, or residence of the co-respondent.

The next case is Phillips v. Batho (2), decided by SCRUTTON, J., and I only refer to it because in his judgment SCRUTTON, J., made an observation which at first sight appears to indicate that he took the view that a claim for damages against a co-respondent was necessarily allied with and accessory to a claim for dissolution or judicial separation. The facts were that the husband obtained a decree in the Indian courts against his wife and was awarded a sum of £7,200 by way of damages against a co-respondent. The co-respondent was not in India, and in due course the husband presented his claim in this country for the £7,200, seeking to enforce over here the award of damages made in his favour by the Bengal High Court. The point which I have to determine was not, of course, in issue before SCRUTTON, J., but in his judgment the learned judge said ([1913] 3 K.B. 32) :

- A “Ancillary and accessory to the judgment as to status is the power to give damages against the person causing the marriage to be dissolved. This power is recognised both by the English courts and the Indian courts. The English courts will recognise and enforce the judgments as to status of the Indian courts in matters within their jurisdiction, and I think they will also recognise and enforce the ancillary orders as to damages, such as they themselves make in similar cases.”
- B Reliance is placed by counsel for the co-respondent on the first words of the passage I have quoted, and I think it is fair to say that SCRUTTON, J., does seem to have regarded a claim for damages in a divorce suit as being necessarily ancillary and accessory to a claim for some other form of relief. In the case before me the relief obtained was dissolution, which involved status, but it is clear from the terms of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 33, and the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 189, that a claim for damages
- C only is not necessarily ancillary to or accessory to any claim for any other form of relief.

- The next case quoted was Harris v. Taylor (3) which was a decision of BRAY, J., on some rather complicated facts to which I need not refer. The judgment of SCRUTTON, J., in Phillips v. Batho (2) was cited to him and I think that BRAY, J.,
- D seems to have taken much the same view as SCRUTTON, J., did with regard to a claim for damages being accessory or ancillary to a claim for some other form of relief (111 L.T. 568), but in neither case was there anything that SCRUTTON, J., said or that BRAY, J., said necessary for a decision of the case with which they were dealing.

- The last case I need mention is Kent v. Atkinson (4). That case (if it were
- E necessary to do so) makes it clear that a petition for damages is independent of, and not necessarily ancillary to, a petition for divorce. The wife died during the course of the suit, and it was held that her death did not prevent the husband from presenting a petition for damages thereafter. HILL, J., in his judgment, pointed out that the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 33, abolished the old action of criminal conversation and re-modelled the law applicable to claims for
- F damages for adultery, making them cognisable by the Divorce Court, and he said ([1923] P. 146) :

- “As I understand the decisions the effect is this. You have to read into the section the principles of the common law as to actions for criminal conversation, and then strike out so much of them as are inconsistent with the provisions of the Divorce Acts which are to be regarded as overriding
- G provisions. Thus no claim for damages can be maintained if the adultery has been condoned, for s. 30 overrides the common law principle : Bernstein v. Bernstein (5) ; nor can it be maintained if the adultery is one to which a discretionary bar applies, and the discretion is not exercised in favour of the petitioner : Cox v. Cox and Warde (6), for s. 31 overrides any inconsistent common law principle. The issue in the present case therefore depends on
- H two questions : (1) according to the principles of the common law could an action for criminal conversation have been maintained by writ issued after the death of the wife ; (2) if it could, are there overriding provisions of the Divorce Acts which say that it cannot be maintained ? As to (1), the action was for a wrong done, and the cause of action arose when the wrong was done. It was a personal action, such as died with the person ; but the persons concerned were the wronged husband and the wrongdoer, the adulterer. The wife was only the means whereby the wrong was done.”

HILL, J., eventually found that the death of the wife did not affect the husband's right to claim damages against the co-respondent.

So, apart from the two cases of Phillips v. Batho (2) and Harris v. Taylor (3), which contain observations which are obiter and not necessary for their decision, there is no authority in favour of the proposition that it is necessary for a husband who is entitled to maintain a claim for damages only against a co-respondent to be better qualified from the point of view of domicile or residence to make that claim than any other plaintiff in this country in an action for tort. Indeed, in Bell v. Bell and Cooke (7) LORD MERRIVALE, P., trying a case with a jury, granted to a petitioner with a Scottish domicile an award of damages against a co-respondent. The petitioner had obtained a decree nisi on the ground of his wife's adultery in Scotland and he claimed damages against the co-respondent who was an Englishman domiciled in England. The co-respondent in the Scottish suit pleaded that the Scottish court had no jurisdiction to entertain a claim for damages against any person not domiciled in Scotland and the Scottish court dismissed the claim for damages for lack of jurisdiction. The husband then brought his claim in this country. The case is very shortly reported, and the learned President is not reported in the very brief summary of his summing-up to have made any observation tending to show that it was not competent to a petitioner who was admittedly domiciled abroad to bring a claim of this sort against a co-respondent.

Taking the view that I do of the ordinary meaning of the opening words of s. 33 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and s. 189 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, I have little doubt that, where a husband is merely making a claim for damages—that claim having to be decided in this court on the same principles and according to the same rules and regulations as a claim for criminal conversation when brought before the appropriate court before 1857—it is wrong to say that the language of s. 33 requires this court to hold that he must prove that he is domiciled in this country (if he has obtained a divorce), or is resident here (if he has obtained a judicial separation). That being so, I decide this issue in favour of the husband.

Judgment for husband with costs.

Solicitors : Moreton Phillips & Son (for the co-respondent, plaintiff on the issue) ; Crossman, Block & Co., agents for Schaeffer & Schaeffer, Capetown (for the husband, defendant on the issue).

[Reported by R. HENDRY WHITE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

WATSON v. LOWE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Hilbery, J.J.).
December 19, 1949.]

Highway—Interruption of free passage—Cyclist struck by driver opening door of stationary motor car—Highway Act, 1835 (c. 50), s. 78.

By s. 78 of the Highway Act, 1835 : "... if any person shall ... by negligence ... interrupt the free passage of any person, waggon, cart, or other carriage ... on any highway ..." he shall be guilty of an offence.

The respondent, who was the driver of a motor car, opened the door of the off-side of the car while it was stationary and struck a cyclist who was passing. He was charged under the Highway Act, 1835, s. 78, that "he did unlawfully by negligence interrupt the free passage of a certain carriage ... on a highway." The magistrate, being of the opinion that he was bound by the decision in Shears v. Matthews ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1064), dismissed the information.

HELD : the respondent was guilty of an offence and should have been convicted.

Shears v. Matthews ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1064), distinguished.

[FOR THE HIGHWAY ACT, 1835, s. 78, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 11, p. 84.]

Case referred to :

(1) Shears v. Matthews, [1948] 2 All E.R. 1064 ; 113 J.P. 36 ; 2nd Digest Supp.

CASE STATED by the Leeds Stipendiary Magistrate.

The respondent, the driver of a motor car, opened the off-side door of the car while it was stationary on the highway and struck a cyclist who was passing. On July 14, 1949, the respondent was charged before a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Leeds on an information under the Highway Act, 1835, s. 78, alleging that "he did unlawfully by negligence interrupt the free passage of a certain carriage, to wit, a pedal cycle, on a highway." The stipendiary magistrate dismissed the information. The Divisional Court now allowed the appeal.

David Karmel for the appellant.

The respondent was not represented.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : In this case the learned magistrate has not fully understood the decision which this court gave in Shears v. Matthews (1). In that case the driver of a motor car was charged under s. 78 of the Highway Act, 1835, that he by negligence caused hurt to a person passing on the highway. The court, which consisted of HILBERY and BIRKETT, JJ., and myself, decided that where a man was charged with that offence the acts of which he was alleged to be guilty must be acts in connection with the driving of the car. The man in question had stopped, and it was not the driving of the car that was negligent, but the opening of a door which knocked another person off his bicycle. That is what happened here, but in the present case the respondent was charged, not under that part of s. 78 which has to do with negligent driving, but under the part which deals with interrupting by negligence the free passage of any person on any highway. The respondent was negligent, not in driving, but in opening the door as he did. If in Shears v. Matthews (1) the defendant had been charged under the part of the section which is now under consideration, the conviction would have been upheld. In my opinion, the magistrate came to a wrong decision in point of law, and, therefore, this appeal will be allowed.

HUMPHREYS, J. : I agree.

HILBERY, J. : I agree.

Appeal allowed. No order as to costs.

Solicitors : Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for O. A. Radley, town clerk, Leeds (for the appellant).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

R. v. PAYNE.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Cassels, JJ.),
December 12, 1949.]

Trial—Sentence—Several prisoners charged—One prisoner pleading Guilty—Other prisoners tried later—All prisoners to be sentenced together.

The appellant and two other men were indicted at quarter sessions on a charge of housebreaking. On the arraignment on the first day of the sessions the appellant pleaded Guilty and the other men Not Guilty. Sentence of two years' imprisonment was passed on the appellant at once, the other men being put back for trial, and on the following day, having been found Guilty, they were sentenced to twelve months' and fifteen months' imprisonment respectively.

HELD : where several persons are charged jointly in an indictment and one pleads Guilty and the others Not Guilty sentence should not at once be passed on him who pleads Guilty, but should be postponed until after the others have been tried, so that the court, being by that time in possession of the facts relating to all the prisoners, can properly assess the respective degrees of guilt among them.

Per curiam : this direction will not apply in the exceptional case where a man who pleads Guilty is to be called as a witness. Such a prisoner should be sentenced at once so that there can be no suspicion that his evidence is coloured by the fact that he hopes to get a lighter sentence by reason of the evidence he gives.

[EDITORIAL NOTE. The direction given by the Court of Criminal Appeal in this case will settle a question on which there has been considerable divergence of opinion among practitioners in the criminal courts. The procedure now approved has been followed for some time at the Central Criminal Court and at the County of London Sessions where, owing to the heavy calendars, three judges sit almost continuously throughout the year. In those courts, if, on arraignment on the first day of sessions, a prisoner who is charged jointly with other persons pleads Guilty, he is detained in custody until the other prisoners have been tried, often before another judge, and is then brought up for sentence with them. Although LORD GODDARD, C.J., in giving the judgment of the court made no mention of cases heard in magistrates' courts, it is submitted that the direction applies also in such courts.]

APPEAL against sentence. The appellant was sentenced at Essex Quarter Sessions to two years' imprisonment on a charge of housebreaking. His appeal was now allowed and the sentence reduced to one of fifteen months' imprisonment to date from conviction. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

No counsel appeared.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant pleaded Guilty at Essex Quarter Sessions to a charge of housebreaking. He was indicted with two other men, and the judge before whom this matter came in chambers gave him leave to appeal because, although he was the youngest of the three men, he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment whereas the other two men were sentenced to imprisonment for fifteen and twelve months respectively.

That came about, apparently, through a practice of the Essex Quarter Sessions which, this court does not hesitate to say, ought to be changed. Because the appellant pleaded Guilty, he was dealt with at once in the first court where the chairman, having heard a statement by counsel for the prosecution, passed sentence on him. The other two men were put back and tried on the following day in the second court before another chairman. The clerk of the peace has written to this court and stated :

"It is a custom at the sessions for this county for all pleas to be taken on the first day and for all pleas of Guilty to be dealt with. This procedure enables the work of the courts to be arranged. If a prisoner is represented and the plea is ascertained beforehand and found to be a plea of Not Guilty, the case is put in a list on a day convenient to the court. If a person is not represented, the taking of the plea on the first day has the advantage of enabling the court to arrange its work and if the accused wishes to apply for a dock brief or for a defence certificate there is an adequate number of counsel present from whom to choose. This is not so on any subsequent day."

It may be a very convenient course to sentence on the first day prisoners who plead Guilty, but that ought not to apply where two or more men are indicted together. If one pleads Guilty and the others Not Guilty, the proper course is to postpone sentence on the man who has pleaded Guilty until the others have been tried and then to bring up all the prisoners to be dealt with together because by that time the court will be in possession of the facts relating to all of them and will be able to assess properly the degree of guilt of each. This man received a heavier sentence than the other two because he was tried in a different court on a different day. This is a most inconvenient practice and it ought to cease. I hope that sessions will discontinue such a practice. It can only lead to different sentences being passed, and will, naturally, leave a sense of grievance in the minds of prisoners.

What I have said does not apply in the exceptional case where a man who pleads Guilty is going to be called as a witness. In those circumstances it is right that he be sentenced there and then so that there can be no suspicion that his evidence is coloured by the fact that he hopes to get a lighter sentence. I do not throw doubt on that very proper practice. I am only speaking of the cases in which those circumstances do not arise. In the present case the court reduces the sentence to one of fifteen months' imprisonment to date from conviction.

Sentence reduced.

[Reported by H. McL. MORRISON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

THE TROILUS

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), November 28, 29, 30, December 16, 1949.]

Shipping—Salvage—Distinction between towage and salvage—Onus of proof—Presumption of danger—Ship losing propeller—Towed to place of temporary safety—Towed to home port via ports at which repairs could be effected and alternative service available.

On July 2, 1948, the Troilus lost her propeller when she was in the Indian Ocean about 1,050 miles from Aden, and on July 5 she was taken in tow by the Stentor to an anchorage in the quarantine area at Aden where they arrived on July 12. That service was admittedly salvage. On July 17 the Troilus was towed from Aden by another vessel, the Glenogle, to Suëz, where she was taken in tow by tugs through the Suez Canal to Port Said. At Port Said she was again taken in tow by the Glenogle to her home port in the United Kingdom. The master of the Troilus in his evidence said that he could envisage no prospect of the vessel being endangered at Aden unless a storm was experienced, and he considered the possibility of that was remote, as it was usually possible to rely on a steady direction of wind during the monsoon season. The nautical assessors, in reply to an inquiry by the Court of Appeal whether the Troilus was in danger while at anchor off Aden, said that there was no immediate danger, but in the event of an unusual gale springing up she would certainly have been in greater danger than a ship with all her main power available. No evidence was given of the possibility of a gale at that season. At Suez, the owners of the Troilus had the choice of discharging the cargo and putting the ship in dry dock, and at Port Said they had the choice of repairing the ship or engaging another ship to tow, but they chose to continue the towage by the Glenogle. The owners of the cargo on board the Troilus, who would be liable to a proportion of salvage charges, claimed that the services rendered to the Troilus after her arrival at Aden were not salvage services but towage. A

HELD : (i) it was a question of fact whether the Troilus was in danger when at anchorage at Aden, and, although generally the onus of proving danger was on the person claiming salvage, where a vessel, having lost her propeller, could not be moved under her own power, the onus of proof shifted and danger was presumed unless the person disputing the salvage could show that the state of danger had come to an end. On the facts, it appeared that the Troilus remained in danger while at anchorage at Aden where she had anchored merely as a temporary measure pending the resumption of the salvage service. B

(ii) a call at one or more intermediate ports, where a disabled vessel might lie in temporary safety in the ordinary sense of the words, did not change the character of a salvage service and convert it into towage, and, therefore, the whole of the services rendered in towing the Troilus from Aden to the home port in the United Kingdom were salvage services. C

The Syria, (1874), PRITCHARD'S ADMIRALTY DIGEST, 3rd ed., vol. II, p. 1928 ; SHIPPING AND MERCANTILE GAZETTE, July 7, 1874, applied. D

Dicta of WILLMER, J., in The Glaucus (1948) (81 Ll.L. Rep. 266), disapproved.

[AS TO CONDITIONS OF A SALVAGE SERVICE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 30, pp. 886-888, paras. 1185-1190 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 41, pp. 827-829, 833-838, Nos. 6859-6887, 6937-6994.] E

Cases referred to :

- (1) The Minnehaha, (1861), 1 Lush. 335 ; sub nom., Ward v. M'Corkill, The Minnehaha, 15 Moo. P.C.C. 133 ; 4 L.T. 810 ; sub nom., The Storm King and The United Kingdom (Owners) v. The Minnehaha (Owners), 30 L.J.P.M. & A. 211 ; 41 Digest 676, 5056. F
- (2) The Glaucus, (1948), 81 Ll.L. Rep. 262.
- (3) The Reward, (1841), 1 Wm. Rob. 174 ; 8 L.T. 704 ; 41 Digest 833, 6937.
- (4) The Princess Alice, (1849), 3 Wm. Rob. 138 ; 6 Notes of Cases, 584 ; 41 Digest 836, 6972.
- (5) The Batavier, (1853), 1 Ecc. & Ad. 169 ; 41 Digest 828, 6871. G
- (6) The Kingalock, (1854), 1 Ecc. & Ad. 263 ; 41 Digest 838, 6993.
- (7) The Charlotte, (1848), 3 Wm. Rob. 68 ; 6 Notes of Cases 279 ; 11 L.T.O.S. 473 ; 41 Digest 862, 7310.
- (8) The Strathnaver, (1875), 1 App. Cas. 58 ; 34 L.T. 143 ; 41 Digest 828, 6875.
- (9) The Wilhelmine, (1842), 1 Notes of Cases, 376 ; 7 L.T. 441 ; 41 Digest 827, 6859. H
- (10) The Syria, (1874), see PRITCHARD'S ADMIRALTY DIGEST, 3rd ed., vol. II, p. 1928 ; and SHIPPING AND MERCANTILE GAZETTE, July 7, 1874.
- (11) The Idomeneus, (1925), 22 Ll.L. Rep. 299.
- (12) The Laomedon, (1925), 23 Ll.L. Rep. 230.
- (13) The Industry, (1835), 3 Hag. Adm. 203 ; 41 Digest p. 1928 ; and SHIPPING AND MERCANTILE GAZETTE, July 7, 1874, 840, 7021.

(14) Anderson v. Ocean S.S. Co., (1884), 10 App. Cas. 107 ; 54 L.J.Q.B. 192 ; 52 L.T. 441 ; 41 Digest 601, 4281.

APPEAL by the owners of cargo lately laden on board the S.S. Troilus against an award of £22,000 by LORD MERRIMAN, P., made on May 12, 1949, in an action brought by the owners, master and crew of the motorship Glenogle for salvage services rendered by them to the Troilus, her cargo and freight. There was no appeal by the owners of the Troilus from the award. The Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

Nelson, K.C., and Vere Hunt for the cargo owners.

Naisby, K.C., and J. B. Hewson for the owners, master and crew of the Glenogle.

Curr. adv. vult.

Dec. 16. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal by the owners of cargo lately laden on board the steamship Troilus against an award of £22,000 by LORD MERRIMAN, P., in an action brought by the owners, master and crew of the motorship Glenogle for salvage services rendered by them to the steamship Troilus, her cargo and freight. The award is in respect of services to the ship, cargo and freight, and the owners of the cargo on board the Troilus are normally liable to pay such part of the total award as is proportionate to the values of the salvaged property. These values were agreed at—Ship £193,350 ; cargo £888,000; and freight at risk £15,410. There is no appeal by the owners of the Troilus from the award of the President.

The material facts were not in dispute. On July 2, 1948, the Troilus when in the Indian Ocean and about 1,050 miles from Aden, bound from Australia to Liverpool with a general cargo, lost her propeller by fracture of the tail shaft at the end of the stern tube. On July 5, the motorship Stentor took the Troilus in tow, and towed her to Aden, and the Troilus dropped anchor in the quarantine anchorage there on the evening of July 12. The position of the Troilus when at anchor was about twelve cables north eastward of the Pinnacle Rock in about five fathoms of water. Messrs. Alfred Holt & Co., Ltd., are the managers of the Troilus and of the Stentor, which are both owned by the Ocean Steamship Co., Ltd. They are also managers of the motor vessel Glenogle owned by the Glen Line Co., Ltd. On July 9, Alfred Holt & Co. by wireless had asked the master of the Glenogle whether he could tow the Troilus from Aden to Liverpool, and the master of the Glenogle replied "Yes." The Glenogle is a twin screw motor ship of 9,513 tons gross register, and was bound from Australia to the United Kingdom with a general cargo. On July 13, the master of the Troilus told the master of the Stentor (who was then ready to resume towage to Suez) that he would not be ready for two days, and on July 14 the owners of the Stentor instructed her master to proceed on his voyage if the master of the Troilus was satisfied to lie at anchor off Aden. On the same day Alfred Holt & Co. sent instructions to the Glenogle to tow the Troilus to the United Kingdom. The Stentor then proceeded on her voyage. The Stentor had a single screw, while the twin screws of the Glenogle presumably made her more efficient for towing purposes. The Stentor also had to call at various ports in the Mediterranean en route for England.

In the present action the owners, master and crew of the Stentor claimed salvage for services rendered to the cargo in the Troilus, and her master and crew also claimed salvage for services to the Troilus herself. The President awarded the sum of £18,000 in respect of these claims. There is no appeal from that award.

On July 16, the Glenogle arrived at Aden, and on July 17, made fast to the Troilus which had remained at anchor in the same position, and started to tow her to Suez. The Troilus, which was an American liberty ship, was not carrying a spare propellor and tail shaft, but there was a spare of each in England. Alfred Holt & Co. considered the question of sending these spares out to the Troilus, and made inquiries for that purpose. On July 16, they received a cable from Port Said to say that the engineering works there could fit the spare propeller to the Troilus by tilting her stern sufficiently to clear the shaft aperture above the water line, and estimated the time, including the handling of cargo, at a month. On July 20, Alfred Holt & Co. inquired whether a dry dock at Malta was available for the Troilus on about Aug. 1, and the reply was that no docks were available before the end of September. On July 21, they cabled Port Said to ask whether a dry dock was available at Alexandria for the Troilus to be docked with cargo on board, and received the reply on July 22—"suitable dry dock not available before Aug. 15 not guaranteed do not recommend." About July 22, Alfred Holt & Co. also inquired whether there was any suitable tug in the locality which could tow the Troilus to the United Kingdom, and ascertained that the tug Empire John, belonging to William Watkins, Ltd., would be available at Taranto on or about July 30, and would be able to tow the Troilus at approximately four knots, and the owners of the tug gave a quotation of £6,000 to tow the Troilus from off Malta to Liverpool. Alfred Holt & Co., however, were unwilling to entrust the ship to one tug for towage across the Bay of Biscay, and decided that the most satisfactory course, in the interests of all concerned in the safety of ship and cargo, was for the Glenogle to tow the Troilus to Falmouth. The Glenogle towed the Troilus to Suez, which was reached on July 25, at an average speed of 6.8 knots. Tugs then towed the Troilus through the Suez Canal, and on July 29, the Glenogle, having proceeded through the canal ahead of the Troilus, made fast to her outside Port Said, and continued with the towage. On Aug. 3, the vessels were near Malta, and on that day tug and tow were proceeding at a speed of  $8\frac{1}{2}$  knots. On Aug. 8, they passed Gibraltar, and on Aug. 15, they reached Falmouth Bay. The Troilus then anchored and was subsequently towed to Liverpool by two tugs. The average speed of the towage from Port Said to Falmouth, a distance of 2,980 miles, was 7.3 knots. The cargo owners admitted that, if the claim of the Glenogle was salvage, the amount of the award was not excessive.

Before this court the main point taken by counsel for the cargo owners was that the ship and her cargo were in safety when at anchor at Aden, and that, if towage of a ship without a propeller starts when the ship is in safety, it is not, in its inception, at any rate, a salvage service, but merely towage. It may be converted into salvage during the service for the reasons indicated in The Minnehaha (1), but it starts as towage. If it is merely towage then, in my opinion, (a) the master and crew of the "tug" have no claim against the "tow" or her cargo; (b) the value of the property towed is immaterial when the court fixes a reasonable remuneration for the towage, and (c) the owners of the "tug" have no direct claim against the owners of the cargo for towage remuneration, but must look for payment to the owners of the "tow" with whom the towage contract has been made. The first question, therefore, is this: Was the Troilus when at anchor in Aden in such a position of safety that removal from that position was merely towage and not salvage? The President, on this point, held that she was not then in a safe position and that she was in danger. He said in his judgment:

"I do not think that there is any dispute so far as the thirteen-hundred miles from Aden to Suez is concerned—there certainly has not been any dispute about it in this court—that that also was a salvage service. For one thing counsel for the cargo owners expressly admitted that in substance he could not distinguish this case from that of The Glaucus (2) decided by WILLMER, J. As to that I agree, and I gladly follow that case, not merely because I ought to follow it, unless I see some very good reason to the contrary, but because it seems to me that it is right. Nobody can possibly pretend that for a ship of the size of the Troilus and in the circumstances of this case, taking them quite broadly, Aden was a safe port of refuge. She was not allowed into the inner harbour there, she had to anchor in the quarantine area, and that was manifestly an arrangement which could only last for a short time. She was not really in a safe position there, and if something bad in the way of weather had occurred she might have been in very great danger."

A I have not been able to find in the statement of the master of the Troilus any reference to a request by him or refusal to him to anchor in the inner harbour, but the President may have been referring to some statement by the master of the Stentor which was before him, but was omitted from the record before us.

B In The Glaucus (2), the facts were very similar to the present case, except that the Glaucus did not lose her propeller, but at sea suffered serious damage to both her main boilers, and was unable to steam until she had extensive repairs. The Rhesus towed her to Aden, and she was anchored in the quarantine anchorage on Jan. 9. There were no adequate repair facilities at Aden, and on Jan 16, the Antenor took the Glaucus in tow, and towed her to Suez. The question raised in argument was whether the Glaucus, while at anchor off Aden, was in danger.

C On that point WILLMER, J., said (81 Ll.L.Rep. 266) :

"... it is said that, a position of safety having been reached at Aden, any subsequent services could not in any event be regarded as salvage services. I am not going to deal at great length with that point, having reached a very clear conclusion on the matter... In this case at all material times the Glaucus was a damaged ship; she was incapable of any manoeuvres whatever under her own power; and in those circumstances, it seems to me both as a matter of authority and as a matter of common sense, that I must regard her as being still in a position of danger when she had been taken to Aden."

E The learned judge pointed out that, if a fire had started in the ship, the danger would have been much greater to her because she had only steam available from a donkey boiler as compared with a ship that had steam available for her main boilers. He also pointed out that, if the ship, while at anchor, had been set adrift by some casualty, she would have no power to manoeuvre and get back to a position of safety. The judge finally said (ibid.) :

F "... quite apart from the physical danger, there is this to be added, that until somebody got her to a place where the necessary repairs could be executed she was completely immobilised. It is no use saying that this valuable property... is safe, if it is safe in circumstances where nobody can use it."

G In the course of his judgment WILLMER, J., said that the case was governed by the principles stated in KENNEDY on the LAW OF CIVIL SALVAGE, 3rd ed., p. 25. It is there stated that the rule in regard to towage of a ship which has received damage is to be gathered from the judgments of DR. LUSHINGTON in The Reward (3) and The Princess Alice (4).

H It is, I think, material to consider the facts in these cases. The Reward was driven by a violent gale on to a bank. The next morning, the weather having moderated, she was backed off the sand by means of her sails with the loss of her two best anchors and cables, and the starboard end of the windlass and bulkhead carried away. While proceeding for Sheerness to repair the damage she accepted the services of a tug which towed her to the West India Docks. The report of the judgment of DR. LUSHINGTON on the question as to salvage is as follows (1 Wm. Rob. 177) :

"In the course of the argument it has been contended by the counsel for the owners, that the service which has been rendered in this case is a mere towage service ; and that the sum of £17. which has been tendered, is a sufficient remuneration being at the rate established for towing a vessel from the Nore to London, according to a printed scale of the company to which the Nelson belongs. In my judgment, the service of the salvors is a service of a higher nature. I apprehend that mere towage service is confined to vessels that have received no injury or damage, and that mere towage reward is payable in those cases only where the vessel receiving the service is in the same condition she would ordinarily be in without having encountered any damage or accident."

It must be pointed out, however, that the Reward had lost her means of anchoring in safety, and was in that respect different from a ship securely anchored when the towage starts.

In The Princess Alice (4) it is again necessary to remember the facts which led to the judgment. The Princess Alice, while making for the Tees in a heavy sea, struck heavily on the ground where she remained for some 20 minutes. She then came off the sand and was driving before the sea towards another sandbank when the tug succeeded in making fast to her, pulled her head round clear of the sand, and towed her into the channel. On the other hand, the defendants alleged that the weather was moderate and that there was no danger whatever of the ship being driven on to the sandbank. On these disputed facts Dr. LUSHINGTON found no salvage, and in the course of his judgment said (3 Wm. Rob. 139) :

"What is the question which I have to determine ? It is this, whether the steamer, the Conquest, performed more than a towage service, it being acknowledged that a service to this extent, at least, was rendered. In order to solve this question, I now must consider in the outset what are the principles which distinguish a salvage service from a mere service of towage, as they have been laid down and adopted in former decisions of this court. Without attempting any definition which may be universally applied, a towage service may be described as the employment of one vessel to expedite the voyage of another, when nothing more is required than the accelerating of her progress. Many circumstances, it is obvious, may arise in the course of such employment, which may convert the service into the character of a salvage service. As for example : where the ship in tow is disabled in her hull or rigging, or where she is aground, or where the service itself is necessarily attended with danger, or extraordinary labour to the towing vessel. The distinguishing circumstances in each particular case require careful and minute consideration ; and it is due to the commercial interest in general that they should at all times receive that consideration from the court. On the one hand, to protect the shipowners from unjust and unnecessary payments ; on the other hand, to afford due encouragement to the owners of towing vessels to afford that assistance which is so highly beneficial to the general interests of commerce."

I may also refer to The Batavier (5), and to The Kingalock (6). In those cases the ship was at sea and had suffered some damage which might have affected her safety if she were left without assistance. There is, to my mind, a crucial difference between a ship at sea which is wholly or partly disabled and a ship lying safely at anchor where her disablement no longer is material to her safety.

In his classic work on the LAW OF CIVIL SALVAGE, KENNEDY, L.J., stated that on the important question of the nature of the circumstances that will constitute that condition of danger which is most essential in salvage, the judicial statement which is most often quoted is that of Dr. LUSHINGTON in The Charlotte (7) (3 Wm. Rob. 71). In that case the ship came to anchor by an error of her master in an exposed position off the coast of Co. Cork in bad weather, and started to drag her anchors. Accordingly her crew cut away her masts which went overboard with all her sails and rigging, and her anchors then held. On the following day the salvors towed her into Long Island Channel where she came to anchor, and was in a place of safety. DR. LUSHINGTON, in his judgment, said (3 Wm. Rob. 71) :

- A “Looking to these facts . . . I cannot but think that the service of bringing this vessel to anchor in Long Island Channel was prima facie a service of salvage. According to the principles which are recognised in this court in questions of this description, all services rendered at sea to a vessel in danger or distress are salvage services. It is not necessary, I conceive, that the distress should be actual or immediate, or that the danger should be imminent and absolute ; it will be sufficient if, at the time the assistance is rendered, the ship has encountered any damage or misfortune which might possibly expose her to destruction if the services were not rendered.”
- B This passage received the approval of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in The Strathnaver (8) (1 App. Cas. 65). Again, it must be pointed out, that in The Charlotte (7) the vessel was taken from an anchorage in which she was clearly not safe to an anchorage where she was safe.

- C I do not criticise adversely the conclusion reached by WILLMER, J., in The Glaucus (2) on the particular facts of the case, but I dissent from the general proposition, which, as I understood the argument, was presented to us on behalf of the respondents, that there was an established principle or rule that a steamship which has lost her propeller by an accident remains in a position of danger after she has come to anchor, and, therefore, any volunteer who removes her from that anchorage to a place of safety is entitled to remuneration on a salvage basis. I do not think that there is such a principle or rule. It cannot reasonably
- D be suggested, as I think, that a ship which has lost her propeller remains in danger, however securely she is anchored, moored at buoys, or tied up at a quay in a sheltered harbour. When one is considering solely the question of danger to a ship, there seems to be no material difference between a ship whose propeller has been removed by design, and a ship whose propeller has fallen off by accident.

- E The question whether the Troilus was in danger while at anchor, within the proper meaning of that word as applied to salvage, is surely a question of fact. Such danger need not be immediate. In the present case it is admitted that the Troilus was in danger when taken in tow by the Stentor, although the master of the Troilus said in his statement : “We were in no immediate danger when the services commenced and could have continued to drift almost indefinitely without risk.” The question, therefore, is whether, in the particular circumstances, the Troilus was in danger while at anchor off Aden. Counsel for the cargo owners argued that the onus of proving that the ship was in danger “lay strongly and justly” on the salvors, to use the words of DR. LUSHINGTON in The Wilhelmine (9) : see also KENNEDY on the LAW OF CIVIL SALVAGE, 3rd ed., p. 20 ; but I think that in a case such as the present where the ship admittedly became in a state of danger when she lost her propeller, the burden is on the cargo
- G owners to show that that state had come to an end before the Glenogle started to tow her.

- H How does the matter stand in that aspect of the case ? Counsel for the cargo owners argued that the very size of the award to the Stentor indicated that she had taken the Troilus to a place of safety, but I do not think that that argument is convincing because we do not know all the facts about the salvage service of the Stentor. Salvage is awarded to salvors who merely bring the salvaged property to a place of comparative safety provided the property is subsequently brought to a place of complete safety. The evidence as to the danger to the Troilus while at anchor is meagre. No evidence was given of the nature of the holding ground, the number or size of anchors and lengths of cables with which the Troilus was equipped, or as to the state of the weather at Aden after her removal from her anchorage, or as to the number and capacity of any tugs in Aden Harbour, which could, if necessary, have removed her into the harbour. The only evidence bearing on the point is contained in the written statement of the master of the Troilus and in the admitted paragraphs in the statement of claim on behalf of the Stentor. The following appears to be a summary of the evidence on the point from those sources. The Troilus, when towed by the Stentor, used seventy-five fathoms of her port anchor cable which remained shackled to the anchor. The cable was in its turn shackled to the five-inch towing wire of the Troilus, and the towing wire was made fast to one of the anchor cables of the Stentor which had been disconnected from the anchor and carried aft. A

On the morning of July 12, when approaching Aden and after the anchor cable of the Troilus had been hove in so as to reduce the scope of tow rope, the wire rope parted at the Stentor's end, leaving the wire in the water. Those on board the Troilus had considerable difficulty in getting this wire in, and the master in his statement says : B

"When the bight of our towing wire was made fast at our stern there was still a length of approximately three-hundred feet hanging down astern of us, but it was decided to waste no further time in making an attempt to get this in, but to risk towing with the end of the wire still hanging over our stern." C

When the Stentor started towing again her own towing wire was used, shackled to the end of the Troilus port anchor cable. At 7.52 p.m. on July 12, the Troilus dropped her starboard anchor in a place approved by a local pilot, the Stentor slipped her towing wire, which was still fast to the cable of the Troilus, and proceeded into the inner harbour. On July 13, the master of the Troilus was asked whether he would be ready for the resumption of the tow during that day, but reported he would need further time as the crew were feeling the effects of their exertions during the extremely hot and unpleasant conditions which prevailed. The master says : D

"We had arrived in Aden in darkness and before resuming the tow we needed to carry out the operation of heaving on board the end of our original tow wire which was still hanging over our stern, and in addition we needed to heave in the Stentor's towing wire. The towing wire needed to be unshackled from the length of anchor cable we had used for the latter part of the tow. We then needed to unshackle the anchor itself and hoist it on board so that we would have the full length of anchor cable to lead through the hawse pipe available for towing when the tow was resumed, with the towing wire shackled to the end of the cable from which the anchor had been removed. We also needed to ship a spare anchor which had been sent out to Aden for us . . . The message eventually received was to the effect that the Stentor should proceed provided I was content to remain lying at anchor at Aden until the Glenogle arrived to carry on the tow in her place. I did not in fact anticipate any danger in lying at anchor at Aden for such time as was necessary for the Glenogle to arrive and advised my owners of this fact. I could envisage no prospect of the vessel being endangered unless a freak storm was experienced, and I considered the possibility of this was remote as it is usually possible to rely on a steady direction of wind during the monsoon season. The vessel had her auxiliary engines available so that there was no undue hazard involved by way of fire risk. The main engines were also available and the vessel was perfectly seaworthy apart from the fact that there was no propeller to drive." E F G H

It is clear from this summary that the master of the Troilus regarded the service by the Glenogle as a continuation of the service of the Stentor. The Stentor's towing wire was kept by the Troilus and used by the Glenogle, and the same anchor cable of the Troilus was kept unshackled from the port anchor and ready for use by the Glenogle as part of the tow rope.

In the course of the hearing we asked our assessors : " Was the Troilus in danger while at anchor off Aden ? " Their answer was :

" No immediate danger, but in the event of an unusual gale springing up she would certainly be in greater danger than a ship with all her main power available."

A The question as to the possibility of a gale at this season was not discussed before the President, and no evidence was given on the point.

The Glenogle started to take the Troilus in tow on the morning of July 17, so that she was at anchor four clear days off Aden. In these circumstances was the Troilus in danger, within the meaning given to that word in salvage law, when the Glenogle started to take her in tow ? On the whole I think she was, and that the danger which arose when she lost her propeller had not entirely
B passed. She appears to have come to anchor merely as a temporary measure pending the resumption of the service, and not to have taken the necessary steps to remain at anchor in a permanent and secure anchorage.

The second point taken by counsel for the cargo owners was that, even if the Troilus was in some danger at Aden, she and her cargo were, at any rate, in absolute safety as soon as she reached Suez and was handed over to the canal
C tugs, and that the salvage services then ended. There are, however, several decided cases to the contrary effect, the earliest one which was brought to our notice being The Syria (10). A summary of the case is given in PRITCHARD'S ADMIRALTY DIGEST, vol. II, 3rd ed., p. 1928, and we were able to obtain from the Admiralty registry a copy of the pleadings and a copy of the report in the SHIPPING AND MERCANTILE GAZETTE of the hearing and
D judgment. It appears from those records that the owners of the S.S. American brought an action for salvage against the owners of the cargo on board the S.S. Syria, and the owners and the master and officers and crew of the American in the same action also brought an action against the Syria, her cargo and freight. The S.S. Syria, whilst bound from Cape Town to Southampton, broke her main shaft, and sustained other damage, whereby she
E was totally unable to use her machinery. She then set sail, and after sailing 466 miles reached the Island of Ascension. Then she anchored in the roads and subsequently, with the assistance of a tug, made fast to a buoy, and also let go an anchor. The crew then tried to secure her propeller which revolved when the ship was under sail and did damage to the stern, but these efforts were not successful, and it was decided to take towage assistance. Accordingly, the S.S.
F American which belonged to the same owners as the Syria, and was bound from South Africa to England, went to Ascension, and, at the request of the master of the Syria to tow his ship away from Ascension, made fast and took her in tow. The two vessels arrived at Gorée on Feb. 4, where the American took in bunkers, and left again on Feb. 6 with the Syria in tow. She towed her to St. Vincent, where the two vessels were placed in quarantine, and G remained there for five days, the American taking in more bunkers. Then they proceeded to Madeira, where the American took in more bunkers, and they left the following day for Southampton, and duly arrived off Netley where the Syria was anchored in safety. The statement of claim alleged that it was impossible for the Syria to have got away from Ascension without towage assistance, and if she had been allowed to remain there in her helpless condition in all probability
H she would have been lost together with all her cargo. The defence, on the other hand, alleged that the Syria and her cargo were not in any imminent danger at the time of the arrival of the American at Ascension, and the ship would probably have remained safely at anchor there for a long time without assistance. They also pleaded that when the Syria had been towed to Gorée she and her cargo were placed in safety, as they were again at St. Vincent and Madeira, and that the services of the plaintiffs, after the arrival of the ships at Gorée, were rendered for the purpose of expediting the Syria on her voyage, and to enable the owners of the Syria (who were also the owners of the American) to get the Syria home and to earn their freight for the carriage of the Syria's cargo, that the cargo might, if necessary, have been landed or transhipped at Gorée, St. Vincent or Madeira, and that the services, after the arrival at Gorée, were in the nature of towage and not salvage services. In the course of his judgment SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE said (SHIPPING AND MERCANTILE GAZETTE, July 7, 1874) :

"First of all, the question is whether salvage remuneration is due for towing this vessel (the Syria) the whole distance from Ascension Island to Southampton, or whether salvage remuneration is only due for towing the vessel from Ascension Island to St. Vincent, inasmuch as it is admitted, and proved, that there had been a safe harbour there for her, and that the salvage was towage . . . I have paid all attention to Mr. Butt's argument with respect to the first point, that the salvage service ceased at St. Vincent, but I am unable to assent to it. I put out of consideration the fact that both the vessels belonged to the same owners. The principle of law is independent of that fact. This service was simply salvage service, and it was intended to extend to towing this vessel to her port of destination; and the fact that she touched at a port where she might have remained in safety does not seem to alter the original contract, and make the service cease there or begin there. What the question might have been in a case where the master of the towed vessel expressed himself satisfied, and did not wish to be towed further, and made no arrangement by implication or parol, is another consideration altogether. I must consider it as a salvage service extending over the whole six weeks, . . . The defendants have been liberal in their admission that the Syria was not in imminent danger, and that there would have been danger in remaining. I am inclined to think that there was no great peril to her where she was. But I must take it that, though she was in no immediate danger, her continuing to remain there would have placed her in some amount of jeopardy."

The principle applied in The Syria (10) was adopted by BATESON, J., in The Idomeneus (11). In that case the Idomeneus broke her propeller shaft about ninety miles off Port Sudan. In response to a wireless message, the Perseus went to the Idomeneus and towed her to Port Sudan. There the Perseus picked up cargo, and subsequently towed the Idomeneus to Suez, about 630 miles away. At the trial, counsel for the defendants argued that the towage into Port Sudan was the only real salvage, and that the ships went to Suez for the convenience of the owners of both ships. BATESON, J., in the course of his judgment, said (22 Ll.L.Rep. 300) :

"It is quite true that the principal salvage was getting the Idomeneus into Port Sudan to start with, but for the long tow the Perseus has to be paid as a steamer rendering a service, and it is really an ocean tow, and, therefore, must be properly remunerated as salvage."

In The Laomedon (12), HILL, J., decided the same kind of point in the same way as was pointed out by the President in his judgment in the present case.

It seems to me that it would be very inconvenient and prejudicial to the salvage of property at sea and to "the general interests of navigation and commerce" (words used by SIR JOHN NICHOLL in The Industry (13) ), if a salvage service was held to come to an end as soon as the salvaged ship in the course of the service was taken into a position of temporary safety. For instance, a tug picks up a disabled ship in Eastern Mediterranean, and is engaged to tow the ship to Marseilles on a "no cure, no pay" basis. Then in the course of the service bad weather sets in and the tug takes the tow into Malta for shelter, and they stay there for a few days. Whilst in Malta the ship is safe from any marine peril, and I presume that her master might change his mind and tell the tug he did not require her services any more. But if he did not do so, and the tug towed him to Marseilles, I cannot think that the owners of the tow could then say that the salvage service ended at Malta and the rest of the service was mere towage, even though the towage from Malta to Marseilles did not involve tug or tow in any special risks.

A Counsel for the cargo owners also took the point that the salvage of the ship and cargo could have been carried out much more cheaply and just as effectively by discharging the cargo at Suez and putting the ship into dry dock there, or by tipping the ship at Port Said, or by engaging the Empire John, or by dry docking at Alexandria. Our assessors advise us that, in their opinion, it would be imprudent to dry dock this ship without discharging the bulk of the cargo. They also think it would be imprudent, and probably impossible, to tip the ship enough to fit the propeller. In my opinion, these possible alternatives do not affect the question whether the service was a salvage service or a towage service, B once it is established that the service saved the property from danger. The fact that there are alternative and cheaper ways of saving the property may reduce the amount of the award, because such alternative ways may affect the degree of danger. A ship which loses her propeller is obviously in less danger if there are many ships at hand ready and able to save her than she would be if there was no other help available than the ship which saves her. I have no doubt that C the President took these alternative methods into consideration in making his award.

Another point was made by junior counsel for the cargo owners which was not taken before the President and which, I think, strictly speaking, was not open to the cargo owners before us. The point was that the cargo of the Troilus D could have been discharged at Suez or Port Said, and would then be removed from the danger which attached to it whilst in the holds of a helpless ship. But there was no evidence before the court as to the storage facilities of cargo at Suez or Port Said, or the possibility of engaging another ship to bring the cargo on to its destination, or the cost of discharge and re-loading. The damage done to the cargo during these operations might be very considerable, and one E must bear in mind that its total value was £888,000. No one suggested such a course at the time. Another point put forward by counsel for the cargo owners was that it was unreasonable for the agents of the owners of the Troilus to engage the Glenogle to tow the Troilus and her cargo to Falmouth without stipulating that the towage should be at a fixed rate on a towage basis. I cannot see that there is any substance in this point. The arrangement did not stipulate for F any terms, salvage or towage. That was left at large to be decided afterwards. If the owners of the ship had made any arrangement which was binding on the owners of the cargo and which was unreasonable, I think that the owners of the cargo would have their remedy at law against the owners of the ship, but I do not think that the arrangement which was made in this case was unreasonable. For these reasons I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

G SOMERVELL, L.J. : I have had the advantage of reading the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J., and there are very few observations which I wish to make. When a ship becomes disabled at sea, the service which her owners require is that she may be taken to her destination, or to a port where she can be repaired and made seaworthy. I am assuming that her owners wish her to be so repaired. One can, I suppose, imagine a case where the only thing to be done was to get H her to some place where she could be broken up, and her cargo, if any, discharged. There may, of course, be arguments, at any rate between ship and cargo, as to whether there was a port of repair nearer to the scene of the accident to which she ought to have been taken, so diminishing the cost of the salvage. I will assume, however, that there is no dispute that a ship damaged on the high seas at point A has to be got to port Z, which may or may not be her destination, in order to be repaired. I will assume that one vessel performs the entire task of towing her there. On these facts it seems to me in principle and on the authority of The Syria (10), to which BUCKNILL, L.J., has referred, that a call at one or more intermediate ports, where the disabled vessel may lie in complete safety in the ordinary sense of the words for one or more nights, would not change the character of the service and convert it from salvage to towage. The disabled ship, though temporarily safe, is still in distress, because she cannot unaided get to her port of repair. This, I think, is the principle adopted by WILLMER, J., in his final conclusion in The Glaucus (2), which has already been quoted. To adopt the other view would, as it seems to me, be very disadvantageous in the interests of all concerned. A salvor might find his position prejudiced if he took the disabled vessel into a port en route in order to give her crew much needed rest, or to pick up stores, or because of bad weather, or because the salving vessel had to discharge or pick up cargo there. If, then, the Stentor had taken on the Troilus from Aden, I should have regarded the question whether she was in danger in the place in which she was anchored at Aden as irrelevant.

Does it become relevant because the Stentor left her and the Glenogle picked her up? It is not necessary to decide that point in this case, because I agree with BUCKNILL, L.J., for the reasons he has given, that she was in danger as she was anchored at Aden. I will, however, state the arguments which appealed to me for the proposition that the appeal would have failed even if at Aden she had, in fact, been anchored in some place where she could have, as far as could be foreseen, remained indefinitely safe as a hulk. It is not suggested that she could have been repaired at Aden. I am dealing with a case, such as the present, where the original damage is done on the high seas, so that it is clear that the original transit to the place of safety was salvage. A salvage service can be performed by two successive salvors. If the second stage, in this case from Aden to Suez, is done by a second towing vessel, does the question whether that is salvage depend on whether she was "safe" or in some danger at the intermediate place where the second vessel took over? It is suggested that so to hold would disregard two important points, which I will formulate as follows: first, a disabled vessel at a temporary resting place en route, where she cannot be repaired, is still valueless where she is although there may be a safe anchorage for her, as there was for the Syria at St. Vincent; secondly, although she is temporarily in safety, the distress caused by the original accident continues in the sense that she cannot without assistance traverse the high seas to her destination or some port of repair. One has also to bear in mind The Reward (3) and The Batavier (5) and the statement of the law on "towage" in The Princess Alice (4), which have already been referred to. I was myself impressed by the argument and feel that it may be illogical to hold that the salvage service continues, notwithstanding a temporary resting place of safety, if the service is done by one vessel, but that a second vessel which completes the service cannot claim to be a salvor because she took over in a place of safety. I have nothing I wish to add to what BUCKNILL, L.J., has said on the other points in the case.

DENNING, L.J.: The obligation on ship and cargo to pay for salvage services is imposed by law irrespective of any contract, express or implied, to that effect, whereas the obligation to pay for towage services arises, if at all, from a contract, express or implied, to pay for them. This difference points the way to the true distinction between the nature of the services. Salvage services arise when the ship is in such danger that the master has no real choice in the matter, but must, as a reasonable man, accept them from somebody or lose his ship, or leave it in some remote place, whereas towage services arise when the ship has reached such a position of safety that the shipowner has a freedom of choice either to refuse the services or to have repairs done locally or to contract for towage to get his ship home. To encourage the rescue of ships which are in danger, the law, without the necessity of any contract, provides for handsome remuneration for the salvors if they succeed, but nothing if they do not, and this remuneration is based, not only on the time, labour and risk involved, but also on the value of that which is saved, and it is charged on it. Remuneration on such a scale cannot, however, be justified when the shipowner has, as a practical matter, a freedom of choice either to accept the proffered services or to adopt some other alternative, for then he would normally in his own interest—and should in the interest of the cargo owners—throw the other alternatives into the scale so as to reduce the remuneration to a figure which represents the time, labour and risk involved to those who render the services. If the shipowner, A having a choice before him, contracts to pay for the services on a salvage basis, that is his affair—it may be so important for him to fulfil his future engagements that he contracts on that basis—but he cannot by so doing make the cargo owner liable for salvage unless the services are really salvage services: Anderson v. Ocean Steamship Company (14) (10 App. Cas. 117).

B The correctness of these views can be seen by taking an illustration. Suppose that a disabled ship has been towed into Suez where she is in safety and whence she can be towed by canal tugs to Port Said and that there is available at Port Said an ocean tug ready to tow her at towage rates from Port Said to Falmouth, but that the owner chooses instead to employ another of his own ships to tow her on a salvage basis. Are the cargo owners liable for salvage? The answer, I C should have thought, is plainly that the cargo owners are not liable for salvage, but only for a general average contribution to what towage by the tug would have cost. Suppose now that the ocean tug is not immediately available at Port Said but will be available in about five to seven days time, is the position any different? If the shipowner had no other ships of his own in the vicinity, he D would no doubt have waited for the tug, and the cargo owner would only be liable for a general average contribution. Can the liability of the cargo owner be increased into a liability for salvage because the shipowner happens to have another of his own ships there? The answer I should have thought was that the cargo owners are only liable for salvage when the ship is in danger, and it is not open to a shipowner, when the ship is in safety, to add a further liability to the cargo owner by towing with another of his own ships.

E Applying these principles, I think there is much to be said for the view that the services rendered by the Glenogle were towage services, and not salvage. It seems to me that at Aden, or, at any rate, at Suez or Port Said, the ship was safe and the owners had a freedom of choice, and, if the Glenogle had been under different management, the owners would not have accepted her services at an unknown price on a salvage basis, but would have insisted on a competitive F price at towage rates, especially when they had a competitive offer from the tug Empire John. The cargo owners should not be prejudiced simply because the Glenogle was under the same management as the Troilus, and, accordingly, no one troubled to ask for a quotation beforehand. It all depends, however, on what view one takes of the facts, and I would not venture to differ from the views which my brethren have found on them. The appeal must, therefore, be G dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Thomas Cooper & Co., agents for Batesons & Co., Liverpool (for the cargo owners); Bentleys, Stokes & Lowless, agents for Alsop, Stevens & Co., Liverpool (for the owners, master and crew of the Glenogle).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Affirmed. H.L. [1951] 2 All E.R. 40.

LEWIS v. THOMAS AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.J.J.), December 16, 20, 1949.]

Easement—Right of way—Interruption—Interruption in fact—Relevance of intention of interrupter—Rights of Way Act, 1932 (c. 45), s. 1 (1) (2).

By s. 1 of the Rights of Way Act, 1932 : “(1) Where a way . . . upon or over any land has been actually enjoyed by the public as of right and without interruption for a full period of twenty years, such way shall be deemed to have been dedicated as a highway . . . (2) Where any such way has been enjoyed as aforesaid for a full period of forty years, such way shall be deemed conclusively to have been dedicated as a highway unless there is sufficient evidence that there was no intention during that period to dedicate such way.”

In and after 1945 the plaintiff was the owner of property through the grounds of which passed a way leading from one part of a main road to another. There was evidence of continuous user of the way as of right for forty years, but on certain occasions before 1941 the tenant of two adjoining fields, through which the way also passed, with the knowledge of the agent of the then owner of the plaintiff's property had at night locked a gate across the way between the fields to prevent cattle straying into the corn. In an action against the defendants for trespass by using the way,

HELD : “interruption” within the meaning of s. 1 (1) and (2) meant interruption in fact, and the question of the intention of the interrupter was primarily relevant only if the owner, against whom the right of way was asserted, sought to prove no intention to dedicate. On the facts, the locking of the gate did not constitute an interruption of the right of way, and, therefore, the defendant was not guilty of trespass.

[FOR THE RIGHTS OF WAY ACT, 1932, s. 1 (1) (2), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 11, pp. 217, 218.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Hue v. Whiteley, [1929] 1 Ch. 440 ; 98 L.J.Ch. 227 ; 140 L.T. 531 ; Digest Supp.
- (2) Merstham Manor, Ltd. v. Coulsdon and Purley Urban District Council, [1936] 2 All E.R. 422 ; [1937] 2 K.B. 77 ; 106 L.J.K.B. 603 ; 100 J.P. 381 ; Digest Supp.
- (3) Jones v. Bates, [1938] 2 All E.R. 237 ; 158 L.T. 507 ; 102 J.P. 291 ; Digest Supp.
- (4) Moser v. Ambleside Urban District Council, (1924), 89 J.P. Jo. 59 ; affmd., (1925), 89 J.P. 118 ; 26 Digest 294, 256.
- (5) Poole v. Huskinson, (1843), 11 M. & W. 827 ; 26 Digest 286, 194.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour JUDGE TREVOR MORGAN, K.C., made at Cardigan County Court on July 21, 1949.

The plaintiff alleged trespass by the defendants in the user by them of a way over her property for the passage of agricultural vehicles and cattle. The county court judge held that a public right of way, which admittedly existed in respect of pedestrians, extended also to agricultural vehicles and cattle, and found for the defendants. The Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.

E. V. Falk for the plaintiff.

D. E. P. Evans for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20. SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. : This appeal raises a question under s. 1 of the Rights of Way Act, 1932. The plaintiff, who is the owner-occupier of certain property known as the Old Rectory near Brynheullan, sued three persons for trespass, alleging the user by them of a way over her property and certain other acts which they did in purported exercise of that right of way. The way, before reaching the rectory, goes along the south of two fields (numbered 142 and 148 on the plan which has been put in), which are the property of the first defendant, Thomas. Proceeding westwards after leaving the rectory property, the way passes near a place called Pen-y-feidr and then turns north, eventually re-joining the main road which it left further to the east. The answer of the defendants to the claim of trespass was that they were exercising a public right of way for agricultural vehicles and cattle. So far as foot passengers are concerned, it is conceded by the plaintiff that there is a public right of way over the way I have described, but the issue is whether that right extends to its use for agricultural vehicles and cattle. The sole question is whether the finding of the learned county court judge that there was such a right can stand, that is to say, whether facts have been proved sufficient to establish user within the meaning of s. 1 of the Act of 1932 "as of right and without interruption."

So far as the first of those two phrases is concerned—"as of right"—there is no question that the persons who gave evidence of user stated that they used the way—I borrow the well-known formula of TOMLIN, J. ([1929] 1 Ch. 445), in Hue v. Whiteley (1)—"believing themselves to be exercising a public right to pass from one highway to another." The real question, therefore, is whether there has been user "without interruption" for the requisite period, which may be forty years or twenty years, according to whether the case is founded on sub-s. (2) or sub-s. (1). For the present purposes, it does not matter which sub-section applies. Either there has been interruption sufficient to defeat the user under either sub-section, or there has been no interruption at all.

Prima facie a question of that kind is one of fact for the judge who saw the witnesses who came before him and gave evidence, and the plaintiff would be out of court were it not for one sentence in the judgment of the county court judge around which the whole argument has ranged. The learned judge states :

"I was satisfied from the evidence of the witnesses, especially that given by the defendants' witnesses, that there had been continuous use of the roadway in question for over forty years without any attempt to question the right to use it . . . I came to the conclusion that on the few occasions when the witness Reynolds locked the gate across the road he did so only when his corn was stacked near the gate of the field near the roadway in question and when he had found that people had left his gate open and consequently cattle wandered into the cornfield. It was on these occasions and for this purpose only that he locked the gate across the road and not because he was endeavouring to show to the public at large that there was no right of way through the roadway in question."

It is on that part of the judge's finding and judgment that counsel for the plaintiff founds his argument. He says that the judge misdirected himself by holding, in effect, that interruption in fact does not matter if there was no intention by the interrupter to challenge the right. Counsel says, first, that that direction is wrong in law and is inconsistent with the view of HILBERY, J., in Merstham Manor, Ltd. v. Coulsdon and Purley Urban District Council (2), approved by this court in Jones v. Bates (3), and with the judgment of SCOTT, L.J., in the latter case.

The property was originally glebe land, and when the disestablishment of the Welsh Church occurred as a result of the Welsh Church Act, 1914, all the property in question, both the rectory and the fields, became vested in the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Wales. Later, the property was vested by the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in the Representative Body for the Church of Wales. So long as they held it and the rector was living in the rectory, it is conceded that his position was that of agent for the freehold owner. In 1942 the Representative Body sold fields 142 and 148 to the Pembrokeshire County Council and in 1947 the council sold them to the first defendant, Thomas. When they sold fields 142 and 148, the Representative Body retained the rectory, which was not sold to the plaintiff until 1945. Reynolds was a tenant of the two fields for a period which ended in 1941, a year before the sale to the Pembrokeshire County Council. During that period on occasion at night Reynolds—it is said with the knowledge of the rector—locked a gate which was across the way on his own property between the two fields, 142 and 148. It is that alleged interruption which forms the main burden of the argument before us.

If the statement of the learned county court judge means what the plaintiff says it means, I think it may well be doubted whether it could be regarded as correct. Prima facie, to my mind, “interruption” in s. 1 means interruption in fact. In Jones v. Bates (3) SCOTT, L.J., said ([1938] 2 All E.R. 246) :

“The next requirement of the statute, ‘without interruption,’ means that the enjoyment of the right must not have been interrupted. If for the statutory period members of the public have used the way as of right, and their exercise of that right has in fact not been interrupted, then the statutory consequence follows.”

I take that as showing that, in the mind of the lord justice, “interruption” means “interruption in fact.” On the other hand, the presence or absence of a challenge may well be a relevant circumstance in determining whether truthfully there has been interruption in fact. The illustration was given during the course of the argument of a road which was interrupted and entirely blocked by some broken-down vehicle so that nobody could pass along it. It is obvious in such a case that no court would hold there was such an interruption as was intended by the section, and, in coming to that conclusion, the circumstances in which the barring of the way took place and the complete absence of any intention to stop anybody going along it would be a relevant circumstance. In my judgment, the county court judge did no more than refer to Reynolds’ state of mind as one of the relevant circumstances in the case, like the occasions and the times when the gate was locked, in arriving at his decision whether there had in fact been interruption. I agree that a barring, and particularly a deliberate barring, of a way for an appreciable period would not necessarily lose its effect merely because no one happened to try to use the way during that period, but here the only user in controversy is user by farm vehicles and cattle (the user by foot passengers being conceded) and such user is very improbable at night. The evidence seems to be that Reynolds only locked the gate at certain periods of the year when his corn was stacked and always saw to it that it was unlocked in the morning.

In all the circumstances, including the considerable evidence of user which the judge heard, I think it was open to him to find, as he did, “no interruption,” and that the locking was done at such times only as would not be likely to, and did not, in fact, interrupt (as it was not intended to interrupt) the user for farm vehicles and cattle. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

COHEN, L.J. : I am of the same opinion. To succeed in the defence that there is a public highway the defendants have to establish (i) enjoyment as of right for the prescribed period, and (ii) no interruption. So far as the first point is concerned the judge found in their favour. There was ample evidence on which he could so find, and I do not think his finding as to enjoyment as of right was challenged by counsel for the plaintiff. The dispute is whether such enjoyment was or was not interrupted. On this point counsel relied on the evidence of Reynolds which has been summarised by the Master of the Rolls. There was no other evidence of interruption. Counsel for the plaintiff contends that the evidence of Reynolds, who was not the owner of the land subject to the alleged right of way, cannot be relevant.

In Moser v. Ambleside Urban District Council (4), MACKINNON, J., had to consider the question of intention under the law as it was before the Act of 1932. The question then was whether the evidence justified an inference of dedication. MACKINNON, J., said (89 J.P. Jo. 61):

A “The other principle that I think is as well to bear in mind is this : It was said, very truly, in the passage of PARKE, B., in Poole v. Huskinson (5) that a single act of interruption by the owner was of much more weight upon the question of intention than many acts of enjoyment. If you bear quite clearly in mind what is meant by an act of interruption by the owner, if it is an effective act of interruption by the owner—I mean by the owner himself—and is effective in the sense that it is acquiesced in, then I agree that a single act is of very much greater weight than a quantity of evidence of user by one or other members of the public who may use the path when the owner is not there and without his knowledge. The fact that the owner, as is so constantly done, locks the gates once a year, and that sort of thing, is, or may be, a periodical intimation by the owner that he is not intending to dedicate a highway, but it must be an effective act of interruption ; it must be by the owner himself, because if you have evidence of an attempted interruption which is not effective in the sense that members of the public resent the interruption and break down the gate, or whatever it is, and that defiance of his supposed rights is then acquiesced in by the owner, or, again, if it is an attempted interruption by a tenant without the assent or authority of the owner and is also an interruption that is ineffective and a failure because the public refuse to acquiesce in it, then, as it seems to me such an ineffective interruption, either by the owner or by the tenant, so far from being proof that there is no dedication, rather works the other way as showing that there has been an effective dedication . . .”

The decision in that case was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. There is no further reference to the matter of intention in the judgment of this court.

E It is plain that where the question is whether or not there was evidence of dedication, (i) the intention must be relevant, and (ii) the relevant intention must be that of the person presumed to dedicate. Counsel for the plaintiff says that the Act of 1932 has made the fact of interruption, if proved, conclusive unless “there is sufficient evidence that there was no intention during that period to dedicate such way.” To some extent I agree with counsel. It seems to me that the reference to interruption in the sub-s. (1) is to the fact of an interruption and that the question of intention is primarily relevant if, and only if, the owner, against whom the right of way is asserted, seeks to prove no intention to dedicate. I think intention may be involved in the question whether a particular act is or is not interruption. Thus, padlocking a gate is prima facie an act of interruption, but I doubt if it could be held to be so if the interruptor fixed on the gate a notice that the key would be found hanging on the gatepost. The question is whether, having regard to the circumstances, the locking of the gate by Reynolds to the extent indicated by his evidence constitutes interruption. The fact that the gate was locked is clearly proved, and it is not proved that any one person while it was locked would find on the gate any information as to where the key could be obtained. On the other hand, although H the rector must be taken to have approved of the affixing of the lock of which he had a key, Reynolds states that the driver of a coal lorry would get a key, presumably from the rectory, and that the gate was normally unlocked. Moreover, there was no evidence of any actual case in which any person seeking to use the way had been interfered with by the erection and locking of the gate. The alleged right of way was in a place where user was only likely by farmers and the like in the vicinity who would know where the key would be. I agree with the Master of the Rolls in reading the evidence as meaning that the gate was only locked at night. In those circumstances I am not prepared to differ from the view of the learned county court judge that in the circumstances of this case there was no actual interruption of the right of way, and, that being so, it seems to me to follow that the appeal fails.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors : Rhys Roberts & Co., agents for Walter L. Williams & Sons, Fishguard (for the plaintiff) ; Holt, Beever & Co., agents for W. J. Williams & Davies, Cardigan (for the defendants).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re DAVIES (deceased). PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. DAVIES AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), December 16, 20, 1949.]

Will—Joint tenancy or tenancy in common—"Pay the income arising to my children in equal shares and after the death of all my children " to grandchildren then living.

By his will a testator who died on July 24, 1916, gave property to his trustees to hold the same "upon trust after payment off of any existing mortgage or mortgages thereon to pay the income arising therefrom to my said children in equal shares after they shall have received their proportionate shares out of my residuary trust fund as aforesaid and after the death of all my said children " on trust for a class of grandchildren then living. It was accepted that the children and the survivors or survivor of them were entitled to the income of the property either as tenants in common for life with implied cross-remainders to the survivors or survivor for life or as joint tenants for life, but it became necessary to ascertain in what capacity the children became so entitled because, if they were tenants in common, the title to the property ought to be vested in the trustee of the will, while, if they were joint tenants, the children together constituted the tenant for life for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1925. under s. 19 (2) of that Act.

HELD : the words "in equal shares" plainly signified a tenancy in common and the limitation ought not to be forcibly construed as giving rise to a joint tenancy, and, therefore, the children were entitled as tenants in common for their lives with a gift over to the survivors or survivor for life.

Re Tate ([1914] 2 Ch. 182) and Re Stanley's Settlement ([1916] 2 Ch. 50). applied.

[AS TO CREATION OF TENANCY IN COMMON, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 27, pp. 752-757, paras. 1282-1285 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 981-991, Nos. 8360-8489.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Tuckerman v. Jefferies, (1706), 11 Mod. Rep. 108 ; sub nom., Turkerman v. Jeoffrys, Holt K.B. 370 ; 44 Digest 974, 8290.
- (2) Armstrong v. Eldridge, (1791), 3 Bro. C.C. 215 ; 44 Digest 989, 8458.
- (3) Pearce v. Edmeades, (1838), 3 Y. & C. Ex. 246 ; 8 L.J. Ex. Eq. 61 ; 3 Jur. 245 ; 44 Digest 994, 8524.

- (4) Cranswick v. Pearson, Pearson v. Cranswick, (1862), 31 Beav. 624 ; 9 L.T. 215 ; 9 Jur.N.S. 397 ; affd. (1863), 9 L.T. 275 ; 44 Digest 1214, 10497.
- (5) Re Hobson, [1912] 1 Ch. 626 ; 106 L.T. 507 ; 44 Digest 1205, 10426.
- (6) Re Tate, [1914] 2 Ch. 182 ; 83 L.J.Ch. 593 ; 109 L.T. 621 ; 44 Digest 1215, 10505.
- A (7) Re Richerson (No. 2), [1893] 3 Ch. 146 ; 62 L.J.Ch. 708 ; 69 L.T. 590 ; 44 Digest 983, 8393.
- (8) Re Stanley's Settlement, [1916] 2 Ch. 50 ; 85 L.J.Ch. 809 ; 114 L.T. 933 ; 40 Digest 563, 1016.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, the nature of the beneficial interests of the testator's children in certain property called in the will the Western Road property. It was accepted that the children were entitled to the income of the said property until the death of the survivor of them either as joint tenants or as tenants in common with remainder to the survivors or survivor, so that the extent of each child's interest would be the same whichever was the true nature of his interest. It became necessary, however, to decide the nature of the children's interests in order to ascertain in whom the Western Road property ought to be vested. Consequent on an order made in the matter in 1922, the property had, until the death of the testator's widow (which occurred on Feb. 12, 1945), been vested in the widow and the children, who together exercised the powers of tenant for life by virtue of the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 19. DANCKWERTS, J., now declared that the children were entitled as tenants in common for life with remainders to the survivors or survivor for life, and, consequently, the Public Trustee, as trustee of the will, was entitled to have the Western Road property vested in him. The relevant part of the will is set out in the judgment and in the headnote.

H. A. Rose for the Public Trustee, the trustee of the will.

Michael Bowles for the children of the testator.

E A. F. M. Berkeley for nieces of the testator, entitled to the capital on failure of the class of grandchildren.

Swingland for the grandchildren, contingently entitled to the capital.

DANCKWERTS, J. : The point which I have to decide is one which in one sense is a future question, but which really needs to be decided now, because on the view which may be taken depends the title to the Western Road property and the precise kind of document which may need to be executed to put the title to it in order.

The testator directed his trustees to hold his Western Road property

“upon trust after payment off of any existing mortgage or mortgages thereon to pay the income arising therefrom to my said children in equal shares after they shall have received their proportionate shares out of my residuary trust fund as aforesaid and after the death of all my said children ” then on trust for a class of grandchildren then living which would, therefore, remain contingent until the death of the last of his said children. The questions raised are whether, on the death of one of the three children concerned, the survivors will take the whole of the income until the time comes for distribution as they die, and also in what capacity they take that income. It is admitted that, one way or another, on the death of one or more of those children, the survivors or survivor must take the whole of the income, but the question is whether they take as tenants in common, with cross-remainders implied in favour of the survivors or survivor, or whether they are joint tenants so that the survivors take by survivorship.

H On this question there is a certain amount of authority. It is obvious, as is admitted, that the survivors must be intended to take because there is an eventual gift over on the death of the last survivor of the three children. Therefore, one infers that the survivors, before the last one dies, are intended to take in any case, but the precise method by which they take is, as is not usually the case, material in the present case, because, if they are tenants in common with cross-remainders, there is a trust for sale and the Public Trustee will be entitled to have the legal estate vested in him and will hold the property on trust for sale, and, in the other alternative, if they are joint tenants, they will be joint tenants for life, and, accordingly, under the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 19, they will be tenants for life for the purpose of the Settled Land Act, 1925, and will be entitled to retain the land as it is at present vested in them and to administer the property and manage it as tenants for life under that Act. A

Counsel for the children contended that they were joint tenants for life, and referred me to four cases, Turkerman v. Jeoffrys (1), Armstrong v. Eldridge (2), Pearce v. Edmeades (3) and Cranswick v. Pearson (4). It would be fair to say that in each of those cases it did not matter a great deal by what method the result was reached that the survivors took the whole of the income, for whether the limitation were construed as a tenancy in common with cross-remainders or as a joint tenancy, in each case the result was that the survivors took the whole and nothing went to the heir or personal representatives of the one who had died. Those cases certainly, however, indicate a preference for the view that, notwithstanding the words "in equal shares," or some such words which generally are sufficient to indicate a tenancy in common, the persons in question did take as joint tenants. There are some more modern cases, the first of these being Re Hobson (5), in which PARKER, J., states the situation and the different methods which have been applied to it in the following words ([1912] 1 Ch. 631): B C

"In my opinion it is quite clear on the authorities that where there is a gift equally between A., B., and C. during their respective lives and after the death of the survivor of them the whole property is given over, the court has implied an intention on the part of the testator that the survivors or survivor of A., B., and C. shall after the death of one or more of them be entitled to the whole income down to the period of distribution, and that conclusion appears to have been arrived at in one of two ways. In the first place and in the earlier cases the judges have said that a gift in equal shares during their respective lives only prima facie creates a tenancy in common, and that, if the court can gather an intention on the face of the will that the tenancy was intended to be not a tenancy in common but a joint tenancy, it will treat the words 'in equal shares' or other similar words as not destructive of what would otherwise be a joint tenancy; and that interpretation is one which would in the ordinary course lead to the desired effect. On the death of A., for instance, B. and C. would continue to be joint tenants of the whole, and on the death of B., C. again would become tenant of the whole. That is one way of meeting the difficulty and of avoiding an intestacy; but in other cases the rule has been rested on different grounds in this way. It has been said that where there is a gift to A., B., and C. equally during their respective lives, and after the death of the survivor over, an intention is manifested that A., B., and C., or such of them as shall be living for the time being, shall enjoy the property down to the period of distribution, and that the best way of effecting that intention is to imply a gift over on the death of any of them of his or her share as well original as accruing to the survivors or survivor; and some of the cases have, I think, been decided on what I may describe as a mixture of those two theories." D E F G H

There are two cases, both before SARGANT, J., in which he deals with the same problem. In Re Tate (6) he said ([1914] 2 Ch. 185):

"The real question is whether on the language of the will there is a sufficient indication of an intention on the part of the testator to create what I may call cross-remainders between the three children, including the issue of any deceased child. If the words had been such as they are, only omitting the substitution of the issue of a deceased child for his or her parent, there is, in my opinion, ample authority to shew that cross-remainders for life would have been implied between the children. I need only refer to Armstrong v. Eldridge (2), Pearce v. Edmeades (3), and Re Richerson (No. 2) (7), where CHITTY, J.'s decision in chambers was afterwards confirmed by him in court."

In a later case, Re Stanley's Settlement (8), the words of the will were "for and during the terms of their natural lives as tenants in common and not as joint tenants," and SARGANT, J., said ([1916] 2 Ch. 55) :

"Then is there enough in the deed before me from which to imply a life interest to Mrs. Rees? Mrs. Morgans had four children and died many years ago. Mrs. Rees never had any child and died in 1914. In my opinion it is right to hold that Mrs. Rees took a life interest in her sister's share on that sister's death—not on the ground that there was a joint tenancy, because that is expressly excluded, but following the rule of construction laid down on the other and as I think better view of the principle on which in Armstrong v. Eldridge (2), Pearce v. Edmeades (3), and Re Richerson (7) were decided, namely, that a life interest is to be implied in favour of the survivor of the tenants in common. It is better to say that they are tenants in common for life with a life interest in remainder to the survivor. The words 'the same or any part thereof' may be held to point definitely to the times when two are receiving the income, and, subsequently, when one only is receiving it. It is sufficient to say that there is enough on the will to enable me to hold that each sister took a life estate in remainder in the other sister's share on that sister's death."

In one of the cases on which counsel for the children relied, Turkerman v. Jeoffrys (1) HOLT, C.J., said (Holt K.B. 371) :

"As to have it a cross-remainder, it is an awkward sort of a thing."

It may be that a cross-remainder is an awkward sort of thing, but at the same time it seems to me it is even more awkward, when you get the words "in equal shares," which plainly signify a tenancy in common, that you should have forcibly to construe that as a joint tenancy. Therefore, like SARGANT, J., I prefer the method of arriving at the result which is to imply a gift over on the death of any of the defendants in question of his or her share as well original as accruing to the survivors or survivor. I think, therefore, that here there is not a joint tenancy, but a tenancy in common with those implied trusts over.

Order accordingly. The costs of all parties were ordered to be paid out of a fund which was the subject of a separate question in the summons.

Solicitors : Blakeney & Marsden Popple, agents for Cyril E. Wheeler, Brighton (for all parties except the nieces) ; Beaumont & Son (for the nieces).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

LAW v. DEARNLEY

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Singleton and Jenkins, L.J.J.), November 25, December 15, 16, 1949.]

Practice—Striking out pleading—Order of Court of Appeal—Reliance on decision at nisi prius—Gaming debt—Action brought as on an account stated—Gaming Act, 1892 (c. 9), s. 1—R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4.

By the Gaming Act, 1892, s. 1 : "Any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Gaming Act, 1845 . . . shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money."

As a result of betting transactions into which he had entered as agent for the defendant, the plaintiff made certain payments to a bookmaker. In an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover the money paid, he based his claim (inter alia) on an account stated between the parties, relying on two accounts stated, i.e., one as between the bookmaker and himself and the other as between himself and the defendant. The defendant applied under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4, for the statement of claim to be struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action and being frivolous and vexatious.

HELD : if the Court of Appeal were satisfied that an action was not maintainable and that to allow it to proceed would be an abuse of the process of the court, the court was bound to say so even if there were no express decision of the Court of Appeal or of the House of Lords to that effect ; in Alberg v. Chandler (1948) (64 T.L.R. 394) STREATFEILD, J., had decided (and in the view of the court rightly decided) that where an agreement to pay bets was void under the Gaming Act, 1845, s. 18, an action could not be maintained on an account stated in respect of those bets ; the plaintiff's claim in the present case, being based on such an account, was not maintainable under s. 1 of the Act of 1892 ; and, therefore, the statement of claim should be struck out and the action be dismissed.

Alberg v. Chandler, (1948) (64 T.L.R. 394), approved.

[AS TO STRIKING OUT PLEADINGS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 25, pp. 253-256, paras. 419, 420 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Pleading, pp. 71-82, Nos. 623-687.]

AS TO RECOVERY BY AGENT OF MONEY PAID IN RESPECT OF BETTING TRANSACTIONS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 15, pp. 482, 483, para. 881 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 25, p. 411, Nos. 144-149.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Lawrance v. Norreys (Lord), (1890), 15 App. Cas. 210 ; 59 L.J.Ch. 681 ; 62 L.T. 706 ; 54 J.P. 708 ; Digest, Pleading 85, 710.
- (2) Dyson v. A.-G., [1911] 1 K.B. 410 ; 81 L.J.K.B. 217 ; 105 L.T. 753 ; Digest, Pleading 75, 645.
- (3) Gugenheim v. Ladbrooke & Co., Ltd., [1947] 1 All E.R. 292 ; 177 L.T. 74 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) Kershaw v. Sievier, (1904), 21 T.L.R. 40 ; 25 Digest 409, 128.
- (5) Siqueira v. Noronha, [1934] A.C. 332 ; 103 L.J.P.C. 63 ; 151 L.T. 6 ; Digest Supp.
- (6) Cocking v. Ward, (1845), 1 C.B. 858 ; 15 L.J.C.P. 245 ; 12 Digest 164, 1195.
- (7) Evans (Joseph) & Co. v. Heathcote, [1918] 1 K.B. 418 ; 87 L.J.K.B. 593 ; 118 L.T. 556 ; 12 Digest 289, 2375.
- (8) Re Home & Colonial Insurance Co., Ltd., [1930] 1 Ch. 102 ; sub nom., Re Home & Colonial Insurance Co., May v. Barham, 99 L.J.Ch. 113 ; 142 L.T. 207 ; Digest Supp.

- (9) Alberg v. Chandler, (1948), 64 T.L.R. 394 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (10) William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd. v. Rose, [1948] 2 All E.R. 1107 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (11) Day v. William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd., [1949] 1 All E.R. 219 ; [1949] 1 K.B. 632 ; [1949] L.J.R. 689.
- (12) Hyams v. Stuart King, [1908] 2 K.B. 696 ; 77 L.J.K.B. 794 ; 99 L.T. 424 ; 25 Digest 401, 58.
- (13) Re Laycock v. Pickles, (1863), 4 B. & S. 497 ; 3 New Rep. 73 ; 33 L.J.Q.B. 43 ; 9 L.T. 378 ; 12 Digest 165, 1207.
- (14) Morgan v. Ashcroft, [1937] 3 All E.R. 92 ; [1938] 1 K.B. 49 ; 106 L.J.K.B. 544 ; 157 L.T. 87 ; Digest Supp.
- (15) Hill v. William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd., [1949] 2 All E.R. 452 ; [1949] A.C. 530 ; [1949] L.J.R. 1383.
- (16) Tatam v. Reeve, [1893] 1 Q.B. 44 ; 67 L.T. 683 ; 57 J.P. 118 ; sub nom., Tatham v. Reeve, 62 L.J.Q.B. 30 ; 25 Digest 411, 146.
- (17) Camillo Tank S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Alexandria Engineering Works, (1921), 38 T.L.R. 134 ; Digest Supp.
- (18) Commercial Air Hire, Ltd. v. Wrightways, Ltd., [1938] 1 All E.R. 89 ; Digest Supp.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of SLADE, J., made in chambers and dated July 27, 1949, confirming an order of the registrar of Boston District Registry, made on June 1, 1949, striking out the statements of claim in two actions brought by the plaintiff and directing that the actions be dismissed.

The actions, which were consolidated by an order of FINNEMORE, J., dated Mar. 4, 1949, were brought by the plaintiff to recover the balances of two accounts alleged to have been paid by him to a bookmaker in regard to betting transactions into which he had entered on behalf of the defendant. In each case the plaintiff based his claim on (inter alia) an account stated between the parties. The Court of Appeal now held that, assuming that the plaintiff could succeed in showing that the accounts relied on by him were real accounts stated, nevertheless, as the accounts had their origin in betting transactions, under the Gaming Act, 1892, s. 1, the action could not be maintained, and they dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Van Oss for the plaintiff.

Swanwick for the defendant.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from an order made by SLADE, J., in chambers, dismissing the plaintiff's appeal from an order which had been made by the registrar of the district registry at Boston in two consolidated actions. The registrar had ordered that the statements of claim be struck out under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4, on the ground that they disclosed no reasonable cause of action and were frivolous and vexatious and had directed that the plaintiff's actions be dismissed, and that order was confirmed by SLADE, J. The two actions were brought as a result of certain betting transactions which had taken place between the plaintiff, Mr. Law, and a bookmaker, Mr. Harden. The plaintiff's case was that the obligations that he had entered into with Mr. Harden had been for and on behalf of the defendant, i.e., that the plaintiff had acted as the defendant's agent in placing the bets with Mr. Harden. As a result of the transactions between the plaintiff and Mr. Harden, by the amended statement of claim in the first action (delivered, as amended, on Jan. 25, 1949), the sum of £482 12s. 6d. was alleged to be due to the plaintiff from the defendant, and by the statement of claim in the second action (also delivered on Jan. 25, 1949) another £483 was alleged to be due to the plaintiff from the defendant.

Originally, in the statements of claim the plaintiff claimed against the defendant in two alternative ways. He said, in para. 1 of each of the statements of claim, that at the oral request of the defendant he had incurred certain debts to Harden for and on behalf of the defendant and had made certain payments to Harden in discharging the debts, and he gave particulars. In para. 2 he said that the defendant by telephone on or about July 8, 1948, refused to reimburse the said sums, and then, in each para. 3, he said :

“ Further or in the alternative the plaintiff claims the said sum on an account stated between the parties.”

By way of particulars he said :

“ On July 8, 1948, the defendant orally admitted to the plaintiff on the telephone and agreed that the said payment was correct as to amount.”

It has been said throughout these proceedings that the actions can only be maintained, if at all, under the alternative claim on an account stated. In the course of the proceedings the plaintiff was asked for further particulars of the debt and payments as between himself and Mr. Harden. On Mar. 22, 1949, he delivered further particulars, and the relevant particulars are as follows :

“ There was in fact only one debt, namely, the sum claimed in this action.

The nature of the said debt was that it was upon an account stated and agreed between the plaintiff and the said Harden on or about June 28, 1948.”

The plaintiff is, therefore, relying on two accounts stated. He says, first, that there was an account stated as between himself and Mr. Harden, and then he says that, as a result of that, there was a further account stated as between himself and the defendant, and that it is in respect of the second account stated that he is bringing the actions and he is entitled to have the issue whether such claims are maintainable tried in a court of law. SLADE, J., when he dismissed the appeals, stated the point quite shortly :

“ Will the action lie to recover the amount agreed by the defendant on an account stated, when admittedly each item of the account is in respect of a debt rendered null and void by the Gaming Act, 1845, s. 18 ? ”

In presenting the appeal to us counsel for the plaintiff drew our attention, first, to what had been said by LORD HERSCHELL in Lawrance v. Norreys (Lord) (1). Speaking of this jurisdiction to dismiss actions in limine, LORD HERSCHELL said (15 App. Cas. 219) :

“ It is a jurisdiction which ought to be very sparingly exercised, and only in very exceptional cases.”

In Dyson v. Attorney-General (2), FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., said ([1911] 1 K.B. 418) :

“ Now it is unquestionable that, both under the inherent power of the court and also under a specific rule to that effect made under the Judicature Act, the court has a right to stop an action at this stage if it is wantonly brought without the shadow of an excuse, so that to permit the action to go through its ordinary stages up to trial would be to allow the defendant to be vexed under the form of legal process when there could not at any stage be any doubt that the action was baseless. But from this to the summary dismissal of actions because the judge in chambers does not think they will be successful in the end lies a wide region, and the courts have properly considered that this power of arresting an action and deciding it without trial is one to be very sparingly used, and rarely, if ever, excepting in cases where the action is an abuse of legal procedure. They have laid down again and again that this process is not intended to take the place of the old demurrer by which the defendant challenged the validity of the plaintiff's claim as a matter of law. Differences of law, just as differences of fact, are normally to be decided by trial after hearing in court, and not to be refused a hearing in court by an order of the judge in chambers. Nothing more clearly indicates this to be the intention of the rule than the fact that the plaintiff has no appeal as of right from the decision of the judge at chambers in the case of such an order as this . . . To my mind it is evident that our judicial system would never permit a plaintiff to be 'driven from the judgment seat' in this way without any court having considered his right to be heard, excepting in cases where the cause of action was obviously and almost incontestably bad."

A

That is, undoubtedly, the test to be applied, and the language used there is strong language.

Approaching this case from that angle, I pass straight to a decision of this court in Gugenheim v. Ladbrooke & Co., Ltd. (3), where the court was faced with this problem. The plaintiff was suing a firm of bookmakers on an account stated.

B

The facts set out in the judgment of LAWRENCE, L.J. ([1947] 1 All E.R. 293) were as follows :

"The plaintiff made various bets with the defendants, who are a well known company of bookmakers. The bets were made on credit. After the meeting on July 1, 1946, the plaintiff put forward a claim to a sum of £8,784, which he said was due to him on the bets that he had made. On July 11 the defendants wrote to the plaintiff saying that they understood that he had been reported to the stewards of the Jockey Club as a defaulter on bets and warned off the course in England, and that in those circumstances they proposed to hold his account in abeyance until he had settled certain alleged liabilities, and that they differed in the figures which were put forward, but that that could be adjusted when he had done as they suggested. He denied what they had alleged, and the matter comes before us on an affidavit which, as counsel for the defendants agrees, must be taken as being true for the purposes of this appeal. In that affidavit . . . the plaintiff alleged . . . that on July 27, 1946, his son and another man had an interview with the representatives of the defendants and it was agreed that the lesser items in the account which the plaintiff put forward should be deemed paid and that, after cancelling out the cross-claims, a final balance was due to him of £7,256. In arriving at this figure the plaintiff's son on his behalf agreed to forego the difference between it and the claim for £8,784 as a further consideration for the compromise. The writ was issued on Sept. 24, 1946, and by it the plaintiff claimed £7,256 from the defendants on an account stated."

C

D

E

F

Thus, it is clear that what was being relied on in that case was an account stated in the full sense, i.e., an account in which there were items on either side which, it had been agreed, should be considered as to some extent cancelling out each other, and that the balance thus arrived at was agreed. In those circumstances DENNING, J., in chambers, had refused to strike the action out. It came before this court, of which LAWRENCE, L.J., COHEN, L.J., and myself were members. There were cited to us on that appeal all relevant authorities on this point, such as Kershaw v. Sievier (4), Siqueira v. Noronha (5), Cocking v. Ward (6), Joseph Evans & Co. v. Heathcote (7) and Re Home & Colonial Insurance Co., Ltd. (8), which were referred to in the judgment of LAWRENCE, L.J. As I have said DENNING, J., had refused to strike the action out and LAWRENCE, L.J., was of opinion that there was a point capable or worthy of being argued and that, accordingly, the action should be allowed to proceed. I expressed the contrary view, but, having regard to the difference of judicial opinion, I was not prepared to dissent from the order proposed by LAWRENCE, L.J. COHEN, L.J., was disposed to agree with the view which I had expressed, although he added one or two other matters which he thought were relevant. It was clearly impossible to strike out an action in limine if two learned judges thought that there was something to be argued. A plaintiff cannot "be driven from the judgment seat" by a majority judgment. I should have said that, even if only one judge thought that there was something to be argued, the action clearly could not be struck out. As a result of the rather curious position in that case, the action was allowed to go to trial.

G

H

If the position had remained the same until the present date, I should have taken the view that this court would have been bound by the decision in Gugenheim v. Ladbrooke & Co., Ltd. (3) to take a similar course in the present case, but the position has not remained unchanged. Since that date there have been two or three decisions. The most important, to my mind, is the decision of STREATFIELD, J., in Alberg v. Chandler (9). The headnote to that case says :

"Where an agreement to pay debts is void under s. 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, an action cannot be maintained on an account stated in respect of those bets."

The facts showed that from time to time the defendant had placed bets on greyhounds with the plaintiff, and had settled with the plaintiff at the end of each week. One day he placed some bets and lost £15,000. The plaintiff had laid off those bets with other bookmakers who wanted to be paid, and on the following day he approached the defendant, who already owed him money in respect of the previous week, with a request that the defendant should pay him all the money which he had lost. The defendant then said :

"I will let you have the £3,800 from last week, but I cannot give you the whole of the money I lost to-day. I will give you £10,000 on account and if you call at the usual time to-morrow I will give you the cheques."

The plaintiff called on the defendant the next day, but could not find him. As the defendant did not pay him the money owing, the plaintiff brought an action on an account stated for all the money which the defendant owed to him. In giving judgment STREATFIELD, J., said (64 T.L.R. 394) :

"It is admitted that the basis of the claim for that sum is a series of betting transactions on certain races. It is the kind of transaction which, under s. 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, is declared to be null and void. The form of the action is framed therefore on an account stated, and the plaintiff contends that, the defendant having incurred this large indebtedness in respect of betting transactions, there was an independent and separate agreement amounting in law to an account stated whereby the defendant promised to pay these sums, and it is submitted that this action is maintainable for that reason. On the facts, the defence is devoid of all merits."

The learned judge then dealt with the case on the basis and assumption that there was an account stated, but he came to the conclusion that, none the less, the action was not maintainable because it was an account stated in respect of betting transactions. He referred to Joseph Evans & Co. v. Heathcote (7), which dealt with a different subject-matter, but in which SCRUTTON, L.J., referred ([1918] 1 K.B. 435) to the passage in the judgment of the court delivered by TINDAL, C.J., in Cocking v. Ward (6), in which the Chief Justice said (1 C.B. 870) :

"The principle may not, perhaps, be applicable to cases where it can be shown the original debt is absolutely void from any illegal or immoral consideration, or where it is made void by any statute, as, by those against usury or gaming : but we think it applies to cases where the only objection is, that the original debt might not have been recoverable, from the deficiency of legal evidence to support it."

After citing this passage, STREATFIELD, J., went on to say (64 T.L.R. 394) :

"It may be that that statement of TINDAL, C.J., was obiter, but, having regard to the words of s. 18 itself, 'all contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void,' it seems to me to be impossible, in view of that statement, to hold that, even if there was an account stated, it is enforceable as such, having regard to its wagering basis."

A That decision of STREATFEILD, J., was referred to in this court by DENNING, L.J., in William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd. v. Rose (10). In giving his judgment DENNING, L.J., after referring to the decision in Alberg v. Chandler (9), said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1112) :

" If this is correct, as I think it is, then the new promise here to pay the betting debt by instalments was not a good consideration because it added nothing to the original promise, and, if it was not a good consideration, there was no new contract."

B In Day v. William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd. (11), the same question arose, but in that case it was clear from both the judgments that the court came to the conclusion that the account stated, or alleged to be stated, was not an account stated in the true sense of the word. The headnote ([1949] 1 K.B. 632) is as follows :

C " A bookmaker's weekly account sent to a client, containing a record of wins and losses made by the client on bets made by him during the week which, when set off against each other, showed a balance due from the bookmaker to the client, followed by the letters 'C.F.' (carried forward), is not an account stated on which the client can sue the bookmaker some months subsequently, since it is not an absolute acknowledgment made by the bookmaker to the client of a debt due from him to the client and payable at the time of action brought."

D Having dealt with the case on that basis, SINGLETON, L.J., at the end of his judgment, said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 223) :

E " Counsel for the defendants submitted that, even if the weekly bookmakers' account could be said to be an account stated, still it was something on which an action could not succeed, and he referred us to certain words of FARWELL, L.J. ([1908] 2 K.B. 724) in the well-known case of Hyams v. Stuart King (12), and also to the judgment of PICKFORD, L.J. ([1918] 1 K.B. 426, 427) in Joseph Evans & Co. v. Heathcote (7), and to the words of the other lords justices in the same case. He also referred us to Alberg v. Chandler (9), a recent decision of STREATFEILD, J., on the subject. I do not think it is necessary to consider this submission in relation to this appeal. I am satisfied, for the reasons I have given, that the appeal ought to be dismissed."

F Thus, the larger question whether, if there is a true account stated in respect of betting transactions, such an action could succeed, was clearly left open. G BUCKNILL, L.J., agreed, and at the conclusion of his judgment he added (ibid., 224) :

H " Counsel for the plaintiff was compelled to admit that, if the plaintiff had made one bet only in respect of any particular week and had received a weekly account showing that he had won, say, £100 on that bet, that could not be said to be an account stated on which an action would lie, but, on the other hand, he argued that, if he made two bets, won on the first bet and lost on the second, and the weekly account shows that there was a balance due to him, that would be an account stated and he could recover on it. That seems to me to be making the Gaming Act, 1845, valueless. This is an obvious attempt to get round that Act. In my view, it ought not to succeed, and the order of the learned judge was right."

In the case now before us it was argued by counsel for the defendant that the concluding observation of BUCKNILL, L.J., indicated that the learned lord justice had decided the case on the precise ground which SINGLETON, L.J., had expressly refrained from dealing with. I cannot so read the language that BUCKNILL, L.J., used and I am quite satisfied for my part that he never intended to do any such thing. Therefore, in my view, Day's case (11) does not really assist the argument in the present case.

Since Gugenheim's case (3) the parties have been allowed to litigate this matter in a court of law, which was what LAWRENCE, L.J., thought that they should be allowed to do. In Alberg v. Chandler (9), STREATFEILD, J., decided—and there is an expression of concurrence with his judgment by DENNING, L.J., in William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd. v. Rose (10)—that an action of this kind, as between a bookmaker and his client where the Act of 1845 applies, i.e., an action on an account stated in respect of betting transactions, is not maintainable. When I say “an action of this kind,” I am not losing sight of the distinctions—on which counsel for the plaintiff relies—between the present action and that action, and I shall refer to them later. If this court is satisfied beyond doubt that the decision in Alberg v. Chandler (9) is right and represents the law, then, in my opinion, it is its duty to strike out these statements of claim.

Counsel for the plaintiffs contends that, if that is the position, no one can ever get an important point of law of this kind settled without going to the House of Lords, if he can get there, or to the Court of Appeal, if he can get there, on interlocutory proceedings. That is an argument which has to be carefully considered, but, none the less, if this court is satisfied that an action is quite unmaintainable, and that to allow it to proceed would be an abuse of the process of the court, I think that it is bound to say so, and that it can say so even if there is not any express decision of this court or of the House of Lords to that effect. There are some points of law that are so clear that no express authority can be found for them. I venture to think that this point is tolerably clear, and has been so for a number of years, and that it has now been made still clearer by the judgment of STREATFEILD, J., in Alberg v. Chandler (9).

I think, however, that it is necessary to glance at the cases on which STREATFEILD, J., based his judgment, as we are now deciding that his judgment is correct. In that connection I would refer, in the first place, to what was said by MAUGHAM, J., in Re Home & Colonial Insurance Co. (8). In that case, which arose under the winding-up of a limited company, among other things it was held :

“... (v) that, where an agreement is wholly void, items alleged to be due in respect of it are not a proper basis for an action on an account stated, and that a proof based on an account stated in such circumstances must be rejected.”

In the course of his judgment MAUGHAM, J., cited ([1930] 1 Ch. 129) a passage from the judgment in Re Laycock v. Pickles (13), where BLACKBURN, J., said (4 B. & S. 506) that where there was a real account stated “... several items of claim are brought into account on either side, and, being set against one another, a balance is struck, and the consideration for the payment of the balance is the discharge of the items on each side. It is then the same as if each item was paid and a discharge given for each, and in consideration of that discharge the balance was agreed to be due. It is not necessary, in order to make out a real account stated, that the debts should be debts in presenti, or that they should be legal debts. I think equitable claims might be brought into account, and I am not certain that a moral obligation is not sufficient.”

MAUGHAM, J., then said ([1930] 1 Ch. 129) :

“It is contended on behalf of the respondent that there was here a clear moral obligation on each side, and that this brings the case within the statement of BLACKBURN, J., even if the participation agreement was

- wholly null and void. I do not think it necessary to go through and comment on all the cases that were cited to me on this topic, for I am content to follow the observations of the Court of Appeal in the case of Joseph Evans & Co., Ltd. v. Heathcote (7). It is true that on the facts in that case the court held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover upon an account stated, but the learned judges in order to arrive at that conclusion considered it necessary to examine the question whether the agreement between the parties was void or whether it was only such a contract that it could not be directly enforced. PICKFORD, L.J., expressly says ([1918] 1 K.B. 427) : 'I do not think that, where a contract from its nature can give rise to no valid claim, a claim upon it can be used to found an action upon an account stated.' This dictum is exactly in point. BANKES, L.J., comes to this conclusion (ibid., 432) : 'The position of the agreement sued on, therefore, under these Acts, is that it is neither void nor voidable, and there is nothing in the Act which prevents the court from accepting the debt created under the agreement as a proper foundation for an account stated'."

- The Acts in question in Heathcote's case (7) were not the Gaming Acts, but the Trade Union Acts, 1871 and 1876. After stating that SCRUTTON, L.J., had cited with approval the passage from the judgment of TINDAL, C.J. (1 C.B. 870), in Cocking v. Ward (6), to which I have already referred, MAUGHAM, J., continued ([1930] 1 Ch. 130) :

- "... SCRUTTON, L.J., then goes on to point out that since 1871 a contract in restraint of trade between members of a trade union is no longer void but is not directly enforceable. I conclude from these observations that where an agreement is wholly void and a fortiori where the entry into it or the taking credit in account in respect of it is an 'offence,' items alleged to be due under such an agreement cannot properly be used to found an action on an account stated."

- In Morgan v. Ashcroft (14), in which the taking of an account was claimed, SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., said ([1937] 3 All E.R. 94) :

- "In substance, the dispute between the parties is a dispute between a backer and a bookmaker as to the state of the account between them. The fact that the defendant's cross-claim is raised by way of counterclaim and not by way of set-off, does not, in my view, affect the substantial point that, in order to ascertain whether or not an overpayment had been made, which the plaintiff was entitled to recover, it was necessary for the court to examine the state of the account between the parties. Now, this, in my opinion, is a thing which the court is not entitled to do, since by merely taking the account the court would necessarily be recognising wagering transactions as producing legal obligations, and therefore doing the very thing which the Gaming Act, 1845, does not permit to be done."

- The relevance of those observations, as submitted by counsel for the defendant, is that precisely the same sort of considerations might arise in an action brought on an account stated where the defendant is challenging the account, which is alleged to have been stated, on the ground of error, or on some such ground. That would necessitate the court going into the origin and nature of the detailed items in precisely the same way in which it might be called on to do so where an account is being taken.

Finally (and I think most important of all) comes Hyams v. Stuart King (12). The actual decision in that case has now been overruled by the recent decision of the House of Lords in Hill v. William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd. (15). It is, however, important to notice that the claim in Hyams v. Stuart King (12) was originally framed on an account stated. The headnote says :

"The writ in the action was indorsed with a statement of claim upon an account stated, but at the trial the plaintiff set up, and recovered upon, the fresh agreement; no formal amendment of the statement of claim was made at the trial, but all necessary amendments were taken as having been made."

On that part of the case FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., said ([1908] 2 K.B. 719):

"There is no doubt that a cheque may be evidence of an account stated, but that cheque must under that statute [the Gaming Act, 1835] be taken to have been given for an illegal consideration, and an account stated for an illegal consideration is as unenforceable as a cheque given for an illegal consideration. And, apart from the fact that the alleged account stated is a cheque, the mere fact that the account stated is for bets would, under the provisions of the Gaming Act, 1845, which render wagering contracts null and void, suffice to render the action unsustainable. Counsel for the plaintiff realised that his case was hopeless if it had to depend on the cheque, and he faintly suggested that the action was brought not upon the cheque, but upon the balance of account for which that cheque was given—in other words, that it was an action not upon the cheque, but upon the consideration for the cheque. That cause of action is equally bad. It would be a plain case of suing for money won on bets."

FARWELL, L.J., said (ibid., 724):

"This is an action for a balance upon an account stated, the full amount stated as being originally due being £108 10s., which is the amount of a cheque drawn by the defendant and given to the plaintiff in payment of a bet made by the defendant's firm with the plaintiff. It is admitted that no action could be successfully brought on the cheque, and it is in my opinion equally clear that no action will lie on an account stated of which the bet or the cheque forms the foundation: such an action is brought on an admission of a sum of money due and is a recognised cause of action, but it does not create a merger or destruction of the items of such account, and if such items are illegal, the action fails..."

No words could be clearer than that. It is, I think, because it has always been recognised that that is the position that there is no report of any case in which an action so framed has ever succeeded.

Although Hill v. William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd. (15) was a case under the Gaming Act, 1845, the decision there strengthens the view put forward by counsel for the defendant in the present case. In Hill's case (15) it was decided that, although there might be an entirely fresh consideration for the payment of a gaming debt, none the less, if that which was agreed to be paid was, in fact, a gaming debt, the plaintiff could not recover under such a contract. The speeches of the majority emphasised the fact that it is the reality of the transaction with which the courts are concerned. For instance, VISCOUNT SIMON said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 461):

"The arrangement, by the very terms of the letter of Aug. 17, is to pay by instalments 'the balance of our account' and the account is an account of betting transactions and of nothing else."

Later he said (ibid., 462):

"But it appears to me that, at any rate on the facts of the present case, it is clear that the sum of money sought to be recovered not only owes its origin to the fact that bets were made but is itself a sum of money so won."

In my view, there is certainly no comfort to be gained from that case by counsel for the plaintiff. The fact that LORD GREENE indicated that it was possible that agreements might exist for good consideration which were not in fact agreements to pay betting debts, although they may have had their origin at the outset in some betting transactions, is an entirely different consideration.

In conclusion, I think it is only necessary to deal with the argument of counsel for the plaintiff that the Act with which we are now concerned, viz., the Gaming Act, 1892, is a different Act from that with which STREATFEILD, J., was dealing in his judgment and with which the House of Lords were dealing in Hill v. William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd. (15). The Gaming Act, 1845, s. 18, provides :

A "All contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void ; and no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law and equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which

B any wager shall have been made . . . "

The Gaming Act, 1892, was passed to deal in terms with the case where there is the intervention of an agent, and s. 1 provides :

C "Any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Gaming Act, 1845, or to pay any sum of money by way of commission, fee, reward, or otherwise in respect of any such contract, or of any services in relation thereto or in connexion therewith, shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money."

D In Tatam v. Reeve (16), the headnote states :

E "The Gaming Act, 1892, s. 1, enacts that any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by [the Gaming Act, 1845] shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money :—Held, that money paid by the plaintiff for the defendant at his request to persons with whom the defendant had lost bets was money paid 'in respect of' a gaming contract within the meaning of the Gaming Act, 1892, and therefore that the plaintiff could not recover the sums so paid by him from the defendant."

In my view, the reasoning in all the cases to which I have referred applies equally to the Act of 1892 as to the Act of 1845. In fact, though counsel for the

F plaintiff very properly emphasised that we were here dealing with a different Act, I am not conscious that he advanced any argument in principle showing what the difference was between the two Acts for present purposes. I am clearly of opinion that there is none. He also pointed out that Alberg's case (9) was between a bookmaker and a backer, whereas this is a case between the agent of the backer and the backer, and that he is relying on two accounts stated, one

G as between the bookmaker and the plaintiff (the agent), and the other as between the plaintiff and the defendant (the backer). I cannot see how that can make any difference. If accounts stated of this kind, in respect of transactions which are admittedly betting transactions, and relating only to betting transactions, are as void as the transactions themselves, I cannot see how it can help the plaintiff because there were two accounts stated and not merely one.

H Although it has been necessary to examine a number of cases, the result, I think, is quite clear. As I have said before, until the recent effort to get round the Gaming Acts by means of actions of this kind, it had always been recognised that such an obvious "dodge," if I may use the word, was doomed to failure. That being the case, the law now having been definitely settled to that effect by the decision of STREATFEILD, J., in Alberg v. Chandler (9) (which I think is clearly right), it is, in my opinion, the duty of this court to see that actions which are in reality actions in respect of betting transactions, and betting transactions only, but which are given the guise of legitimate transactions by being described as accounts stated, should not be allowed to continue. For these reasons, I think that this appeal fails.

SINGLETON, L.J. : Applications to strike out statements of claim under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4, or under the inherent jurisdiction of the court, have been fairly frequent of late. I do not think that they ought to be encouraged. It is quite clear in the present case that the subject-matter of the litigation was betting and nothing else. The statements of claim, which in the alternative (and that is the only part we have to consider) are based as on an account stated, give as particulars :

"On July 8, 1948, the defendant orally admitted to the plaintiff on the telephone and agreed that the said payment was correct as to amount."

Some question was raised by counsel for the defendant whether or not that could constitute an account stated, but, for the purposes of my judgment, I assume that it was an account stated in the strict sense of the word. That pleading led to a request for particulars, and the first particulars which were given were not very satisfactory so, as was to be expected, a further request was made, and further particulars were given, para. 1 (a) of which reads as follows :

"The best particulars that the plaintiff can give of the request by the defendant are that the defendant asked the plaintiff to put some money on horses for him in the plaintiff's name with F. A. Harden & Co. of Spalding."

Then, in para. 1 (b), it is said that thereafter the plaintiff, having received the account from F. A. Harden & Co., agreed the amount which was due, and agreed the items, which were cross items. Thus the plaintiff's claim is founded on an account stated, which counsel on his behalf submitted made the case different from the other cases which had been decided under applications of this kind. In one sense that is right, but there is no getting away from the fact that the plaintiff sued the defendant in respect of bets on horses and on nothing else, whatever one may choose to call it. If a man makes bets in this way, of course, he ought to pay them, and, if he does not pay, it bears rather a nasty look. Therefore, these applications to strike out statements of claim are sometimes made in the hope of avoiding publicity, and, in the ordinary course, if the application succeeds before the master, and there is no appeal, the defendant does avoid publicity. In the present case the registrar struck out the statements of claim, and the plaintiff appealed. SLADE, J., upheld the decision of the registrar, and the plaintiff appeals to this court. The result of all this is that the defendant may have achieved some publicity, notwithstanding his desire to avoid it. He may, indeed, have been the means of others being able to succeed in striking out a statement of claim if a plaintiff is so rash as to bring proceedings of this kind in the future. The fact remains that the courts of this country are not meant to be used for the recovery of gambling debts. That has been recognised for a long time, and for that reason other names or labels are put on cases of this kind when they are brought to court.

There have been several cases of this kind which have reached the Court of Appeal recently, and my Lord has referred to two of them. When Day v. William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd. (11) was before this court, I thought that Gugenheim's case (3) presented some difficulty, but in the result it did not because, when the document, which was said to be an account stated in Day's case (11) was examined, it was not an account stated at all. On this appeal we had presented to us the difficulty—and I think it was a difficulty—raised by Gugenheim's case (3). We have had the opportunity given to us of examining, with the help of learned counsel, the authorities dealing with matters of this kind, and in the result I find myself satisfied that the plaintiff in this case could not succeed if his action went to trial. Virtually, what has been done in this case is to try his action.

I do not propose to refer in detail to the numerous authorities which were cited, but the statement in the judgment of FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J. ([1908] 2 K.B. 719), in Hyams v. Stuart King (12), followed, as it was, by the statement of FARWELL, L.J. (ibid., 724) in the same case, is one expression—and a very strong expression—of view on claims of this nature. The same view was taken by MAUGHAM, J., in Re Home & Colonial Insurance Co. (8), and by STREATFEILD, J., in Alberg v. Chandler (9). The judgment of STREATFEILD, J., in Alberg v. Chandler (9), was expressly approved by DENNING, L.J., in this court in William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd. v. Rose (10). Again in Hill v. William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd. (15), a recent decision of the House of Lords, VISCOUNT SIMON said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 461) :

“The arrangement, by the very terms of the letter of Aug. 17, is to pay by instalments ‘the balance of our account’ and the account is an account of betting transactions and of nothing else. The first limb of s. 18 [of the Act of 1845] does not apply to the case because the contract sued on is not ‘by way of gaming or wagering’ but is a new bargain, but, inasmuch as the new bargain was to pay the betting account, an action brought on it, as it seems to me, is nevertheless brought for recovering sums won by betting.”

No good purpose would be served by going into the authorities further, but I am satisfied that the plaintiff could not succeed in this case if it were allowed to go to trial.

What, then, ought this court to do? I think it would have been better and cheaper for everyone if the action had gone for trial. I recognise the position under applications of this kind, and I bear in mind the words of FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., in Dyson v. Attorney-General (2), where he stressed the general principle that the court ought not to strike out a pleading if any cause of action is shown, and that this particular rule was never intended to apply to any pleading which raises a question of general importance or serious questions of law. In the circumstances, however, and after the argument which has taken place in this court, satisfied, as I am, that the plaintiff could not recover, I think it is the duty of this court to say so. To hold otherwise would only add to expense and to waste of time. I agree that this appeal fails on the ground that the plaintiff has no reasonable cause of action.

JENKINS, L.J. : I agree. Assuming that the plaintiff succeeded at the trial in establishing the most favourable possible state of facts, that is to say, assuming that he could succeed in showing, not only that the two accounts were stated accounts as between himself and the bookmaker in the sense that every item on each side of the account had been gone through and agreed and the balance struck, and assuming further that he could prove at the trial similar circumstances as between himself and the defendant, nevertheless it seems to me impossible that his action should succeed.

The plaintiff, having paid the balances of the two accounts to the bookmaker, seeks to recover those balances from the defendant. He is at once faced by the Gaming Act, 1892, s. 1, which provides in effect that “any promise, express or implied,” on which he bases his action against the defendant is null and void if the sums that the plaintiff paid to the bookmaker and now seeks to recover from the defendant were sums paid under or in respect of contracts rendered void by the Gaming Act, 1845. The sums in question here were balances of accounts which are to be assumed for this purpose to be stated accounts. It seems to me, however, abundantly plain (even apart from authority) that the balance of a betting account is a balance in respect of bets and nothing else. The accounts here are simply and solely accounts of betting transactions. The fact that the transactions on each side are set off against each other and a balance one way or the other is arrived at does not alter the character of the balance and make it a balance in respect of something other than bets. I think that that is clear on the plain language of the section, and is also clear on the authorities to which my Lords have referred. Once one arrives at the conclusion that those sums were sums paid in respect of contracts avoided by the Gaming Act, 1845, s. 18, there is necessarily an end of the case, for the defendant's promise to pay those sums is rendered null and void by the express terms of s. 1 of the Act of 1892. It matters not whether one regards the defendant's promise as an express or implied promise to indemnify the plaintiff as his agent or as a promise arising on a stated account. The former promise must obviously be void ab initio because it was nothing more nor less than a promise to pay the plaintiff whatever sums he laid out as agent for the defendant in betting transactions. A promise of the latter type, in my judgment, is in no better position. Once the principle is accepted that the balance of these betting accounts is a balance in respect of betting, then one cannot out of accounts stated as between the plaintiff and the defendant construct a promise which is anything else than a promise to pay sums paid by the plaintiff in respect of a contract avoided by the Act of 1845.

I have nothing to add, except to endorse what my Lords have said about the caution with which the court should view an application to strike out proceedings as disclosing no cause of action. I agree that, before taking that step, the court should be very sure that there is, indeed, no cause of action and the plaintiff should be given the benefit of every possible doubt. In this case, after the very full argument we have heard, I agree with my Lords that it is abundantly plain that the action could not succeed, and it follows that the proper course is to affirm the order of the learned judge.

TUCKER, L.J. : I wish to add that I also have dealt with this case on the assumption that both the accounts stated relied on by counsel for the plaintiff are real accounts stated, to use the language of BLACKBURN, J. (4 B. & S. 506), in Re Laycock v. Pickles (13), i.e., they are accounts of such a nature that, when the several items of claim are brought into the account on either side and set against one another, and a balance is struck, the consideration for the payment of the balance is a discharge of the items on each side. I wish, however, to make it clear that, in my view, in a case of this kind, it can make no difference whatever which precise form of account stated is in question. In Camillo Tank Steamship Co., Ltd. v. Alexandria Engineering Works (17) there will be found much learning on the subject of accounts stated, but my judgment applies equally to any one of the forms of accounts stated which are dealt with in that case which have their origin in betting transactions, and consist of betting items only.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors : Gibson & Weldon, agents for Cecil Crust & Co., Spalding (for the plaintiff) ; Lee, Bolton & Lee, agents for Roythorne & Co., Spalding (for the defendant).

[Reported by C. ST.J. NICHOLSON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

R. v. MATTHEWS.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lewis and Cassels, JJ.), December 16, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Receiving stolen property—Innocent receipt—Later intention to appropriate property.

A The appellant admitted receiving stolen property, but he said that his intention at the time of the receipt was to hand it over to the police. He made an appointment with the police, which was kept, but the property was not handed over. The police wished to see him about other matters and he was taken into custody. On the way to the police station in a motor car he placed the stolen property behind a seat where it was found the next day. In his summing-up the chairman of quarter sessions said :
 B “ You may think that when he telephoned to the police he may have been intending to hand over the stolen property. Assume that he did. If he changed that intention, then we are in this position. He received property which was stolen, which he knew to be stolen, and, having no guilty intent originally, nevertheless he changed that intent and kept [the property], and my instructions are that in those circumstances that is no defence to these charges, because the guilty intent is present when he did not hand it over to the police.” The jury convicted the appellant of receiving the property.
 C

HELD : where a person became in possession of property wrongfully (as by trespass), though not feloniously and later changed his mind and appropriated the property, that amounted to stealing, but not to receiving:
 D R. v. Riley (1853) (20 L.T.O.S. 228) and Ruse v. Read ([1949] 1 All E.R. 398), applied ; the jury had been misdirected ; and the conviction must be quashed.

[AS TO RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, pp. 550-558, paras. 935-947 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 15, pp. 962-973, Nos. 10753-10879 and Digest Supp.]

E Cases referred to :

(1) Ruse v. Read, [1949] 1 All E.R. 398 ; [1949] 1 K.B. 377.

(2) R. v. Riley, (1853), Dears. C.C. 149 ; 22 L.J.M.C. 48 ; 20 L.T.O.S. 228 ; 17 J.P. 69 ; 15 Digest 878, 9634.

F APPEAL against conviction. The appellant was convicted at Hampshire Quarter Sessions on a charge of receiving stolen property. He also pleaded Guilty to two charges of false pretences and asked that eight other offences might be taken into consideration, and he was sentenced to seven years' preventive detention. The court quashed the conviction, but did not interfere with the sentence. The facts appear in the judgment of the court.

G H. Summerfield for the appellant.
Fay for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. This appellant was convicted after a trial at the Hampshire Quarter Sessions of receiving stolen property. He also pleaded Guilty to two charges of false pretences, and asked for eight other offences to be taken into consideration. He
 H was sentenced to seven years' preventive detention, and the court, although they are going to quash the conviction on one count, sees no ground for interfering with the sentence.

The only point is whether the conviction of receiving was right. The appellant undoubtedly received some property which he knew to be stolen. The defence was : “ I received that property from the thief. I knew he was a thief, and I knew he had stolen the property, but my intention when I received it was to hand it over to the police.” Undoubtedly he did send a telephone message to the police who were at that time anxious to see him with regard to motor cars which had been obtained by false pretences. When the police saw him, however, he did not give up the property to them. He was put into a police car and taken off in custody, and somehow, while in the car, he got the stolen property out of his pocket and slipped it down behind the seat of the car where it was found the next day.

The learned chairman directed the jury in this way :

"On those facts you have got to consider this. You may think that when he telephoned to the police he may have been intending to hand over the stolen property. Assume that he did. If he changed that intention, then we are in this position. He received property which was stolen, which he knew to be stolen, and, having no guilty intent originally, nevertheless he changed that intent and kept [the property], and my instructions are that in those circumstances that is no defence to these charges, because the guilty intent is present when he did not hand it over to the police."

In the opinion of this court, that is a misdirection. If the appellant received the property with the intention at once of handing it over to the police, that would not be a felonious receiving. The court cannot possibly accept the argument which has been addressed to it on behalf of the prosecution that a person who intends at once to hand to the police, or its true owner, stolen property which has come into his possession, is nevertheless guilty of the felony of receiving stolen property. That is so startling that I am surprised the argument can be put, and, if, when the property is received, the receipt is innocent, the fact that the receiver changes his mind and later misappropriates the property does not turn the receipt into a felony. What might happen in such a case? Where a person, having received property innocently, then changed his mind and misappropriated it, it has been more than once attempted to be said that that would amount to larceny. A little time ago in the Divisional Court we considered in Ruse v. Read (1) the old case of R. v. Riley (2), and we pointed out that, if the original taking is wrongful, though not felonious—that is to say is trespass—then, if the taker subsequently alters his mind and appropriates the property, that does amount to felony. In R. v. Riley (2) a man drove his sheep into a field. Next day, driving them out, he found that among his flock was a sheep which he knew did not belong to him. No doubt he was innocent of felonious intent, but it was nevertheless a trespass to goods. When afterwards, having wrongfully, though not feloniously, taken the property, he made up his mind to appropriate the sheep, he became guilty of felony. In Ruse v. Read (1) the justices found that a man who, while under the influence of liquor, took a bicycle, rode about on it, and then took it home, had no felonious intent at the time he took it. On the next day, instead of returning the bicycle to the police or to the true owner, he packed it up and addressed it from the west country to himself at some station in the north. We found that that amounted to stealing. It was never said in R. v. Riley (2) or in Ruse v. Read (1) that the accused had become guilty of receiving. What was said was that he had become guilty of stealing.

In the present case, if the jury had believed the appellant's evidence that he had innocently taken the property in the sense that he was returning it to the true owner or to the police, there would be no trespass, and, therefore, he could not be guilty of the offence of stealing. In any case, there was a complete misdirection by the chairman on the law of receiving, and, therefore, the conviction on this count must be quashed.

Conviction of receiving stolen property quashed.

Solicitors : Registrar, Court of Criminal Appeal (for the appellant) ; Talbot & Davies (for the Crown).

[Reported by H. MoL. MORRISON, Barrister-at-Law.]

BAXTER v. ECKERSLEY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Somervell and Denning, L.J.J.), December 14, 15, 20, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—Claim by landlord against tenant's widow—Allegation that tenant a contractual tenant—Claim and acceptance by landlord from tenant of statutory increases of rent—No statutory notice of increase—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (g).

In February, 1938, a landlord let a dwelling-house to J.E. at a rent of 11s. per week. In April, 1945, April, 1946, and April, 1947, the landlord orally informed J.E. that the rates had been increased, and that J.E. would have to pay a further 2d. per week, and as a result thereafter J.E. paid 11s. 6d. No statutory notice of the increase was on any occasion given, nor was J.E. at any time given notice to quit. On Apr. 15, 1949, J.E. died intestate, leaving a widow who, it was admitted, would be entitled to remain in possession under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g), if J.E. had been a statutory tenant. No letters of administration to J.E.'s estate were taken out, and the landlord served a notice to quit on the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division. On the expiration of the notice, the landlord claimed possession from the widow on the ground that J.E. had been a contractual tenant, and payment, at the rate of 11s. 6d. per week, for use and occupation. Judgment was given in the county court for the landlord on both claims. On appeal by the widow, the landlord contended, in support of his claim for possession, that, as no statutory notice of increase had been given, the increases in 1945, 1946 and 1947 were invalid and no statutory tenancy had arisen.

HELD : the landlord, having alleged his right to, and obtained, the increased rent, could not also assert for the purpose of obtaining possession that the increased rent was irrecoverable ; nor could he be heard to say that the increase of the rent was invalid owing to the absence of any statutory notice, since the cause of the invalidity was his own act or default ; and, therefore, he was not entitled to possession.

New Zealand Shipping Co. v. Société des Ateliers et Chantiers de France ([1919] A.C. 1), Dexters, Ltd. v. Hill Crest Oil Co. (Bradford) Ltd. ([1926] 1 K.B. 348), and Re Savoy Estate Ltd. ([1949] 2 All E.R. 286), applied.

[AS TO STATUTORY TENANTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 334, 335, paras. 400, 401 and 1948 Supplement ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 31, pp. 575, 576, Nos. 7226-7255.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Thynne v. Salmon, [1948] 1 All E.R. 49 ; [1948] 1 K.B. 482 ; [1948] L.J.R. 506 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Dexters, Ltd. v. Hill Crest Oil Co. (Bradford) Ltd., [1926] 1 K.B. 348 ; 95 L.J.K.B. 386 ; 134 L.T. 494 ; Digest Supp.
- (3) Re Savoy Estate Ltd., [1949] 2 All E.R. 286 ; [1949] Ch. 622 ; [1949] L.J.R. 1549.
- (4) Summers v. Donohue, [1945] 1 All E.R. 599 ; [1945] K.B. 376 ; 114 L.J.K.B. 401 ; 172 L.T. 310 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (5) Smith v. Mather, [1948] 1 All E.R. 704 ; [1948] 2 K.B. 212 ; [1948] L.J.R. 1209 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (6) Brock v. Wollams, [1949] 1 All E.R. 715 ; [1949] 2 K.B. 388.
- (7) New Zealand Shipping Co. v. Société des Ateliers et Chantiers de France. [1919] A.C. 1 ; 87 L.J.K.B. 746 ; 118 L.T. 731 ; 7 Digest 335, 20.
- (8) United Australia, Ltd. v. Barclays Bank, Ltd., [1940] 4 All E.R. 20 ; [1941] A.C. 1 ; 109 L.J.K.B. 919 ; 164 L.T. 139 ; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the widow of the deceased tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE WALMSLEY, K.C., made at Bolton County Court on July 20, 1949, giving the landlord possession of a dwelling-house and for payment for the use and occupation thereof by the widow. The widow had paid the amount claimed for use and occupation into court and that amount was paid out to the landlord, there being no appeal against the decision of the county court judge on the question of use and occupation, but her appeal against the order for possession was allowed. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J., and are summarised in the headnote. A

J. Gower for the widow.

O. G. Morris (Galphin with him) for the landlord.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20. SOMERVELL, L.J., read the following judgment. This is an appeal from a decision of His Honour JUDGE WALMSLEY, K.C., making an order for possession in favour of the plaintiff landlord. The defendant is the widow of a previous tenant of the premises. The house was let in 1938 to the defendant's husband. He died on Apr. 15, 1949, and she is claiming to remain in possession under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g). If her husband was at the date of his death a statutory tenant, it is not disputed that she can do so. The learned county court judge held that the husband at the date of his death was a contractual tenant, and, no letters of administration having been taken out and a notice to quit having been served on the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, the defendant cannot, having regard to previous decisions of this court, claim the protection of the section : see Thynne v. Salmon (1). The original tenancy of the husband in February, 1938, was at a rent of 11s. per week. In the particulars of claim the rent at the date of the death is alleged to have been 11s. 6d. This sum is claimed in the particulars of claim in respect of use and occupation by the defendant from Apr. 15, 1949, the date of the death, to July 2. There is no evidence whether these premises were controlled prior to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939. If they were not, the standard rent would be 11s., which was the rent on Sept. 1, 1939. If they were, it is right to assume that 11s. was the standard rent under the earlier Act with any statutory additions, and the increase to 11s. 6d. could only be made on the basis that the statutory conditions precedent to an increase had been complied with. If they had, the tenant would have become a statutory tenant. In respect of the claim for use and occupation made on the basis that the rent was 11s. 6d. at the date of the deceased's death, the sum claimed was paid into court, and the landlord sought at the hearing, and obtained, an order for the payment out of that money to him. B C D E F

The landlord gave evidence. The sum of 11s. 6d. resulted from three increases and one decrease made in the years 1945 to 1948. The landlord's evidence as to what happened was as follows :

"Own 73, Egerton Street, Farnworth. Feb., 1938, let to John Thomas Eckersley. I collected rent weekly. Rent was 11s. Three increases of 2d. each, now 11s. 6d. April, 1945, 1946, 1947. I told the old man the rates had risen and so he would have to pay extra rent. He said all right. I did not say he would have to leave or serve any notice. This happened each year. Apr. 16. Went to house, saw defendant, she said her husband had died day before. She asked to become tenant and I refused. She paid the rent on the Saturday. I also took rent on Apr. 22. None since." G H

It was not suggested that these were not increases which would have been justified if the notice in writing required by the Act had been served.

The question that arises can be formulated in this way. The landlord, in alleging that 11s. 6d. was the rent at the date of the death, is necessarily alleging that as between him and the dead man the statutory conditions entitling him to claim that sum have been fulfilled. That claim is satisfied by a payment into court. Can he, in support of his other claim, tender evidence to show that the statutory conditions have not been fulfilled? In one and the same proceedings a plaintiff cannot, I think, obtain two forms of relief based on inconsistent premises. It is, of course, clear that a tenant cannot contract out of his rights under the Rent Acts. The payment by a tenant of an increase unauthorised by the statute would not, either as a matter of contract or estoppel, preclude him from asserting his rights to recover rent so overpaid under s. 14 of the Act of 1920, or otherwise affect his rights under the Acts. If the defendant had sought to allege that the deceased was at the date of his death a contractual tenant, that allegation would, so far as I can see, have succeeded. In deciding, as I do, that the landlord cannot, having alleged his right to, and obtained, the increased rent, also assert for the purpose of other relief that that increased rent was irrecoverable, I am applying a principle which was applied in Dexters Ltd. v. Hill Crest Oil Co. (Bradford) Ltd. (2), and, in somewhat complicated circumstances, in Re Savoy Estate Ltd. (3), both decisions of this court. In Dexters' case (2), an award was stated in the form of a Special Case with three alternative awards. On the matter coming before the judge, he decided that the first award was right. The buyers demanded and received payment of the amount of that award. They then appealed and sought to contend that the first award was wrong and the second was right. BANKES, L.J., said ([1926] 1 K.B. 354) :

“... I am quite clear that having taken the £2,000 [the amount of the first award] the appellants cannot now be heard to say that the award under which they took the money was based on a wrong view of the law.”

It seems to me the principle applied in these two cases is applicable here. The rent having been claimed and taken, the landlord cannot obtain possession on the basis that he was not entitled to that sum. I have had the advantage of reading the judgment about to be delivered by DENNING, L.J., and I agree with his application to the facts of this case of the principle that a man cannot take advantage of his own wrong. In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed.

DENNING, L.J., read the following judgment. In my early days at the Bar I was engaged in a large number of Rent Act cases, and never did I hear it suggested that, on the death of a contractual tenant intestate, his widow was not protected by the Acts. The common opinion was that she was protected, just as much as the widow of a statutory tenant. Indeed, MACKINNON, L.J., treated it as self-evident : see Summers v. Donohue (4) ([1945] 1 All E.R. 600). This view does, however, give rise to legal problems, and when this court was confronted with them in December, 1947, in Thynne v. Salmon (1), the majority of the court felt obliged to hold that, on the death of a contractual tenant, no member of his family is protected by the Acts. Many landlords have taken advantage of the potentialities thus newly opened to them. Any landlord who desires to turn out a widow now anxiously asserts, if he can, that the dead husband was a contractual tenant and not a statutory tenant. Such a landlord, on the husband's death, gets to work quickly before the widow takes out letters of administration. He says that the tenancy is vested in the President of the Probate Division, and serves a notice to quit on him. Thereupon, he is in a position to turn the widow out : Smith v. Mather (5). This procedure has become so popular with landlords that the President has had to issue a public notice asking that these notices should be sent to the Treasury Solicitor : see [1949] W.N. 130. These landlords are, however, in some difficulty in getting the widow out if they have increased the rent during the husband's time, because the court will readily presume that the increases were validly made by means of a statutory notice, and that, therefore, the husband was not a contractual tenant but a statutory one : Brock v. Wollams (6) ([1949] 1 All E.R. 719).

In this present case the landlord has sought to overcome even that difficulty by asserting, quite unashamedly, that, although he increased the rent by the permitted amount, he did not serve a statutory notice of increase, and that, therefore, the increases were invalid, and the husband remained a contractual tenant. If this argument were allowed to prevail, it would put any widow at the mercy of an unscrupulous landlord who chose to assert that he never served a statutory notice of increase, for, the husband being dead, the widow would have no evidence to the contrary. In my opinion, the argument cannot prevail. The landlord has overlooked a very old principle laid down by LORD COKE (Co. Litt. 206 b) long ago which says that no man can take advantage of his own wrong, or, to put it more precisely, that no man can be heard to say that a transaction is invalid if the cause of the invalidity is his own act or default. The other party may say it is invalid, but he may not : see New Zealand Shipping Co. v. Société des Ateliers et Chantiers de France (7). This principle applies with especial force in this case because the provisions about a notice of increase were passed as a weapon of defence for tenants and it would be strange if they could be turned into a weapon of offence by landlords. A tenant may say that an increase was invalid because there was no notice of increase or no proper notice, but a landlord cannot do so because that would be to allow him to take advantage of his own default. This particular landlord has, indeed, so far had it both ways. He has not only received the increased rent for four years, but he has actually sued for and received the increased rent in this action from the widow—a thing which he could only do on the basis that the husband was a statutory tenant. Nevertheless, he has also got an order to evict the widow—a thing which he can only do on the basis that the husband was a contractual tenant. These are inconsistent rights which he is claiming, and he cannot have both : Dexters' case (2), United Australia, Ltd. v. Barclays Bank, Ltd. (8) ([1940] 4 All E.R. 37). Having got the increased rent, he cannot now turn round and say that the increases were invalid.

Counsel for the landlord argued that the tenant could not be precluded from saying that the notices were invalid, so why should the landlord be precluded from saying likewise. "Estoppels," he said, "ought to be mutual." That old saying has, however, little application in our modern law of estoppel by words or conduct. It certainly has no application to this case, which is not one of estoppel in the strict sense. I express no opinion whether the widow could hereafter be heard to say that the increases were invalid. All I say is that the landlord should not be allowed for his own ends to say that he omitted to serve a statutory notice. He must be taken to have done so, and the widow is protected by the Acts. The appeal should be allowed.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I also agree.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors : J. H. Milner & Son, agents for Leslie M. Lever & Co., Manchester (for the defendant) ; Wetherfield, Baines & Baines, agents for J. W. Francis, Walkden, Manchester (for the plaintiff).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re SCARISBRICK'S WILL TRUSTS.
SCARISBRICK AND ANOTHER v. PUBLIC TRUSTEE AND H.M. ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), October 27, December 12, 21, 1949.]

Charity—Charitable purpose—Relief of poverty—Public element—Immediate gift for such relations of sons and daughters as should be in needy circumstances.

By her will, dated July 27, 1911, a testatrix, who died on Apr. 28, 1915, devised and bequeathed all her real and personal estate not otherwise disposed of to her trustees on trust to pay the income thereof in equal shares to her daughters. A. and E., during their joint lives and to the survivor during her life, and after the death of the survivor of them to pay the same income to her son T., during his life, "and after the death of the survivor of my said daughters and son the trustees . . . shall hold the same on trust for such relations of my said son and daughters as in the opinion of the survivor of my said son and daughters shall be in needy circumstances . . ." T. died on May 18, 1933. A. died on July 2, 1940, and E. died on May 12, 1948, without having exercised the power of appointment.

HELD : while, in the case of gifts for poor relations having perpetual continuance, the courts had uniformly regarded the recipients, not as a class standing in personal relationship to the testator, but as constituting a particular section of poor people, the present gift was one for distribution within the period allowed by the rule against perpetuities, and the recipients were to be regarded as beneficiaries under a family trust, and, therefore, the gift was not charitable.

Dicta of SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., in A.-G. v. Price (1810) (17 Ves. 374), and of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Re Compton ([1945] 1 All E.R. 201), applied.

[AS TO HOW FAR "PRIVATE" CHARITIES ARE LEGAL CHARITIES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 4, pp. 127-138, paras. 169-179; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 8, pp. 261-263, Nos. 240-252.]

- (1) A.-G. v. Buckland, (1742), cited in Amb. 71; 44 Digest 890, 7478.
- (2) Re Compton, [1945] 1 All E.R. 198; [1945] Ch. 123; 114 L.J.Ch. 99; 172 L.T. 158; 2nd Digest Supp.

- (3) Isaac v. Defriez, (1754), Amb. 595; 17 Ves. 373, n.; 44 Digest 890, 7479.
- (4) A.-G. v. Price, (1810), 17 Ves. 371; 8 Digest 242, 12.

- (5) White v. White, (1802), 7 Ves. 423; 8 Digest 242, 10.

- (6) Bernal v. Bernal, (1838), as reported in 3 My. & Cr. 559, n.; 44 Digest 533, 3499.

- (7) Brown v. Whalley, [1866] W.N. 386.

- (8) Gillam v. Taylor, (1873), L.R. 16 Eq. 581; 42 L.J.Ch. 674; 28 L.T. 833; 8 Digest 242, 14.

- (9) A.-G. v. Northumberland (Duke), (1877), 7 Ch.D. 745; 47 L.J.Ch. 569; varied without affecting this point, (1878), 38 L.T. 245; 8 Digest 306, 856.

- (10) Gibson v. South American Stores (Gath & Chaves), Ltd., [1949] 2 All E.R. 18; [1949] Ch. 572; [1949] L.J.R. 1228; affirmed in part and reversed in part, [1949] 2 All E.R. 985.

- (11) Spiller v. Maude, (1881), 32 Ch.D. 158, n.; 8 Digest 262, 245.

- (12) Re Gosling, (1900), 48 W.R. 300; 8 Digest 244, 27.

- (13) Re Buck, [1896] 2 Ch. 727; 65 L.J.Ch. 881; 75 L.T. 312; 60 J.P. 775; 8 Digest 262, 246.

- (14) Re Sir Robert Laidlaw's Will Trusts, (1935), unreported.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether an immediate gift by will of part of a trust fund to relations in needy circumstances constituted a valid charitable trust. ROXBURGH, J., held that the gift was not charitable. The facts appear in the judgment. The relevant words of the will are set out in the headnote.

R. L. Edwards for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the will of the testatrix.

Wilfrid M. Hunt for the Public Trustee, executor of the will of the son of the testatrix.

D. B. Buckley for the Attorney-General.

Cur. adv. vult. A

Dec. 21. ROXBURGH, J., read the following judgment. Lady Scarisbrick, who died on Apr. 28, 1915, by her will, dated July 27, 1911, appointed her son, Sir Tom Talbot Leyland Scarisbrick, and her daughters, Alexandra Emma Von Lang Puchof and Erneste Beatrice Kraemer, to be the executors and trustees of her will. By cl. 11 she devised and bequeathed all her real and personal estate in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and in the British Dominions beyond the seas not otherwise disposed of unto her trustees on trust to pay the income thereof in equal shares to her daughters during their joint lives and to the survivor of them during her life, and after the death of the survivor of them to pay the same income to her son, Sir Tom Talbot Leyland Scarisbrick, Bart., during his life, and after the death of the survivor of her daughters and son the trustees for the time being of her will were to hold the same on trust for such relations of her son and daughters as, in the opinion of the survivor of her son and daughters, should be in needy circumstances, and for such charitable objects, either in Germany or in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland (preferably charitable objects connected with the Roman Catholic Church and faith), for such interests, and in such proportions and manner in every respect as the survivor of her son and daughters should by deed or will appoint. The testatrix's son, Sir Tom, died on May 18, 1933. Mrs. Puchof died on July 2, 1940, and Mrs. Kraemer died on May 12, 1948. The power of appointment was not exercised.

It appeared early in the argument that there might be some conflict between the heir at law, who was represented by counsel, and other persons, who were not represented, as to the destination of any part of the fund not effectually given to charity, and it was thereupon agreed that my decision should be confined to the question whether the whole, or, if not, how much, of the fund was thus effectually given. The bequest plainly falls into two parts, and the second part is admittedly charitable. The essential features of the first part of the bequest are that its objects are relations of the son and the two daughters of the testatrix "in needy circumstances," that the survivor of the son and daughters is to determine which relations are in fact objects of the bounty and also which members of that class are to receive it, and that distribution is to be made on the death of the survivor once and for all. I cannot escape by way of construction from the maze of authority which lies ahead.

The trend of authorities down to 1929 is well summarised in TUDOR ON CHARITIES, 5th ed., where it is said (p. 26) :

"Trusts for the benefit of poor relations, kinsmen, or descendants exceeding the limit allowed by the rules of remoteness, are upheld as charities."

The author also says (ibid., 27) :

"As regards gifts intended for immediate distribution, the decisions are conflicting. In some cases it has been held that a gift for 'poor kindred' or poor relations, like a gift for 'relations,' is to be confined to the statutory next of kin, on the footing that such a gift, not being charitable, would be void for uncertainty were it not so restricted. On the other hand, there have been several cases in which such gifts have been charitable and not confined to statutory next of kin. And LORD HARDWICKE is said to have observed in A.-G. v. Buckland (1), that where a bequest is to relations it is to be confined to next of kin, but where it is to 'poor' relations, the construction has been more large, and has been extended to those who were of kin and objects of charity. The sounder view is thought to be that a gift for immediate distribution among poor relations, kindred, and so forth, is charitable except in cases where the intention of the donor, derived from the construction of the documents, is to confine the benefit of the gift to statutory next of kin. Outside this limit no line can be drawn, and the objects ought not to be treated as less extensive where the gift is for immediate distribution than where a perpetual trust is intended."

This view, however, was expressed before the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Compton (2). If I am free to apply the principles laid down in Re Compton (2), and expressly stated to apply to all categories of charity, I shall be in no doubt. In that case LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 201) :

"... no gift can be charitable in the legal sense unless it is of the necessary public character. The proposition is true of all charitable gifts... When I come to deal with the 'poor relations' cases it will be found that 150 years ago the essential nature of this requirement was perhaps not as clearly appreciated as it is to-day."

LORD GREENE then gives illustrations of gifts which are wanting in the necessary public character, and one of the illustrations seems to me to be this case, that is (ibid.) :

"... when the claimants, in order to establish their status, have to assert and prove... that they stand in some specified relationship to the individuals A.B., C.D., and E.F... In such a case... a purely personal element enters into and is an essential part of the qualification which is defined by reference to something, i.e., a personal relationship to individuals or an individual which is in its essence non-public."

The whole court agreed with this judgment, which in principle decides the point before me against charity. The same principle would, however, decide all "poor relations" cases against charity, and, in a later part of his judgment, LORD GREENE discusses some of these cases in a passage which I must read in full. His Lordship says (ibid., 205) :

"I must now turn to the 'poor relations' cases on the analogy of which COHEN, J., felt himself constrained against his own view to decide against the appellants. The authorities relied on by the respondents are as follows. In Isaac v. Defriez (3) the gifts were (i) a gift of two annuities to the poorest relations of the testator and of his wife ; (ii) a gift of income to one poor relation of the testator 'for a portion in the way of marriage and putting him or her out in the world' ; and (iii) a similar gift of income to one poor relation of his wife. These gifts were upheld as good charitable gifts but no reasons for the decision appear in the report. This case was followed in A.-G. v. Price (4), where the gift was in favour of the testator's 'poor kinsmen and kinswomen and their offspring and issue which shall dwell in the county of Brecon.' SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., followed Isaac v. Defriez (3), saying (17 Ves. 374) : 'This seems to be just as much in the nature of a charitable bequest as that. It is to have perpetual continuance, in favour of a particular description of poor ; and is not like an immediate bequest of a sum to be distributed among poor relations.' In an earlier case White v. White (5), SIR WILLIAM GRANT had supported as charitable a gift by a testatrix for the purpose of putting out 'our poor relations' apprentices. By a codicil this gift was confined to two families. SIR WILLIAM GRANT appears to have thought that the case was similar to an earlier case of his own where 'a great number of Jews were the objects' ; such a gift would no doubt be regarded to-day as satisfying the well-established rule that a good charitable gift must be for the benefit of the public or a section of the public, a test which SIR WILLIAM GRANT does not appear to have taken into consideration in White v. White (5) or in A.-G. v. Price (4). Bernal v. Bernal (6) was a case in which the only matter decided arose on the construction of a will providing for poor relations who were in fact (as the will was construed) the male descendants of certain named relatives of the testator. It appears from the petition that the gift was established as a charity under a decree of Dec. 9, 1728. What the reasons were for the decision in that behalf does not appear and when the question of construction was raised in 1838 before LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., there was no issue as to the charitable nature of the bequest. In Brown v. Whalley (7) where the gift was for the relations of the testator 'who might happen to be in want or fall to decay' the charity had similarly been established by a decree of the year 1763. In Gillam v. Taylor (8) the gift was in favour of such of the lineal descendants of the testator's maternal uncle as they might severally need. This was held to be a good charitable gift on the authority of Isaac v. Defriez (3) and A.-G. v. Price (4). In A.-G. v. Duke of Northumberland (9), the will as construed by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., was in favour of poor persons generally with a preference for poor persons who were kindred of the testator, and in that respect the case was similar to the 'founder's kin' cases. But SIR GEORGE JESSEL in his judgment referred to Isaac v. Defriez (3) and A.-G. v. Price (4) and did not cast any doubt on the correctness of those decisions.

From this review of the authorities it will be seen that they are really all derived from Isaac v. Defriez (3) and A.-G. v. Price (4). We are invited to overrule them. I agree that they are far from satisfactory and the original decisions were given at a time when the public character of a charitable gift had not been as clearly laid down as it has been in more modern authorities. If the question of the validity of gifts of this character had come up for the first time in modern days I think that it would very likely have been decided differently since I should have thought that their purpose was a private family purpose lacking the necessary public character. But it is in my view quite impossible for this court to overrule these cases. Many trusts of this description have been carried on for generations on the faith that they were charitable and many testators have no doubt been guided by these decisions. The cases must at this date be regarded as good law although they are, perhaps, anomalous.

In these circumstances the question arises whether we ought to extend the analogy of these decisions so as to cover a trust of the kind now in controversy. Taking the view which I do, as already expressed, I do not think that we are bound or ought to do so. There may perhaps be some special quality in gifts for the relief of poverty which places them in a class by themselves. It may, for instance, be that the relief of poverty is to be regarded as in itself so beneficial to the community that the fact that the gift is confined to a specified family can be disregarded: whereas in the case of an educational trust where there is no poverty qualification, the funds may at any time be applied for the purpose of educating a member of the family for whose education ample means are already available, thus providing a purely personal benefit and one freed, incidentally, from the burden of income tax. Failing such a ground of distinction, I can only regard the 'poor relations' cases as anomalous and I prefer to let them remain as such rather than to extend the anomaly to a different class of case."

Though LORD GREENE cited the judgment of SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., in A.-G. v. Price (4), where he said (17 Ves. 374):

"It is to have perpetual continuance, in favour of a particular description of poor ; and is not like an immediate bequest of a sum to be distributed among poor relations," it was not necessary for him to discuss the validity of this distinction or the conflict of authority existing with regard to the second class of case, and he did not do so. He declined to overrule the cases cited to him, all of which seem to belong to the first class, mainly by applying the principle of "stare decisis."

A No such principle can be applied to the present case. The decisions where there is no perpetuity have long been conflicting. Many of these have been cited in argument, but I need not recapitulate them because their general purport is accurately stated in the passage which I have read from TUDOR ON CHARITIES, and little, if any, further light can be obtained from a study of the reports. All that is clear is that the decisions are conflicting. Accordingly, there is here no room for the principle of "stare decisis."

B LORD GREENE did not, however, finally decide that the perpetual trusts for poor relations cited to him could only be allowed to stand on this principle. He said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 206) :

C "There may perhaps be some special quality in gifts for the relief of poverty which places them in a class by themselves. It may, for instance, be that the relief of poverty is to be regarded as in itself so beneficial to the community that the fact that the gift is confined to a specified family can be disregarded."

D LORD GREENE said "may be," not "is." It seems that none of the "poor relations" cases has ever been avowedly based on any such principle, but HARMAN, J., in Gibson v. South American Stores (Gath and Chaves), Ltd. (10), formally adopted it. In the Court of Appeal, on the other hand, SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., expressed reservations in which the whole court concurred. He said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 996) :

E "... I feel it right, if the matter shall hereafter be considered in a higher court, to say that I must not be taken to accept the view that the ground for justifying such decisions as the poor relations cases is, as HARMAN, J., expressed it ([1949] 2 All E.R. 23) : 'The explanation of the poverty cases is that a much narrower object may in them be considered to work a public benefit than in the other categories.' I think, as LORD GREENE, M.R., stated in Re Compton (2), that may be an explanation. On the other hand, it may be that they simply must be regarded now as a well-established anomaly. F I find it unnecessary in the circumstances to say any more or to express a view one way or another whether the principle HARMAN, J., found should be treated as well-established, or whether the three cases, Spiller v. Maude (11), Re Gosling (12) and Re Buck (13), ought now to be regarded as rightly decided. I think, so far as I am concerned, this question [the question before the court in the South American Stores case (10)] has been determined G by Re Sir Robert Laidlaw's Will Trusts (14), on grounds which are not apparent, and I follow them without affirming or disaffirming any of the grounds relied on by HARMAN, J."

H Neither the Court of Appeal in Re Compton (2), nor HARMAN, J., nor the Court of Appeal in Gibson v. South American Stores (Gath and Chaves), Ltd. (10), when considering whether gifts for the relief of poverty have some special quality, took account of the distinction drawn by SIR WILLIAM GRANT in A.-G. v. Price (4) between trusts to have perpetual continuance in favour of a particular description of poor and immediate bequests for distribution among poor relations. Yet this distinction has stood without challenge almost as long as the poor relations cases themselves, and it is only trusts of the former class which have enjoyed uniformity of decision. As I have a case akin to the latter class, I have to decide whether I am going to reject the distinction drawn by SIR WILLIAM GRANT and assimilate the two classes of case, or whether I am going to apply to the latter class the principles laid down in Re Compton (2) and thus resolve the conflict of authority.

It seems to me impossible to hold that in all cases of gifts for immediate distribution among poor relations the relief of poverty has some special quality which provides the necessary public character. It could not, for instance, convert a trust for the testator's children in needy circumstances into a public trust. Accordingly, a line must be drawn somewhere. This counsel for the Attorney-General concedes, and he also concedes that the decision in Gibson v. South American Stores (Gath and Chaves), Ltd. (10) would not necessarily render charitable a gift by the will of a proprietor of a business for immediate distribution among poor employees, but he will have nothing to do with the distinction drawn by SIR WILLIAM GRANT. He draws attention to the difference in emphasis between a gift to a limited class of very near relations where (as he submits) the motive of personal relationship must be paramount to the motive of the relief of poverty, and a gift to an uncertain class extending to distant relations where (as he submits) the motive of relief of poverty must be paramount, and out of this difference of emphasis he evolves a principle of construction, namely, that the court will decree any gift to poor relations (whether immediate or perpetual) to be charitable if the relief of poverty appears to be the dominant motive.

I do not see how the necessary public character of a trust could depend on any principle of construction, least of all on one based on the presumed motive of the donor. Moreover, counsel's argument runs counter, not only to SIR WILLIAM GRANT's distinction between perpetual gifts and gifts for immediate distribution, but also to the reasoning of LORD GREENE in Re Compton (2), because LORD GREENE deliberately refused to found any distinction in principle on the difference in emphasis to which counsel refers. LORD GREENE says ([1945] 1 All E.R. 202) :

"The fact that in cases where a personal element forms an essential part of the qualification the numbers involved may be large does not appear to me to make any difference to the principle to be applied. Once that element is present numbers can make no difference. The gift is in such a case a personal gift. It may, of course, fail for uncertainty, but that is neither here nor there."

The whole Court of Appeal concurred, and, therefore, counsel's argument must fail in this court. I cannot accept his proposed test, merely observing in passing that, if I had to apply such a test, I should not in the present case hold that relief of poverty was the paramount motive.

It is, indeed, doubtful whether the distinction drawn by SIR WILLIAM GRANT is as a whole consistent with the reasoning of LORD GREENE, but, at any rate, that part of it which relates to immediate bequests is in full accord. In the case of gifts for poor relations having perpetual continuance the courts have (rightly or wrongly) uniformly regarded the necessarily fluctuating body of recipients, not as a class standing in a personal relationship to the testator, but as constituting a particular section of poor people, but where the distribution among poor relations is to be completed within the period allowed by the rule against perpetuities, there is no such uniformity, and to regard such recipients, not as beneficiaries under a family trust, but as a particular section of the poor, would, in my judgment, be to defy, not only SIR WILLIAM GRANT, but also the Court of Appeal in Re Compton (2). It has been conceded that, if this should be my decision, one half of the residuary estate, and no more, is effectively devoted to charity, and I so declare.

Order accordingly. Costs to be taxed and paid out of the estate in due course of administration.

Solicitors : Pritchard, Englefield & Co. (for the plaintiffs and the Public Trustee) ; Treasury Solicitor (for the Attorney-General).

[Reported by H. McL. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

HALES v. BOLTON LEATHERS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), December 12, 13, 20, 1949.]

Industrial Injury—Industrial disease—Dermatitis—Attack before July 5, 1948—Recurrence after that date—Workman insured under National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946—Right of workman to workmen's compensation—National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946 (c. 62), s. 89 (1), proviso (a).

By s. 89 (1) of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, workmen's compensation is not payable in respect of any employment on or after the appointed day (July 5, 1948), provided that "(a) the [inter alia, Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925] shall continue to apply to cases . . . where a right to compensation arises or has arisen in respect of employment before the appointed day, except where, in the case of a disease or injury prescribed for the purposes of Part IV of [the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946], the right does not arise before the appointed day and the workman, before it does arise, has been insured under this Act against that disease or injury."

On Nov. 27, 1947 (before the appointed day) a workman was certified to be suffering from dermatitis, a disease coming within the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, and Part IV of the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946. He obtained compensation under the Act of 1925 in respect of total incapacity until Dec. 12, 1947, when he returned to work and remained at work until Aug. 13, 1948 (after the appointed day), from and after which date he was at times totally and at times partially incapacitated. The later attacks were recurrences of the original attack. The workman had been insured under the Act of 1946 against the disease and had obtained the benefits provided by the Act of 1946 in respect of his later incapacity, and he also claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925.

HELD : the right to compensation in respect of the incapacity as from Aug. 13, 1948, arose after the appointed day, and, therefore, in accordance with the exception in proviso (a) to s. 89 (1) (a) of the Act of 1946, the workman was not entitled to workmen's compensation.

[FOR THE NATIONAL INSURANCE (INDUSTRIAL INJURIES) ACT, 1946, s. 89 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 39, p. 400.]

Case referred to :

(1) Eaton v. Wimpey & Co., Ltd., [1937] 4 All E.R. 583 ; [1938] 1 K.B. 353 ; 107 L.J.K.B. 259 ; 158 L.T. 6 ; Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the employers from an award by His Honour JUDGE WALMSLEY, K.C., sitting at Bolton County Court, dated July 15, 1949, of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. The learned judge held that in the case of an industrial disease the right to compensation arose once for all as soon as the workman was certified to be suffering therefrom, so that in the present case the right had arisen before the appointed day and was not excluded by the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946. The Court of Appeal reversed the decision of the learned judge, allowed the appeal, and ordered the matter to be remitted to the county court to enter an award for the employers.

Beney, K.C., and R. Lambert for the employers.

Melford Stevenson, K.C., and C. M. W. Elliott for the workman.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20. SOMERVELL, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This case concerns the transition from the statutory scheme for dealing with industrial accidents or disease embodied in the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1925 to 1945, to the scheme which has taken its place and is to be found in the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946. The latter Act came into force on the appointed day which was July 5, 1948.

In the present proceedings the workman claims compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts in respect of total incapacity from dermatitis from Aug. 13, 1948, to Dec. 8, 1948, partial from that date to Dec. 30, 1948, and from that date total to Mar. 15, 1949, and partial thereafter. These dates, as will be seen, are after the appointed day. On Nov. 27, 1947, before the appointed day, the workman, while in the employ of the present employers, was certified under s. 43 (1) (i) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, to be suffering from dermatitis produced by dust or liquids, a disease coming within sched. III to the Act, as amended by the Workmen's Compensation (Industrial Diseases) Consolidation Order, 1929 (S.R. & O., 1929, No. 2), art. 1, and to be thereby disabled as from Nov. 26 from earning full wages at the work at which he had been employed. He was under total incapacity until Dec. 12, 1947, on which date he returned to his old work, being the employment to the nature of which the disease was due. He remained at that work until the outbreaks of dermatitis which are the subject of the present claim. A doctor gave evidence, which was accepted, that there was a direct connection between all the attacks starting with that in 1947. The latter attacks were recurrences of the original attack, the workman never having been cured, but having again been exposed to the same irritants.

It is agreed that, if the Act of 1946 is applicable, the dermatitis from which the workman suffered is a disease covered by that Act and the regulations thereunder. That Act applies, subject to any special provisions, to persons employed in insurable employment after the appointed day. The workman was so employed. The workman applied for and obtained the benefits as provided for by that Act in respect of the periods covered by the present claim on the basis that that Act was applicable in respect of his incapacity during those periods. The question is whether by the Act of 1946 the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Acts are continued so as to give a right to compensation under those Acts in respect of the periods for which the claim is brought. The learned county court judge decided in favour of the workman and from that decision the employers appeal.

The construction of the provisions of the Act of 1946 on which this appeal has to be decided depend on the legal position under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, generally, and in particular with regard to industrial diseases. The general position is familiar, but it is necessary to summarise it. Section 1 of the Act of 1925 provides :

"(1) If in any employment personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation . . ."

The employer is obviously the employer at the time of the accident. There is a proviso to s. 1 (1) that the employer shall not be liable in respect of an injury which does not disable the workman for a period of at least three days. We are not concerned with cases where the accident results in death. Section 9 (1) lays down in other cases that the compensation is payable where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury. The compensation is to be a weekly payment during the incapacity calculated in accordance with certain rules. We have to construe later the words in s. 89 (1) (a) of the Act of 1946 "a right to compensation arises or has arisen in respect of employment." It seems to us fairly plain that a right to compensation arises if and when the workman can establish total or partial incapacity resulting from the injury by accident. There may be an interval between the accident and the incapacity. There may be a temporary recovery and then further incapacity resulting from the injury. All these will arise "in respect of the employment" at the time of

A the injury by accident. Section 43 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, applies the Act to certain industrial diseases, including that in question here, when the disease is due to the nature of the workman's employment. Industrial diseases result normally, perhaps always, from exposure over a period of time to certain conditions. They do not, like accidents, result from a definite event at a definite time. A man has been working at, what we will call for brevity, a disease-producing employment with A. for six months, with B. for six months, with C. for six months, and then with D. After three months with D. the disease develops so as to disable the workman. In such a case s. 43 (1) provides that the disease, when certified, is to be regarded as a personal injury by accident. The last employer in the disease-producing employment—in the case put, D.—is liable, but, by sub-s. (1) (c) (iii), if the disease is of such a nature as to be contracted by a gradual process, other employers who have employed the workman in the disease-producing employment within the previous twelve months can be called on to contribute. In the case put, C. and B. could be called on, but not A.

B
C
D
E
F
G
H The evidence in this case and in other reported cases shows that where a man has once had an industrial disease it is liable to recur if he continues in the disease-producing employment. This was recognised by s. 43 (1) (b) which deprives a workman of his compensation if he wilfully and falsely represents in writing at the time of entering a new disease-producing employment that he has not previously suffered from the disease. Apart from this provision, s. 43, as we read it, draws no distinction between an original attack and a recurrence provided that at the time of the recurrence or within the previous twelve months the workman has been employed in the disease-producing employment and the recurrence is due to that employment. In such a case the last employer is liable on the basis stated above. It is irrelevant that the man is more susceptible because he has had an attack of the disease before. This is clearly brought out, we think, in Eaton v. Wimpey & Co., Ltd. (1). In that case the workman suffered from dermatitis and received compensation from the employer from 1933 till June, 1935, when he compounded all claims against his then employer for a lump sum. He left that employer, and in May, 1936, became employed by the respondents in the case. In that employment he had to handle dry cement which led to a recurrence in July, 1936, of dermatitis. The county court judge found that, by reason of the attacks of dermatitis in 1933 to 1935, the workman had become susceptible to the disease and had not completely recovered from those attacks. The respondents contended that the attack of the disease in 1936 was merely a recurrence of the original "accident" in 1933. This court held that the respondents were, within the meaning of s. 43 (1) (c), the employers who last employed the workman during the twelve months before July, 1936, in the employment to the nature of which the disease was due, and that they were liable. This case shows that a recurrence of an industrial disease, due in part to the original attack and in part to the continued employment in the relevant process, gives a right to compensation against the second employer, the susceptibility arising from the original attack being irrelevant, although, if the employer at that time had employed the man within the twelve months, whether the man had had an attack or not, he could have been called on to contribute. This, as will appear, is important in considering the learned county court judge's reasons for his decision in the present case.

H We will now turn to the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946. Section 1 (1) deals with accidents in the ordinary sense and insures all persons employed in insurable employment

"... in manner provided by this Act against personal injury caused on or after the appointed day by accident arising out of and in the course of such employment."

This seems clear. One would expect to find that, if the accident occurred before the appointed day, the workman, having no rights under this Act, would have his rights under the Workmen's Compensation Acts preserved in respect of incapacities continuing or arising after the appointed day, and that those suffering accidents after the appointed day would be entitled to benefits under the new scheme but not under the old. Part IV of the Act of 1946 extends by s. 55 (1), the insurance, inter alia, to prescribed diseases of which dermatitis is one, being a disease due to the nature of the insurable employment and "developed on or after the appointed day." Bearing in mind the manner in which s. 43 of the Act of 1925 dealt with industrial diseases and the decision in Eaton's case (1), we would have said that the present workman's dermatitis in August, 1948, developed after the appointed day. The repeals and transitional provisions are contained in s. 89 of the Act of 1946, and it is on the construction of that section that this appeal depends. Section 89 (1) says :

"Workmen's compensation shall not be payable in respect of any employment on or after the appointed day, and accordingly the enactments set out in sched. IX to this Act are hereby repealed as from that day to the extent mentioned in the third column of that schedule : provided that— (a) the said enactments shall continue to apply to cases to which they would have applied if this Act had not been passed, being cases where a right to compensation arises or has arisen in respect of employment before the appointed day, except where, in the case of a disease or injury prescribed for the purposes of Part IV of this Act, the right does not arise before the appointed day and the workman, before it does arise, has been insured under this Act against that disease or injury . . ."

The opening words refer back to the opening words of s. 1 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, which I have cited. If in any employment "on or after the appointed day" there is personal injury by accident, no claim under the Workmen's Compensation Acts arises, and the case falls under the Act of 1946. The enactments set out in sched. IX include the whole of the Act of 1925. The legislation obviously could not stop there. It must make provision for dealing with the effects continuing after the appointed day resulting from injury by accidents in any employment before the appointed day. If incapacity existed on the appointed day the employer must have a right to maintain that it had later ceased and the workman to maintain in respect of accidents before the appointed day that incapacity had arisen or increased after that day. At least, so one would anticipate. The enactments, including the Act of 1925, are, under the opening words of the proviso, to continue to apply to cases "where a right to compensation arises or has arisen in respect of employment before the appointed day."

We will take a case, put by BUCKNILL, L.J., in the course of the argument, of a groom kicked by a horse before the appointed day. The groom is not "disabled" at the time and is able to carry on with his work. After the appointed day injury develops and he has to go to hospital. His right to compensation, as it seems to us, "arises" at the time of his disability or incapacity. The Act of 1925 gives compensation, not for pain and suffering, but for total or partial incapacity, but in the case put, this right, though arising after the appointed day, is in respect of employment before the appointed day, and the proviso to s. 89 (1) preserves his rights under the Workmen's Compensation Acts. The case where incapacity is continuing at the appointed day is plainly covered. There is also, as it seems to us, no difficulty about the case where there has been a temporary recovery at the appointed day, but later incapacity, the result of the pre-appointed day injury, re-develops. This re-development gives a right to compensation which "arises" after the appointed day, but it is in respect of employment before the appointed day. If this is right, then the words "the right to compensation" are given what seem to us their natural construction, and, so far as ordinary accidents are concerned, the provisions clearly mean what one would expect them to. The following words show that this provision is not to apply completely, at any rate, to the case of industrial diseases. The words themselves seem to us to confirm the construction which we have placed on the earlier words. If it is necessary in the case of a disease to exclude from the continuance of the Workmen's Compensation Acts cases where the right does not arise before the appointed day, this implies that in the case of ordinary accidents the Acts may continue and apply where the right does not arise before, that is, arises after the appointed day, but in respect of employment before it, as in the first and third cases we have considered above.

In the present case, in our opinion, the right to compensation in respect of the incapacity as from August, 1948, arose after the appointed day. The Workmen's Compensation Acts do not, therefore, apply if the workman has been insured under the Act of 1946 against that disease. It is agreed that this condition is fulfilled. The learned county court judge held that in the case of an industrial disease the right to compensation arises once for all as soon as the workman is certified to be suffering from a disease mentioned in sched. III to the Act of 1925 and to be thereby disabled. In the present case he held this was on Nov. 27, 1947. This may well be right if thereafter the workman is never employed in what we have called the disease-producing work. What we have said above with regard to s. 43 and to Eaton's case (1) seems to us to show that this is not the position if there is subsequent employment in the work which leads to the disease and there is a recurrence. The learned county court judge was referred, as we were, to various paragraphs in the regulations made under the Act. He took the view that these regulations could not affect the construction of the Act. The regulation-making power is conferred by s. 89 (1) (b), and is as follows :

"regulations may make such transitional or consequential provisions as appear to the Minister to be necessary or expedient, having regard to the repeal of the said enactments in relation to diseases and to injuries not caused by accident, including provision for modifying or winding-up any scheme made thereunder."

We agree that these regulations could not contradict the Act. They might, we think, properly be referred to as working out in detail the provisions of the Act consistently with their terms. So far as they are relevant to the present issue, they seem to us to set out in greater particularity the effect which, so far as the present case is concerned, follows from the words of s. 89 (1) (a). The only provision of the old scheme which is disregarded in the transitional provisions is the spread of liability over the twelve months. We can illustrate what we mean by the case of a man who developed an industrial disease for the first time three months after the appointed day, having been employed in the disease-producing work for the previous twelve months up to the appointed day by A. and thereafter by B. He would clearly be entitled to the benefits under the Act of 1946, and would have no claim under the Workmen's Compensation Acts. A., who could have been called on to contribute under s. 43, is free of all liability. The general basis of the two schemes is so different that one can well understand not further complicating the change over. We think the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted to county court.

Solicitors : Gregory, Rowcliffe & Co., agents for John Taylor & Co., Manchester (for the employers) ; Corbin, Greener & Cook, agents for Morrish & Co., Leeds (for the workman).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

SURREY COUNTY VALUATION COMMITTEE v.
CHESSINGTON ZOO, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Cassels, J.J.).
December 13, 14, 15, 21, 1949.]

Rates—Assessment—Zoological gardens—Valuation on profits basis—Exceptional hereditament—Factors to be considered—Receipts from employment of tenant's capital—Gains from hiring out animals—Profits tax. A

The zoological garden of the ratepayers included a mansion with a park, brick and timber buildings suitable for a circus, cages for animals, an amusement park, and licensed and unlicensed refreshment rooms. It was favourably situated near London and well served by railway and omnibus services, and there was no comparable zoological garden in the south of England. On appeal to quarter sessions the appeals committee valued the hereditament by estimating from the ratepayers' trading profit in 1947 the profits for the five following years and deducting therefrom sums for directors' emoluments, audit fees, sale of produce, and depreciation. The resulting figure of £24,557, the net trading receipts before deduction of rates, was then divided into the tenant's share (£12,278, or half) and an equal amount further divided between the landlord and the rating authority, giving after deduction of rates, a gross valuation of £7,230 and a rateable value of £6,507. B C

HELD : (CASSELS, J., dissentiente and HILBERY, J., dubitante) (i) the hypothetical tenant must be regarded as taking the hereditament equipped for a zoological garden and amusement park ready for use in his business, and it should not be valued by ascertaining the rent which the mansion and park would command as a private residence and adding thereto a percentage on the cost of cages and buildings and of laying out the premises and something for the favourable transport facilities. D

(ii) the premises, being an exceptional hereditament never likely to be let and not capable of being valued by comparison with other similar properties, quarter sessions, if satisfied that there was no other way of arriving at a hypothetical rental value, were entitled to value the premises by reference to the trading profit. E

(iii) the valuation made was not wrong merely because quarter sessions had taken into account the earnings of tenant's capital and receipts from letting animals to owners of smaller shows touring the country or because liability to profits tax was disregarded. F

Per CASSELS, J. Where the profits basis has to be considered as an element in assessment for rating, what items are to be included in a calculation made for the purpose of ascertaining the rent which a prospective tenant would be prepared to pay for the exclusive right to attempt to earn the same profit on the hereditament? I think these profits should be considered at their lowest, that nothing should be included which could reasonably be excluded both in receipts and expenditure, that due allowance should be made for the change of personality in control, for the speculative character of the business, for the risks dependent on times and weather if the undertaking is affected thereby, and for the fluctuating costs and difficulties of labour and material. I would send the case back to the appeals committee with instructions to give further consideration to the items I have mentioned and to leave out of their calculation of profits those profits relating to the letting out of animals. As I am in a minority, the result is that both appeals are dismissed. G H

[AS TO VALUATION OF SPECIAL CLASSES OF PROPERTY generally, see HALSBURY, Vol. 27, pp. 396-434, paras. 829-870 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 38, pp. 534-567, Nos. 796-1055, and Digest Supp.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Mersey Docks v. Liverpool Overseers, (1873), L.R. 9 Q.B. 84 ; 43 L.J.M.C. 33 ; 29 L.T. 454 ; 38 J.P. 21 ; 38 Digest 563, 1016.
- (2) Kingston Union v. Metropolitan Water Board, [1926] A.C. 331 ; 95 L.J.K.B. 605 ; 134 L.T. 483 ; 90 J.P. 69 ; 38 Digest 547, 901.
- (3) R. v. Verrall, (1875), 1 Q.B.D. 9 ; 45 L.J.M.C. 29 ; sub nom., Verrall v. Croydon Union, 33 L.T. 379 ; sub nom., Croydon Union v. Verrall, 40 J.P. 550 ; 38 Digest 526, 732.
- (4) Clark v. Fisherton-Angar, (1880), 6 Q.B.D. 139 ; sub nom., Clark v. Alderbury Union Assessment Committee, 50 L.J.M.C. 33 ; 45 J.P. 358 ; 38 Digest 608, 1344.
- (5) Dodds v. South Shields Poor Law Union Assessment Committee, [1895] 2 Q.B. 133 ; 64 L.J.Q.B. 508 ; 72 L.T. 645 ; 59 J.P. 452 ; 38 Digest 565, 1041.
- (6) Cartwright v. Sculcoates Union, [1900] A.C. 150 ; 69 L.J.Q.B. 403 ; 82 L.T. 157 ; 64 J.P. 229 ; 38 Digest 564, 1025.
- (7) Racecourse Betting Control Board v. Brighton Corporation, [1941] 2 All E.R. 595 ; [1941] 2 K.B. 287 ; 111 L.J.K.B. 9 ; 165 L.T. 230 ; 105 J.P. 365 ; affmd., [1942] 1 All E.R. 611 ; [1942] 2 K.B. 90 ; 111 L.J.K.B. 542 ; 167 L.T. 250 ; 106 J.P. 177 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (8) Edinburgh Street Tramways Co. v. Edinburgh Corpn., [1894] A.C. 456 ; 63 L.J.Q.B. 769 ; 71 L.T. 301 ; 43 Digest 354, 113.
- (9) Yeovil Rural District Council v. South Somerset and District Electricity Co., Ltd., [1947] 1 All E.R. 669 ; [1948] 1 K.B. 130 ; [1948] L.J.R. 746 ; 177 L.T. 319 ; 111 J.P. 287 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (10) Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Lucas, (1881), 51 L.J.Q.B. 114 ; 46 J.P. 388 ; 1 Tax Cas. 385 ; on appeal, (1883), 8 App. Cas. 891 ; 53 L.J.Q.B. 4 ; 49 L.T. 781 ; 48 J.P. 212 ; 2 Tax Cas. 25 ; 42 Digest 691, 1058.
- (11) Re Spanish Prospecting Co., Ltd., [1911] 1 Ch. 92 ; 80 L.J.Ch. 210 ; 103 L.T. 609 ; 36 Digest 447, 1127.

CASE STATED by the Rating Appeals Committee of Surrey Quarter Sessions.

The ratepayers, Chessington Zoo, Ltd., were the occupiers of a hereditament included in the valuation list for the borough of Surbiton and described as zoological gardens, restaurant, offices, stores, lodges, car park, buildings, land and premises. Until June 14, 1948, it was assessed at £800 gross value and £663 rateable value. On Feb. 10, 1948, proposals were made by the rating authority to increase the assessment to £3,000 gross value and £2,497 rateable value, and, on Mar. 24, 1948, by the Surrey County Valuation Committee to increase it to £8,889 gross value and £8,000 rateable value. The proposals were heard on June 14, 1948, by the Surrey (North Eastern Area) Assessment Committee who increased the assessment to £3,170 gross value and £2,853 rateable value. The Surrey County Valuation Committee appealed against the decision to Surrey Quarter Sessions, who heard the appeal on Nov. 22 and 23 and Dec. 13, 1948, and Jan. 10, 1949, and increased the assessment to £7,230 gross value and £6,507 rateable value. Both the Surrey County Valuation Committee (whose appeal during the hearing before the Divisional Court was not pursued and was finally treated as withdrawn) and the ratepayers applied for a Case to be stated for the opinion of the High Court.

The valuation committee had valued the hereditament on a form of the profits basis. They contended that it was proper and necessary to consider the probable profit-earning potentiality of the hereditament; that the ratepayers' filed report, profit and loss account, and balance sheet for the year ending in 1947 (from estimates based on which the committee's valuation had been made) would have been considered by a prospective tenant; that by reason of the time necessarily involved in building and equipping a similar hereditament elsewhere owing to shortages and restrictions the hereditament enjoyed a monopoly or quasi-monopoly ; that quarter sessions were not precluded in law from considering the profits ; and that any estimate of rental value not reflecting profit-earning capacity would be erroneous. The ratepayers contended that the hereditament was not a monopoly or quasi-monopoly and had no capacity of making a profit not personal to the tenant ; that it was illegal to base an assessment on the trading profits attributable to the skill and ability of the tenant and to the use of his assets ; that the same profits could be earned on other hereditaments subject to the expenditure of money on their acquisition and adaptation ; that the rental value should not as a matter of law be ascertained by reference to the profits ; that no tenant would pay a greater rent than a normal rate of interest on the capital value of the hereditament ; and that, if the profits basis were applied, a tenant's share should be properly calculated, repairs should be treated as a deductible expense, and revenue earned outside the hereditament should be excluded from the profits. Quarter sessions found that the hereditament enjoyed a quasi-monopoly and that a prospective tenant would have had regard to the profits which he could earn, but that the valuation committee's estimates of profits were too optimistic. They held that the contractor's basis was not appropriate because it took no account of the exceptionally attractive situation of the hereditament in relation to omnibus and railway services. The Divisional Court (CASSELS, J., dissenting) now dismissed the ratepayers' appeal against that decision. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Lamb, K.C., and Widgery for the ratepayers.

Geoffrey Lawrence for the county valuation committee.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21. The following judgments were read.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case stated by the rating appeals committee for the quarter sessions for the county of Surrey who, in January, 1949, on appeal by the Surrey County Valuation Committee, fixed the gross and rateable values of a hereditament in the occupation of the ratepayers at £7,230 and £6,507 respectively. The hereditament in question is known as the Chessington Zoo. I need not describe the premises in detail as the facts relating thereto are fully set out in the Case. Suffice it to say that it includes a mansion and a good many other brick and timber buildings suitable for a circus, cages for animals, an amusement park containing various attractions commonly found in such places, and licensed and unlicensed refreshment rooms. It is said to be situated in a peculiarly favourable situation for such a place. Not only is it near London, but also it is served by a railway station almost at the entrance to the park and by a line of omnibuses. In fact, there is no place comparable to this hereditament anywhere near London nor in the south of England. Its popularity seems to have increased enormously since the war, and the year 1947 was the peak year so far as earnings were concerned.

The questions which are put to the court in the Case are : (i) Whether the appeals committee were wrong in law in deciding to apply the profits basis in order to arrive at the value of the said hereditament. (ii) If they were justified in so doing, whether they erred in point of law in their application of the " profits basis " to the facts of this Case. It is well known, and has often been pointed out in rating cases, that in rating hereditaments of an exceptional character, by which I mean those that are neither houses, shops, nor factories in an industrial area, rating surveyors have, ever since the Parochial Assessments Act, 1836, had to find various formulae and methods to enable them to answer the questions to which the Rating Acts require an answer. They have to find a rent for premises which are not let at a rent and probably never would be let at a rent, and in some cases, such as public utility undertakings, could never be let at a rent. To take one familiar instance, railways were hardly known at the time the Parochial Assessments Act, 1836, was passed, but as the country became covered with a network of railways it became necessary to find some method by which the requirements of the Acts could be met. So, too, with the case of large public utility undertakings such as gas and water works, and, later, electricity power stations. Various formulae and devices were adopted, many of which have passed into common use and have received the approval of the courts. Two of the best known are what are called the contractor's basis and the profits basis, but, whatever method is applied and whatever formula is adopted, the aim and object must always be the same—to find a notional rent which a tenant would be likely to pay if there could be a letting. How that is to be ascertained must depend largely on the nature of the hereditament which is to be the subject of the assessment. One principle that has been laid down, and from which no departure is allowed, is that profits must not be rated as profits. The leading authority on that subject is the judgment of BLACKBURN, J., in Mersey Docks v. Liverpool Overseers (1), so often cited and so well known that I need not quote passages from it. If one has a terrace of houses or a street of shops all more or less the same size, whether they are let at a rack rent or not, there is no difficulty as a rule in ascertaining what a tenant would pay by way of rent. The fact that one shopkeeper may be making a large profit while his next door neighbour may be making a small one or even running at a loss is immaterial in assessing the rent which a tenant could reasonably be expected to pay for the premises in question. The matter becomes much more difficult when one has to consider the case of a property such as this. There is nothing with which to compare it, but it is, no doubt, being run as a commercial proposition. The question which has to be answered is : If there were a landlord and a tenant, what would the landlord be likely to demand and the tenant to pay ?

In a case where the property is owned and occupied by the same person, it seems to me that there must be considered not only the case of a hypothetical tenant but also that of a hypothetical landlord. The one has premises to let and the other desires to take them to carry on a particular business. We must, I think, approach this case on the hypothesis that a landlord has premises to let which are not only appropriate for, but are fitted up as, a zoological garden and amusement park. The tenant at the present time is to be regarded as taking a place where he can carry on his business, fitted as it is with cages suitable for wild animals, with other things such as bathing pools, restaurants, and so forth, already provided and ready for use. For such a place it seems to me that no assistance whatever can be got by ascertaining what a tenant would be likely to pay as rent for a country mansion with park attached which he intended to use as a private residence or even as a school or other institution. Nor does it seem to me right to say : " Well, start by finding out the figure which would be paid as rent where the premises are used for domestic, even if institutional, purposes and then consider how much it would cost to erect the cages, restaurants, and other buildings, and to lay out the place, and charge so much on the tenant's capital, and then take those figures and add something for the peculiarly favourable transport facilities to which I have referred." I think we ought to look at the position as though a landowner had a place to offer equipped for a zoo and amusement park which a person desirous of carrying on that class of business desired to take.

The appeals committee have told us that they arrived at their figures on the profits basis and the ratepayers have strongly contended that, if that is so, their decision must be wrong because the profits basis has never been applied to a commercial, but only to a public utility, undertaking. This, in my opinion, depends very largely on what the appeals committee meant by saying they proceeded on the profits basis. The profits basis as applied to public utility undertakings is best described in the speech of LORD CAVE in Kingston Union v. Metropolitan Water Board (2). Since that case, it is regarded as settled law that public utility undertakings are always to be rated on the basis which is to be found stated in that case. It is quite clear that the appeals committee did not purport to apply the formula usually known as the profits basis, and described in the case to which I have referred, to this hereditament. They started by taking the trading profits. If they had applied the profits basis applicable to public utility undertakings, they would have had to start by taking the gross receipts. It would, I think, have been more accurate if the appeals committee had said that they had applied a profits basis. The profits basis, as it is generally understood, is that to which I have just referred. That they have had regard to the trading profits as the main basis of their assessment is beyond question and nobody disputes it, and they attach to their Case a document, which sets out concisely the way at which they arrived at their figures. They started with the actual trading profit which was made taken from the company's published profit and loss account for the year 1947. For the five succeeding years they have estimated the profits on a descending, and, indeed, sharply descending, scale. Those figures were, we were told, in fact taken from the ratepayers' evidence in the sense that they stated that they expected the profits would be reduced in succeeding years by the percentages as shown. It seems to be agreed that amusement caterers and entrepreneurs regarded 1947 as the peak year for profits and anticipated a fairly sharp diminution, and in a descending scale, for the years following that one. Considering the trading profit, for the years 1947 to 1952 inclusive, they estimated them at £170,961, giving an average of £28,493. From that trading profit they have made deductions for directors' emoluments, audit fee, sale of produce, and depreciation, all of which are, of course, matters of estimate. Having arrived at £24,557, which is the sum of the net trading receipts before deduction of rates, they have divided that balance as to £12,278 tenant's share and an equal amount between the landlord and the rating authority, and, if the rates are deducted from that, it leaves £7,230 gross and £6,507 rateable, which are the figures fixed by the appeals committee.

The ratepayers attack this method in toto. They submit that that is rating profits pure and simple, and, therefore, in direct disregard of the principles laid down in Mersey Docks v. Liverpool Overseers (1) and since then consistently followed. On the other hand, the appeals committee profess to have adopted this plan as the only method open to them which would enable them to fix a rent. The ratepayers do not contend that it is not open to the committee to take into account profits as one element, but they say that it is inadmissible to rely on profits as the only evidence. I do not propose to refer to all the cases which were cited before us, but I will to some of them. It is, I think, clear that, while in what have been called ordinary cases questions as to gross receipts or net receipts or profits cannot be investigated, there are cases which have been regarded by courts as exceptional, and there the rating authority can have regard to the profits that have been made, and, indeed, as it seems to me, in many cases, can have no other basis for fixing the rent. In R. v. Verrall (3), where the hereditament was the Epsom racecourse, the court held that books of the ratepayers were clearly elements for the consideration of the justices in arriving at the value, and in Clark v. Fisherton-Angar (4) the court allowed an enquiry into the receipts of the tenant of a railway refreshment room as being the best method of ascertaining what rent he would be willing to pay. On the other hand, in Dodds v. South Shields Poor Law Union Assessment Committee (5), the appeal was against the valuation of a public house, and there were many other public houses in the town which could be compared with the one in question. The court refused to admit evidence in that case of the average weekly takings on the grounds that there was nothing exceptional in the case of a public house and the ordinary methods of valuation should be adopted. It seems to me clear in that case that the Court of Appeal recognised that, if there was a hereditament which could be classed as exceptional in the sense that there was nothing with which the hereditament in question could be compared, the evidence would be admissible. In Cartwright v. Scolcoates Union (6) the House of Lords held that, in assessing the value of a public house, the existence of the licence and the amount of trade were elements to be considered in order to arrive at the rent and that evidence of these facts was always admissible and might be necessary where the ordinary evidence of market value by comparison with other public houses was not to be had. They also held that evidence of profits was admissible though that enquiry should be avoided where possible because it was regarded as oppressive. It is true that LORD DAVEY in that case repudiated the distinction between exceptional and ordinary cases which had been made in Dodds v. South Shields Poor Law Union Assessment Committee (5), but he went on to say ([1900] A.C. 159) :

"You have in each case to find out in the best way you can what is the rent which a tenant may reasonably be expected to give, and if the best way under the particular circumstances is to ascertain the use which a tenant might expect to be able to make of the premises, the facility afforded by the premises for the carrying on of a trade appears to me to be a primary and elementary consideration in the case . . . It is not that you rate the profits, it is not that you rate the man's skill and judgment or discretion in the mode of carrying on the business, but you have to ascertain what sort of a trade the hypothetical tenant, as he is called, may reasonably expect to be able to carry on on those premises as an element in determining the rent he would be willing to offer."

The ratepayers do not contend that profits are not an element, but they say they are only one element. What is to happen if the appeals committee find that it is the only element on which they can rely ? I have already given my reasons for thinking, as the appeals committee obviously did, that the rent that might be paid for Chessington Park if used as a residence or school affords no criterion at all, and that we ought to look on the case as one in which the property is let with all the facilities and amenities for the business there carried on. In this connection, I desire to refer to and express my agreement with the passage in the judgment of WROTTESELEY, J., in Racecourse Betting Control Board v. Brighton Rating Authority (7), where he, a judge of great experience in these cases, said ([1941] 2 All E.R. 600) :

"What happens in the market is the best evidence of the value of the commodities dealt with in the market, and, where the best evidence is at hand, the courts of law refuse to admit any other. However, at any rate in the case of premises used for making profits, 'It is a mistake to suppose that valuation by rental is dissociated from the idea of profit,' to use the language of LORD WATSON in Edinburgh Street Tramways Co. v. Edinburgh Corpn. (8) ([1894] A.C. 475). In the case of premises used only for the purpose of making a profit, such as the premises in this case, and not capable of being valued by comparison with other similar premises, the proposed tenant and the landlord would alike be thrown back on the question of the amount of possible profits to flow from the occupation."

If, then, there is such a property, as I think there is here, and if the appeals committee are satisfied that there is no other way by which they can arrive at a rent than by looking at the trading profits—to ascertain, that is, what the value of the use is to the tenant—I cannot see that they can be said to have applied a wrong principle. They obviously have clearly in mind that their duty is to arrive at a rent, and they have done so in this case by estimating the net profit and then apportioning it between the tenant, the landlord, and the rating authority. Assuming they were entitled to proceed on this basis, it is not, I think, for this court to alter their figures or express disapproval of the assessment of those shares, for that, after all is a question of fact. In my opinion, therefore, the appeals committee were entitled to proceed on the basis that they did.

It is now said that, at any rate, their figures must be wrong in some respects. In the first place, it is said that they must have taken into account the tenant's capital which they had no right to do. It may be that, in arriving at the trading profits, it is inevitable that the tenant's capital enters into the calculations as do landlord's fixtures, but the basis of the assessment, and, as I think, the only basis the appeals committee could find is by taking the profits made on the hereditament as a whole, and, if I am right in what I have said earlier that this must be looked at as though a hypothetical landlord was letting these premises with all these erections on it, I do not think that the appeals committee have there applied a wrong principle. Another point which was strongly urged on us by counsel for the ratepayers was that the method adopted has had the inevitable result of taking into account the profits earned off the hereditament in question. That arises because it seems to have been the practice of the ratepayers to let out from time to time some of the animals and other things, such as would be used by circus proprietors, to the owners of smaller shows touring throughout the country. It seems to me that the answer to that is that that is just one of the things, or rather one of the opportunities of making a profit, which a tenant would take into account because these premises give peculiar facilities. To enable them to earn the profit they must have a place, not merely for storage, but also where they can keep their wild beasts and so forth which from time to time they may let to another circus proprietor to show, but, when one is considering a matter of this sort, it seems to me to make no difference whether a certain sum is earned by letting people look at the animals in their cages at Chessington or in a cage outside the actual hereditament. It is all part of the trading profit which these premises give the opportunity to the ratepayers to earn. Other questions were raised with regard to whether or not the profits tax was taken into account. I think it is clear, and, indeed, it was not disputed, that questions with regard to the profits tax were raised before the appeals committee. As I have said, if they have applied the right principle, I do not think it is open to the court to examine meticulously every figure if they have had fully before them all the considerations which ought to enter into their calculations and to which they ought to pay regard. The case is, no doubt, one of considerable importance, and it is satisfactory to know that our judgment is open to review elsewhere. For myself, I answer both the questions submitted in the negative, and would, accordingly, dismiss the appeal.

HILBERY, J. : I have finally, but reluctantly and not without some hesitation, come to the same conclusion as my Lord, and for the same reasons. I would only add that, in my opinion, it is not possible to say as a matter of law that the appeals committee were wrong in not taking into consideration the profits tax as reducing the trading profits which a hypothetical tenant might regard the premises as capable of producing. Profits tax is quite different from the excess profits tax. The latter tax took away from the trader occupying the premises the whole of his profits which were in excess of certain standard profits. That excess could not be of any beneficial value to the tenant. Furthermore, its amount depended on a standard figure particular to the person liable to pay it. The profits tax is a tax levied on profits generally and is not confined to a part of the profits in excess of a standard figure. For the purposes of this case, therefore, I am of opinion that the appeals committee were entitled to disregard profits tax for the same reasons that income tax, which a prospective or hypothetical tenant will have to pay out of profits made out of an occupation of the premises in question, has to be disregarded.

CASSELS, J. : With diffidence I find myself unable to agree with the conclusions at which my Lords have arrived. Proposals for the assessment of this hereditament for the purpose of rating show a steep vertical rise which is remarkable. Chessington Zoo was established eighteen years ago. Its founder died at the end of 1946, nine months after the formation of the private company of that name which is now before the court and a party to these proceedings. During all that time, and, indeed, until June, 1948, the hereditament was never assessed at more than £800 gross value and £663 rateable value. On Feb. 10, 1948, Surbiton Rating Authority proposed by reason of additions and alterations, and, so far as I know, with no reference to the profits basis, to increase the gross value to £3,000 and the rateable value to £2,497. Surrey County Valuation Committee and the ratepayers both objected, the former proposing increases of the gross value to £8,889 and of the rateable value to £8,000. This proposal went before the assessment committee of the North Eastern Area of Surrey who increased the gross value to £3,170 and the rateable value to £2,853. These figures do not indicate that the profits basis prevailed. Surrey County Valuation Committee appealed to Surrey Quarter Sessions Appeals Committee who allowed the appeal and fixed the gross value at £7,230 and the rateable value at £6,507. Between June, 1948, and January, 1949, the gross value has gone from £800 to £3,000, £3,170 and £7,230, and the rateable value from £663 to £2,497, £2,853 and £6,507. With rates at 15s. 6d. in the £ these final figures are startling.

It may be some consolation to the ratepayers to know that this court does not propose further to increase the assessment. Surrey County Valuation Committee by their notice of appeal wanted to restore their figure of £8,889, but they did not press it, and this case has been heard on the objection of the ratepayers to the final figure of the appeals committee, namely, gross value of £7,230, which is more than nine times the gross value of £800, and rateable value of £6,507, which is nearly ten times the rateable value of £663 which existed prior to June, 1948. Before quarter sessions the Surrey County Valuation Committee contended for the profits basis, and the appeals committee have allowed that contention to prevail on the ground that the use to which this hereditament is put is unique and in the nature of a monopoly or quasi-monopoly, that in present conditions it cannot move or set itself up elsewhere, and that its rental value must reflect its profit-earning capacity. I have no doubt that profits are an element to be taken into consideration and the ratepayers have not contended otherwise, but, if profits are alone to be considered to the exclusion of all other factors, then it is a strong proposition and may be very oppressive in its results, as, indeed, in my opinion, it turns out to be in this case.

I realise that the profits basis has been applied to public utility undertakings such as electricity (Yeovil Rural District Council v. South Somerset and District Electricity Co., Ltd. (9)); and water (Kingston Union v. Metropolitan Water Board (2)); to a public house (Cartwright v. Sculcoates Union (6)), although the contrary view was held in Dodds v. South Shields Poor Law Union Assessment Committee (5); and to a totalisator (Racecourse Betting Control Board v. Brighton Corpn. (7)), where the courts found adequate reasons for applying the profits basis. Until it is unlawful for trade to make profits all cases in which the profits basis is taken for assessment for local rates should be examined with some care lest injustice, hardship, and great inequality should result. If rating authorities, whoever they may be, propose to rate according to a calculation based on trading profits, and thus enable the rate collector to get his clutching hands into the till, so to speak, it may be that one day they will have to take into consideration, not the profits of the business but the losses, and, although there may still remain a beneficial occupation to be rated, the local community, having enjoyed the advantage of the success of the venture, will be called on to share the disadvantages of the failure. A ratepayer in occupation of refreshment rooms at a railway station has been held to be entitled to bring forward his account books to show a loss in order to obtain a reduction of his rate: see Clark v. Fisherton-Angar (4).

Suppose, for example, that on land adjacent to, and of the same acreage as, this hereditament, there should be buildings of the same size and number as on this hereditament and an industry should be conducted thereon in the production of things which are manufactured in similar factories elsewhere and for which there is a general demand. It is an alarming thought that by reason of this hereditament being a "zoo" and that next door being such a factory the rateable value of this hereditament should be £6,507 and that of its neighbour £2,497. I am taking the figure of the Surbiton Rating Authority. It was said that the use to which this hereditament was put was unique, and that there was no comparable hereditament. Yet there are a few other "zoos" throughout the country and none was cited to this court as being assessed on the profits basis. If this assessment prevails, how long will it be before the same method is applied to them? How many "zoos" have there to be before any one ceases to be exceptional or unique? I realise that it may well be long before Chessington Zoo has a competitor on the opposite side of the road or in the neighbourhood, and that a quasi-monopoly, whatever that may mean, is enjoyed, but it has been created by the genius of one man and that can be said of other industries which are not assessed on the profits basis.

What are profits? Profits may have as many meanings as value, and everything must depend on the purpose for which profits are taken into consideration. There are gross profits as well as net profits. There are actual profits. There is the profit shown in a balance sheet on a profit and loss account. There are profits assessable to income tax, and profits available for dividend and division. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Lucas (10) (51 L.J.Q.B. 116), said

"...profits is the amount got from the property minus the cost of getting it."

Another way in which it has been put is "excess earnings over expenditure." Some interesting observations on the meaning of the word "profits" were made by FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., in Re Spanish Prospecting Co., Ltd. (11) ([1911] 1 Ch. 98). I need not cite the passage at length, but the learned lord justice drew attention to the importance of depreciation in the value of buildings, plant, and stock, and said that though the fundamental meaning was the amount of gain made by the business during the year this strict meaning was rarely observed in drawing up the accounts of firms or companies. These he described as domestic documents.

Where the profits basis has to be considered as an element in assessment for rating, what items are to be included in a calculation made for the purpose of ascertaining the rent which a prospective tenant would be prepared to pay for the exclusive right to attempt to earn the same profit on the hereditament? I think these profits should be considered at their lowest, that nothing should be included which could reasonably be excluded both in receipts and expenditure, that due allowance should be made for the change of personality in control, for the speculative character of the business, for the risks dependent on times and weather if the undertaking is affected thereby, and for the fluctuating costs and difficulties of labour and material. I do not think that the appeals committee gave due and proper consideration to these items. Speaking for myself, I should not have included in the calculation the considerable sums earned by the ratepayers in letting out animals during the course of the year. These animals earned the money away from the hereditament. Further, the prospective tenant, in making his offer to rent the hereditament, might not be considering the continuation of that side-line of activity, or the landlord might not be including it in the tenancy. The figures demonstrate that the profits of the ratepayers are dwindling and will continue to do so. To the enormous increase in rates will be added the burden of the costs of this case, also chargeable against profits. The satisfaction of the county valuation committee in their success may not be long lived. Financially, the "zoo" is going down hill. The valuation committee have chosen these uncertain times to speed it on its way. I would send the case back to the appeals committee with instructions to give further consideration to the items I have mentioned and to leave out of their calculation of profits those profits relating to the letting out of animals.

A As I am in a minority, the result is that both appeals are dismissed.
Appeal dismissed with costs, excluding any costs incurred owing to the cross-appeal. Respondents' appeal treated as withdrawn.

Solicitors : Frere, Cholmeley & Nicholsons (for the appellants) ; Wyatt & Co., Kingston-on-Thames, agents for Dudley Auckland, Kingston-on-Thames (for the respondents).

B [Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Affirmed. C.A. [1950] 2 All E.R. 282.

C R. v. MINISTER OF TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING.
Ex parte C. B. NORTH, LTD. AND OTHERS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Hilbery, JJ.), December 19, 1949.]

D Town and Country Planning—War damage—Compulsory purchase order—Direction by Minister that application for order under Act of 1944 be continued after Act of 1947 came into force—Direction given before Act of 1947 came into force—Validity—Interpretation Act, 1889 (c. 63), s. 37—Town and Country Planning Act, 1944 (c. 47), s. 1 (1)—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), sched. X, para. 16.

E The applicants were owners of land in areas in respect of which the local planning authorities had applied to the Minister of Town and Country Planning for orders under s. 1 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, declaring the land subject to compulsory purchase for dealing with war damage. On Aug. 6, 1947, before proceedings on the applications were complete, the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, was passed, and, by s. 113 (2) and sched. IX, pt. II, it repealed s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1944, as from the "appointed day," July 1, 1948, the date on which sched. X to the Act of 1947 came into operation. Before July 1, 1948, the Minister, in exercise of powers under sched. X, para. 16, of the Act of 1947, directed that the proceedings on the applications should be continued after the appointed day. The applications were proceeded with and orders made after the Act of 1947 came into force. The applicants contended that the Minister had no power to give such a direction since, when the direction was made, sched. X, para. 16, of the Act of 1947 had not come into force, and, therefore, the orders made were bad in law.

G HELD : under s. 37 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, the Minister had power to make the directions under sched. X, para. 16, before the Act of 1947 came into force, and the orders made were valid.

H [FOR THE INTERPRETATION ACT, 1889, s. 37, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 18, p. 1005 ; FOR THE TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING ACT, 1944, s. 1 (1), see ibid., Vol. 37, p. 423 ; FOR THE TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING ACT, 1947, sched. X, para. 16, see ibid., Vol. 40, p. 882.]

MOTIONS for orders in the nature of certiorari, to quash three orders of the Minister of Town and Country Planning made under s. 1 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944. The Divisional Court refused the motions. The facts appear in the headnote.

C. L. Henderson, K.C., and Glidewell for the applicants.

The Attorney-General (Sir Hartley Shawcross, K.C.) and H. L. Parker for the Minister of Town and Country Planning.

Maurice Lyell for Hull Corporation.

P. M. O'Connor for Liverpool Corporation.

A

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : These are applications for orders in the nature of certiorari to bring up certain orders of the Minister of Town and Country Planning to be quashed. If s. 37 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, had been brought to the attention of the court at the time these applications were made it is doubtful whether they would have been granted, because it seems to me that s. 37 is a complete and absolute answer to them.

B

Certain applications had been made to the Minister for orders under s. 1 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, which provided :

"Where the Minister of Town and Country Planning (in this Act referred to as 'the Minister') is satisfied that it is requisite, for the purpose of dealing satisfactorily with extensive war damage in the area of a local planning authority, that a part or parts of their area, consisting of land shown to his satisfaction to have sustained war damage or of such land together with other land contiguous or adjacent thereto, should be laid out afresh and re-developed as a whole, an order declaring all or any of the land in such a part of their area to be land subject to compulsory purchase for dealing with war damage may be made by the Minister if an application in that behalf is made to him . . ."

C

D

There are a great many procedural provisions in the Act, and while the operation of these provisions were pending the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, was passed. By s. 113 (2) and sched. IX, pt. II, of the latter Act, s. 1 of the Act of 1944 was repealed on the coming into force of the Act of 1947, viz., on the "appointed day," July 1, 1948. Section 1 of the Act of 1944 would expire immediately before the Act of 1947 came into force, i.e., at midnight on June 30, 1948, and the Act of 1947 would come into force at that time. There would, however, be a moment of time when the Act of 1944 would cease to have effect and the Act of 1947 had still to take effect.

E

In para. 16 of sched. X to the Act of 1947 it is provided :

"Where, at any time before the appointed day, application has been made to the Minister for an order under s. 1 of the Act of 1944 declaring any land to be subject to compulsory purchase under Part I of that Act, the Minister may, if he thinks fit, direct that proceedings on the application shall be continued under that Act after that day."

F

When s. 1 of the Act of 1944 was repealed, such an application would have fallen with the Act and there would have been nothing to continue. Therefore, it was necessary, to save the vast amount of trouble and expense which would otherwise have been caused, to keep those applications alive during the time between the repeal of the one Act and the coming into force of the other. That is done by applying s. 37 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, which visualised this situation. That Act was passed to clear away doubts as to the effect of certain provisions in various Acts of Parliament, and it set up the procedure to be adopted where an Act was passed which was not to come into operation until a certain day if it was necessary to take certain steps before the Act came into operation. Accordingly, s. 37 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, provides :

G

H

"Where an Act passed after the commencement of this Act is not to come into operation immediately on the passing thereof and confers power to make any appointment, to make, grant, or issue any instrument, that is to say, any Order in Council, order, warrant, scheme, letters patent, rules, regulations, or byelaws, to give notices, to prescribe forms, or to do any other thing for the purposes of the Act, that power may, unless the contrary intention appears, be exercised at any time after the passing of the Act, so far as may be necessary or expedient for the purpose of bringing the Act into operation . . . ”

- A It was necessary to bring the powers contained in sched. X, para. 16, to the Act of 1947 into force before the Act itself came into force. The Act was in a state of what I may call suspended animation until July 1, 1948, but it was necessary that something should be done to keep alive these applications which had been made under the Act of 1944 so that, when the Act did come into operation, the Minister could give a direction that they should be confirmed and come into force. In those circumstances it seems to me that the Minister acted within his powers, and that these applications fail and must be dismissed with costs.

HUMPHREYS, J. : I agree.

HILBERY, J. : I agree.

Application dismissed with costs.

- C Solicitors : Warren, Murton & Co., agents for T. Priestman, Sons & Slack, Hull (for the applicant, C. B. North, Ltd.) ; Warren, Murton & Co., agents for H. A. Dodman, Leeds (for the applicant, Montague Burton, Ltd.) ; Warren, Murton & Co. (for the applicant, Burton and others) ; Treasury Solicitor (for the Minister of Town and Country Planning) ; Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for E. H. Bullock, town clerk, Hull (for Hull Corporation) ; Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for Thomas Alker, town clerk, Liverpool (for Liverpool Corporation).
D [Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Applied. JONAS v. ROSENBERG.
Post p. 296.

HUTCHINSON v. JAUNCEY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), December 16, 19, 20, 1949.]

Statute—Retrospective effect—Pending proceedings—Disturbance of existing rights.

- F Rent Restriction—Separate dwelling-house—Common use of scullery between tenant and sub-tenant—Proceedings for possession commenced by landlord before June 2, 1949—Effect of Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 9 ; s. 10.

On May 25, 1949, the landlord issued a plaint claiming possession of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, applied on the ground that the tenant shared his scullery for cooking purposes with another tenant, and, therefore, by reason of the decision in Neale v. Del Soto ([1945] 1 All E.R. 191), the tenancy was not protected. On June 2, 1949, the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, came into operation altering the law as it was stated in Neale v. Del Soto. The county court judge made an order for possession against the tenant, accepting the contention of the landlord that he had acquired rights pursuant to the law as it stood before the passing of the Act of 1949 and that such rights were unaffected by either the express language of ss. 9 and 10 of the Act or by a necessary implication to be drawn from them. Section 10 of the Act provides: “The three last foregoing sections shall apply whether the letting in question began before or after the commencement of this Act, but not so as to affect rent in respect of any period before the commencement thereof or anything done or omitted during any such period.”

HELD : (i) if the necessary intendment of an Act is to affect pending causes of action then the court will give effect to the intention of the legislature even though there is no express reference to pending actions.

Re Joseph Suche & Co., Ltd. (1875) (1 Ch.D. 48), criticised.

(ii) the effect of ss. 9 and 10 of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, was to make the tenant retrospectively a protected tenant although at the date of the issue of the proceedings he was not entitled to remain in possession of the premises, and, accordingly, the order for possession granted to the landlord must be set aside.

Remon v. City of London Real Property Co. ([1921] 1 K.B. 49), distinguished.

[AS TO THE RETROSPECTIVE EFFECT OF STATUTES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 31, pp. 513-517, paras. 670-672 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 42, pp. 701-707, Nos. 1169-1249.]

AS TO SEPARATE DWELLINGS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 312-316, paras. 368-373 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 31, p. 557. Nos. 7044-7048 and Digest Supp.

FOR THE LANDLORD AND TENANT (RENT CONTROL) ACT, 1949, s. 9, s. 10, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 13, pp. 1106, 1107.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Remon v. City of London Real Property Co., [1921] 1 K.B. 49 ; 89 L.J.K.B. 1105 ; 123 L.T. 617 ; 31 Digest 556, 7032.
- (2) Neale v. Del Soto, [1945] 1 All E.R. 191 ; [1945] K.B. 144 ; 114 L.J.K.B. 138 ; 172 L.T. 65 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Re Joseph Suche & Co., Ltd., (1875), 1 Ch.D. 48 ; 45 L.J.Ch. 12 ; 33 L.T. 774 ; 42 Digest 706, 1236.
- (4) Wright v. Hale, (1860), 6 H. & N. 227 ; 30 L.J.Ex. 40 ; 3 L.T. 444 ; 42 Digest 706, 1231.
- (5) Grimwood v. Moss, (1872), L.R. 7 C.P. 360 ; 41 L.J.C.P. 239 ; 27 L.T. 268 ; 36 J.P. 663 ; 31 Digest 506, 6537.
- (6) Cruise v. Terrell, [1922] 1 K.B. 664 ; 91 L.J.K.B. 499 ; 126 L.T. 750 ; 31 Digest 578, 7268.
- (7) Prout v. Hunter, [1924] 2 K.B. 736 ; 93 L.J.K.B. 993 ; 132 L.T. 193 ; 31 Digest 557, 7040.
- (8) Leslie & Co. v. Cumming, [1926] 2 K.B. 417 ; 95 L.J.K.B. 1007 ; 135 L.T. 443 ; 31 Digest 557, 7041.
- (9) Turner v. Baker, [1949] 1 All E.R. 560 ; [1949] 1 K.B. 605.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE GRANVILLE-SMITH, made at the Edmonton County Court and dated July 22, 1949, for possession on the ground that the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, did not retrospectively apply to premises where proceedings for possession had been commenced before the Act came into operation. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal. The facts and the relevant sections of the Act appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.

Sifer for the tenant.

C. St.J. de V. Shortt for the landlord.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : This appeal raises a point under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, namely, whether the application of the Act to this case is excluded by reason of the circumstance that the plaint by the landlord claiming possession against the tenant was issued before the Act came into force. I think it must be clear that, having regard to Remon v. City of London Real Property Co. (1), if it had not been for the issue of the summons before the Act came into operation, the tenant must have been entitled to claim the benefit of s. 9 of the Act of 1949 notwithstanding the service of an effective notice to quit. The real question here is : What difference does the issue of the plaint make ?

Before Mar. 21, 1949, the tenant was tenant of the whole house 137, Angel Road, Edmonton (which, having regard to its rateable value, is within the scope of the Rent Restrictions Acts), at a rent of 11s. 1d. per week from a person who was not the present landlord. About October, 1945, the tenant sublet two rooms on the first floor together with the use of a scullery in common with himself for cooking purposes at a rent of 7s. per week, the tenant retaining for his own use two rooms on the ground floor. On Mar. 21, 1949, the landlord purchased the premises subject to the tenant's tenancy. On Apr. 11, 1949, a valid notice to quit expiring on Apr. 25, 1949, was given by the landlord to the tenant. On May 25, 1949, proceedings for possession were started by the landlord and on that day a summons for possession was issued. On June 2, 1949, the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, came into force. Had it not been for that Act it has been conceded, that, in view of the fact that the scullery was used in common for cooking purposes, the case would have fallen within the principle of Neale v. Del Soto (2), so that the premises would have been outside the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. One of the obvious purposes of the Act of 1949 was to alter the law as it had been stated in Neale v. Del Soto (2). Section 9 provides :

- C “Where the tenant of any premises, being a house or part of a house, has sublet a part, but not the whole, of the premises, then as against his landlord or any superior landlord (but without prejudice to the rights against and liabilities to each other of the tenant and any person claiming under him, or of any two such persons) no part of the premises shall be treated as not being a dwelling-house to which the [Rent Restrictions Acts] apply by reason only—(a) that the terms on which any person claiming under the tenant holds any part of the premises include the use of accommodation in common with other persons . . .”
- D

Section 10 provides :

- E “The three last foregoing sections shall apply whether the letting in question began before or after the commencement of this Act, but not so as to affect rent in respect of any period before the commencement thereof or anything done or omitted during any such period.”

- F Counsel for the landlord has rightly relied on the well-established principles prima facie applicable to the interpretation of a statute. He has read to us passages from MAXWELL ON THE INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES, 9th ed., and has made numerous citations from authorities. I shall not be thought unappreciative of his argument or disrespectful to the authorities cited if I forbear from reference to all of them, because the principle is not in dispute, and I assume in counsel's favour that the onus of establishing something contrary to the principle lies on those who so assert. It would be an onus which is not lightly to be discharged. So far as the present case is concerned, as I have already indicated, the vital element in it is the fact that proceedings for possession were started on a date, namely, May 25, before the coming into operation of the Act of 1949. It is said that, nevertheless, by the issue of the plaint the landlord has acquired a vested right, a cause of action has accrued, and he should not be deprived by the court of that right unless in plain terms that conclusion flows from the language of the new Act. I quote from MAXWELL
- G
- H ON THE INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES, 9th ed., p. 229 :

“In general, when the law is altered during the pendency of an action, the rights of the parties are decided according to the law as it existed when the action was begun, unless the new statute shows a clear intention to vary such rights.”

Two of the cases seem to indicate that there should be found express reference to causes of action pending. For example, in Re Joseph Suche & Co., Ltd. (3)

SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., sitting at first instance, decided a case on this ground of principle. He stated his conclusion thus (1 Ch. D. 50) :

"I so decide because it is a general rule that when the legislature alters the rights of parties by taking away or conferring any right of action, its enactments, unless in express terms they apply to pending actions, do not affect them."

Something of the same kind, I think, may fairly be said to emerge from the language of WILDE, B., in Wright v. Hale (4). A

Having examined the many cases that the industry of counsel for the landlord has enabled him to lay before us, I doubt whether the principle ought to be expressed in quite so precise language as SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., stated it in Re Joseph Suche & Co., Ltd. (3). It seems to me that, if the necessary intendment of the Act is to affect pending causes of action, the court will give effect to the intention of the legislature even though there is no express reference to pending actions. The question, therefore, is : Since a summons had been issued before the Act came into force, did the landlord acquire rights pursuant to the law as it stood under the decision in Neale v. Del Soto (2), and are those rights unaffected by either the express language or by the necessary implication to be drawn by ss. 9 and 10 of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 ? Apart from Remon v. City of London Real Property Co. (1) I think the point might have been one of serious difficulty, and I do not think that it is an easy one now, but that case seems to me to have laid down the application of a principle to this class of legislation generally, and I think, therefore, that citations from authorities relating to wholly different subject-matters may not be so pertinent to cases of this character. B C D

Remon v. City of London Real Property Co. (1) was a case in which two rooms—not, until the passing of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, covered by the Rent Acts because they were used for business purposes—were, on the coming into force of the Act, in the occupation of a person who was remaining in possession in invitum so far as the landlord was concerned after the expiration of the notice to quit. No proceedings had actually been started when the Act of 1920 came into force. There is no doubt that the Act of 1920 brought premises of that character, namely, business premises, for a short period under what has been called the "umbrella" of the Act. The question raised was whether, since the tenant was still actually there when the Act came into force, he could as against his landlord pray in aid the Act of 1920 and resist the landlord's claim for possession. This court held that he could. At first sight the result appears not to be in accordance with the older principles relating to real property law (illustrated by Grimwood v. Moss (5) ), to the effect that once the necessary step has been taken by the landlord to put an end to the tenancy the person in occupation would cease to be a tenant, but it is, I think, plain from the decision in Remon v. City of London Real Property Co. (1) (and it has been subsequently expressly affirmed by SCRUTTON, L.J., in Cruise v. Terrell (6) ([1922] 1 K.B. 673)) that those principles do not strictly apply in the case of premises which are brought within, and intended to be protected by, this legislation. Thus, BANKES, L.J., said ([1921] 1 K.B. 54) : E F G

"It is however clear that in all the Rent Restrictions Acts the expression 'tenant' has been used in a special, a peculiar sense, and as including a person who might be described as an ex-tenant, some one whose occupation had commenced as tenant and who had continued in occupation without any legal right to do so except possibly such as the Acts themselves conferred upon him. The respondent therefore on the coming into operation of the new Act was a tenant within the meaning of that expression in the Act . . ." H

It is on that principle that the case was decided. In the present case the difference is that a plaintiff had been issued. Is the result that the tenant has ceased to be a tenant within the meaning of this legislation or is otherwise outside the protection which s. 9 of the new Act intends to give him ?

I turn again to s. 9, but, before doing so, I observe that the county court judge in his careful judgment, after stating the facts, proceeds as follows :

"I have no doubt whatever that the relevant contract to be considered is the letting of the two rooms with the use of scullery in 1945."

A I entirely agree with that premise to the argument following in the judgment. In other words, if I look at s. 9 of the Act I read these words :

"Where the tenant of any premises, being a house or part of a house, has sublet a part . . ."

It seems to me that when this matter comes before the court those conditions, B prima facie, are satisfied. The tenant has (in the past) sublet a part, and, following Remon v. City of London Real Property Co. (1), the tenant here is, prima facie, a tenant occupying part of premises within the general scope of the Act. He is an ex-tenant sitting there against the will of his landlord and claiming that the Rent Restrictions Acts protect him. Whether they do or do not might perhaps depend on the exact facts in regard to the scullery and its use, but his position C is that of a person claiming the protection of the Acts. Section 9 goes on :

"... no part of the premises shall be treated as not being a dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply by reason only . . ."

Counsel for the landlord says "shall" is a future word, and, therefore, he relied on the principles already referred to in the passages I have mentioned as establishing that the section is not applicable to some cause of action which has D already crystallised on the issue of the summons before this Act operated at all. If the matter stood there alone, I think there might be force in that argument, but one must go to s. 10, which says that the last foregoing section

"... shall apply whether the letting in question began before or after the commencement of this Act . . ."

E Now what is the letting in question ? Following the decision in Remon v. City of London Real Property Co. (1) the tenant seems to me to be prima facie a tenant, and he was such when the summons was issued. He was a tenant and the contract of letting, as the county court judge said, was that of 1945 pursuant to which he purported to remain in possession. I think it follows, therefore, that s. 9 is made in the clearest possible terms to apply to this tenancy. If it applies to F this tenancy, by the peculiar provisions of these Acts the court is told : "You shall not make an order for possession save in certain circumstances." Prima facie, it seems to me the tenant must be entitled so to say.

There only remain the last three lines of qualification to s. 10 :

G "... but not so as to affect rent in respect of any period before the commencement thereof or anything done or omitted during any such period."

The obvious purpose and meaning of that qualification is that it disentitles the tenant from saying : "In the past we have assumed, because of Neale v. Del Soto (2), that I was not protected by the Acts. You have charged me more than the standard rent and I claim to recover the excess." The landlord might have successfully got him out of possession by some order of the court, but the H rent paid and the acts and omissions mentioned are not to be open to review. The express reference to "rent," however, seems to me to show that those words "anything done" cannot refer to such a step taken as the mere issuing of a summons. Clearly they cannot refer to the notice to quit. I think it is impossible on a fair reading of this section together with s. 9 (always bearing in mind the peculiar character of this rent restriction legislation) to say that s. 10 means that s. 9 should not apply to any pending cause of action. It would, of course, have been easy to say that if it had been intended. I think it must, and can only, mean in its context some act performed whereby the tenant has either gone out, or has paid something or done something, on the footing that he was unprotected before the Act came into force. The tenant here has suffered none of these things. He has resolutely remained in possession under the terms of his tenancy asserting the protection of the Acts. Had it not been for the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, he might well have failed in making good that assertion. It seems to me he is now entitled to say : " My letting is now exempted from the disqualifying effect of Neale v. Del Soto (2)." When the county court judge came to deal with that part of the case, he said :

" For the proposition that the crucial time for consideration is the date of the issue of the writ or plaint I refer to Prout v. Hunter (7), Leslie & Co., Ltd. v. Cumming (8) and Turner v. Baker (9)."

With all respect to the county court judge I do not think that is a good point. The question raised in those cases was the question on what date it was relevant to discover whether there was a letting within the properly applicable legislation ? As counsel for the tenant pointed out, what we are concerned with here is : What is the law applicable at the hearing ? We have to look at the statute, and, if my view of it be right, it says plainly that it has a retrospective effect. That being so, the only question is—and I come back to the same point—whether s. 10 by the last few lines has the effect that the Act applies to pre-existing tenancies with all the consequences which flow from that application, but that, nevertheless, something which has been done is to be unaffected, and whether it must then be said that the cause of action crystallising on the issue of the summons is something done, the full effect of which must in no way be minimised or otherwise affected by the Act. The issue of the summons (if that be a thing done) is not, as such, in any circumstances, affected. The landlord must go on to say that when the summons comes to be heard (a thing not done when the Act was passed) that hearing must proceed as though the Act of 1949 had not been passed.

I do not think that that is a fair or possible construction of ss. 9 and 10. Differing, therefore, as I do with diffidence, from the county court judge on any matter in which county court judges are so peculiarly experienced, I have come to the conclusion that he wrongly applied the principle of Prout v. Hunter (7) and the other cases and that the right answer is that which I have suggested, namely, that this Act retrospectively applies to protect and save the tenant in this case.

COHEN, L.J. : I am of the same opinion. The county court judge came to the conclusion that the fact that the plaint had been issued before the law was altered by the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, made the principle of Remon v. City of London Real Property Co. (1) inapplicable to the present case. He bases his conclusion on Turner v. Baker (9) and the other cases which my Lord has mentioned. In my opinion, those cases do not assist us in the decision of the present case. They establish that, in considering the problem then before the court, the law must be applied to the state of facts existing at the date of issue of the plaint. They are not relevant to the question before us, which is whether the law to be applied is that in force at the date of the issue of the plaint or that effected by a subsequent alteration of the law. In the case before us the question is whether ss. 9 and 10 of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, had the effect of making the tenant a protected tenant although, had the law not been altered, the landlord would have been entitled to possession. In other words, having regard to s. 10, has s. 9 retrospective effect, and, if so, how far ? For the reasons given by my Lord, with which I entirely agree, I think that the intention of the section is plainly that the alteration of the law shall have retrospective effect. The issue of a plaint is, no doubt, an act done within s. 10, but it is not equivalent to judgment. Remon

v. City of London Real Property Co. (1). I think, shows that nothing but delivery of possession or an order for possession can effectively deprive the occupying tenant of his possession. The plaint, therefore, stands as an act done, but when the county court judge, in dealing with that plaint, has to apply the law he must, in my opinion, give retrospective effect to s. 9 and he should have dismissed the action. For these reasons I would allow the appeal.

A ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree. In particular, it does not seem to me that it can possibly be argued that the application by s. 10 of s. 9 to this letting would affect anything done within the concluding words of s. 10. It is said the issue of the plaint is something done, but, assuming it is, the application of s. 9 to that letting does not invalidate or in any way affect the issue of the plaint. For these and the other reasons given by my Lords I agree with the order proposed.

B Appeal allowed, with costs.

Solicitors : H. B. Wedlake, Saint & Co. (for the landlord) ; Avery, Son & Fairbairn (for the tenant).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

C

Affirmed. H.L. [1951] 1 All E.R.
1102.

HARRISON v. NATIONAL COAL BOARD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), November 24, 28, 29, 30, December 21, 1949.]

D

Mine—Coal mine—Shot firing—Breach of statutory duty by shot firer—Liability of mine-owner, manager, and under manager—General Regulations, 1913 (S.R. & O., 1913, No. 748), reg. 1, made under Coal Mines Act, 1911 (c. 50), s. 86 (1)—Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 6), cl. 2 (e).

E

By the Coal Mines Act, 1911, s. 90 : " If any person who is bound to observe the regulations of any mine, acts in contravention of or fails to comply with any of them, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and also the owner, agent, and manager of such mine shall each be guilty of an offence . . . unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means, by publishing and to the best of his power enforcing the regulations, to prevent such contravention or non-compliance." Regulation 1 of the General Regulations (dated July 10, 1913), made under s. 86 (1) of the Act provides : " It shall be the duty of the manager and under-manager to carry out and to the best of their ability enforce the provisions of every Order in force under the Act regulating the . . . use . . . of explosives, and it shall be the duty of all persons employed in or about the mine to comply with the provisions of the said Orders." By cl. 2 (e) of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934 : " The person firing the shot shall, before doing so, see that all persons in the vicinity have taken proper shelter, and he shall also take suitable steps to prevent any person approaching the shot."

F

G

H

The plaintiff, who was employed by the defendants in their coal mine, was injured as a result of a breach of cl. 2 (e) of the Order of 1934 by a shot-firer, S., who was also an employee of the defendants. The plaintiff was driving a drift from one seam to another and, it being necessary to loosen some stone, requested S. to fire a shot which he did without warning the plaintiff or ensuring that the plaintiff was in a place of safety. The defendants had taken all reasonable means, by publishing the regulations, to enforce and secure compliance with the regulations. In a claim by the plaintiff for damages for breach of statutory duty, by the defendants, their servants or agents.

HELD : on the true construction of reg. 1 of the General Regulations, 1913 and of cl. 2 (e) of the Order of 1934 there was no duty imposed on the defendants, or on the manager and under-manager of the mine, to carry out the provisions of cl. 2 (e); the failure to comply with cl. 2 (e) was that of S. alone; the defence of common employment applied; and the plaintiff's claim must fail.

Yelland v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd. ([1941] 1 All E.R. 278), A distinguished.

Per JENKINS, L.J. The better opinion, both in principle and on the authorities, appears to be that there may be a breach of statutory duty entitling an injured party to damages although the breach in question may not amount to a criminal offence.

Decision of JONES, J. ([1949] 2 All E.R. 58), affirmed. B

[AS TO REGULATIONS GOVERNING THE USE OF EXPLOSIVES IN MINES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 22, p. 803, para. 1656; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 34, pp. 301-303, 744, 745, Nos. 2498-2505, 1190-1195.]

Cases referred to :

(1) David v. Britannic Merthyr Coal Co., [1909] 2 K.B. 146; 78 L.J.K.B. 659; 100 L.T. 678; affmd., [1910] A.C. 74; 79 L.J.K.B. 153; 101 L.T. 833; 34 Digest 740, 1168. C

(2) Yelland v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd., [1941] 1 All E.R. 278; [1941] 1 K.B. 154; 110 L.J.K.B. 401; 164 L.T. 401; 2nd Digest Supp. D

(3) Howells v. Landore Steel Co., (1874), L.R. 10 Q.B. 62; 44 L.J.Q.B. 25; 31 L.T. 433; 32 L.T. 19; 38 J.P. 806; 34 Digest 214, 1767. D

(4) Watkins v. Naval Colliery Co., (1897), Ltd., [1912] A.C. 693; 81 L.J.K.B. 1056; 107 L.T. 321; 34 Digest 741, 1173.

(5) Black v. Fife Coal Co., Ltd., [1912] A.C. 149; 81 L.J.P.C. 97; 106 L.T. 161; 5 B.W.C.C. 217; 34 Digest 740, 1166.

(6) Potts v. Reid, [1942] 2 All E.R. 161; [1943] A.C. 1; 111 L.J.P.C. 65; 167 L.T. 301; 2nd Digest Supp. E

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of JONES, J., ([1949] 2 All E.R. 58) made at Leeds Assizes on May 9, 1949, whereby he gave judgment for the defendants in an action by the plaintiff in respect of injuries sustained by him on Jan. 27, 1948, in the North Gawber Colliery, in which he was working as a collier in the employment of the defendants. The plaintiff alleged that the accident was due to negligence or breach of statutory duty under cl. 2 (e) of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934, by the defendants, their servants or agents. The defendants pleaded that the negligence (if any) was the negligence of one, Spence, a shot-firer in common employment with the plaintiff, and that the statutory duty was only imposed on the shot-firer and not the defendants. JONES, J., held that there was no breach of statutory duty by the defendants. The Court of Appeal now affirmed this decision and dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J. F

Beney, K.C., and McLusky for the plaintiff.

Fenwick, K.C., and Wrangham for the defendants. G

Cur. adv. vult. H

Dec. 21. The following judgments were read.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a decision of JONES, J., given at Leeds Assizes on May 9, 1949, whereby he gave judgment for the defendants, the National Coal Board, in an action brought against them by the plaintiff in respect of personal injuries suffered by him as the result of an accident in the North Gawber Colliery, in which he was working as a collier in the employ of the defendants. The accident occurred on Jan 27, 1948, and the plaintiff alleged that it was due to negligence or breach of statutory duty on the part of the defendants.

A The facts found by the learned judge were shortly as follows. The plaintiff was driving a drift from one seam to another and the time arrived when it was necessary to have a shot fired to loosen the stone through which the drift was being driven. The plaintiff had bored three holes in which the shots were to be placed. He sent his son, who was assisting him, to inform the deputy, a man named Spence, who was the person entrusted that day with the duty of shot-firing in that part of the mine. About half an hour later Spence arrived. The plaintiff and his son proceeded to make the necessary arrangements for the firing of the shots by laying down iron sheets called flags, removing their tools, and taking a pony to safety. While the plaintiff was bending down and before B he had taken shelter, Spence, who had put in the shots and coupled his shot firing gear to the detonator wires, turned the key in the battery and caused the shot to be fired, whereby the plaintiff suffered injuries.

Clause 2 (e) of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934, made under s. 61 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, provides :

C "The person firing the shot shall, before doing so, see that all persons in the vicinity have taken proper shelter . . ."

It was admitted at the trial that Spence had acted in breach of his statutory duty under cl. 2 (e) and that he had been guilty of negligence. But for the doctrine of common employment, the defendants would, of course, on these facts have clearly been liable to the plaintiff for the injuries which he received as a result of Spence's negligence and breach of statutory duty. The defendants D relied on this defence and pleaded that the plaintiff was in common employment with Spence.

E So far as negligence is concerned, it was not disputed that this defence must prevail, but, in so far as Spence's omission consisted of a breach of statutory duty, it was contended that the defence of common employment had no application. It was said that it would be an extension of the doctrine to hold that a workman impliedly agrees to take the risk of breaches by his fellow servants of regulations enacted for his safety and having statutory force. As to this, I think that all authority points to the contrary. In David v. Britannic Merthyr Coal Co. (1) COZENS-HARDY, M.R., said ([1909] 2 K.B. 152) :

F "The principles of law which ought to govern this case do not seem to be open to serious doubt, although the application of those principles presents to my mind very great difficulties. The principles may be shortly stated thus : A master is not liable to one servant for the consequences of an accident caused to that servant by the negligence or breach of statutory duty of another servant. This is often spoken of as the doctrine of common employment. But, on the other hand, a master is liable to his servant for the consequences of an accident caused to that servant by the breach of G a statutory duty imposed directly and absolutely upon the master . . ."

This was a dissenting judgment, but it is clear that the other members of the court must have agreed with this statement of the law, otherwise the defendants in that case would have been clearly liable and the elaborate judgments of FLETCHER-MOULTON, L.J., and BUCKLEY, L.J., would have been unnecessary. H More recently in Yelland v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd. (2) DU PARCQ, L.J., said ([1941] 1 All E.R. 284) :

" . . . but the mere fact that the negligence of a fellow-servant was a breach of a statutory obligation imposed upon him is not sufficient to deprive the master of the benefit of the doctrine of common employment."

In that case also it would have been unnecessary to consider whether there was a direct and absolute obligation imposed on the defendants if they were in any event liable for the breach of statutory duty imposed on their servant. In this state of authority—and in the absence of authority I should have reached the same conclusion—the defence of common employment is, in my view, a complete answer to the plaintiff's claim, unless he can establish that there was in addition a direct and absolute obligation on the defendants, or on some servant or agent of theirs for whose acts or omissions, in the course of his employment, they are liable and who was not in common employment with the plaintiff.

I will deal, first, with the question whether, on the judge's findings, there was a breach of statutory duty imposed on some person other than Spence. It was argued in this court that there was a breach by the manager and under-manager, by virtue of the provisions of reg. 1 of the General Regulations made under s. 86 (1) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. No such breach was alleged in the statement of claim. The learned judge in his judgment made a passing reference to this regulation as follows ([1949] 2 All E.R. 60) :

“ Regulation 1 of the General Regulations of 1913 (S.R. & O., 1913, No. 748), made under s. 86 of the Act of 1911, provides : ‘ It shall be the duty of the manager and under-manager to carry out and to the best of their ability enforce the provisions of every Order . . . regulating the . . . use . . . of explosives.’ Therefore, it is the duty of the manager and under-manager to carry out and enforce to the best of their ability para. 2 (e) of the Order of 1934.”

The learned judge did not proceed to consider whether the defendants were thereby made liable, or whether the defence of common employment would in this connection avail them. As I have said above, no such allegation had been made in the statement of claim and, consequently, the plea of common employment was only directed to Spence. In this state of affairs I do not think that it would be right for this court to assume, in the absence of evidence directed to this issue, that a defence which might have been pleaded had the statement of claim been differently framed would, if pleaded, have necessarily failed, especially having regard to the decision in Howells v. Landore Steel Co. (3). As the matter was, however, argued before us without objection, I will state my view as to the proper construction of reg. 1 of the General Regulations of 1913. The question turns on the meaning of the words “ carry out ” used in conjunction with the words which follow, namely, “ and to the best of their ability enforce.” Prima facie I should have thought that this language envisaged that some provisions of the relevant orders could and must be actually performed by the manager and under-manager either personally or by some person on their behalf, and that other provisions imposed duties on specified persons who were alone qualified and entitled to perform them and as to which the manager and under-manager were required to the best of their ability to enforce the performance.

Applying this construction to the duties of a shot-firer, I find that para. 6 (a) of the Order of 1934 provides :

“ Competent persons (in this Order called shot-firers) shall be appointed in writing by the manager for the purpose of firing shots, and no shot shall be fired except by a shot-firer.”

Paragraph 2 lays down the procedure to be followed by the shot-firer. He is the only person entitled to carry out those operations, the performance of which is entrusted to him and him alone. Sub-paragraph (e), which is the one now in question, lays down that “ the person firing the shot ” shall take certain steps. Only one person can fire the shot and it seems to me to be straining the use of words to say that it is the duty of the manager and under-manager “ to carry out ” the provisions of this paragraph of the Order. They must, no doubt, enforce the performance to the best of their ability, but to say that they must “ carry out ” something which they are expressly forbidden to do, with the result that they become liable to criminal proceedings for not “ carrying out ” these provisions, seems to me to produce a result which cannot have been intended by those who framed this Order.

Before reaching a final conclusion on this point it is, however, necessary to give careful consideration to the judgment of DU PARCQ, L.J., in Yelland's case (2). That case concerned the duties of an electrician under Part III of the regulations of 1913. Regulation 131 (a) provides :

A “No person except an electrician or a competent person acting under his supervision shall undertake any work where technical knowledge or experience is required in order adequately to avoid danger.”

Regulation 131 (b) provides :

B “An electrician shall be appointed in writing by the manager to supervise the apparatus.”

The regulation which had not been complied with in that case was reg. 131 (e), which reads as follows :

“Should there be a fault in any circuit the part affected shall be made dead without delay, and shall remain so until the fault has been remedied.”

C These regulations are preceded by reg. 117, which says :

“It shall be the duty of the mine owner, agent, and manager to comply with and enforce the following regulations, and it shall be the duty of all workmen and persons employed to conduct their work in accordance with the regulations.”

D DU PARCQ, L.J., held that by reason of the electrician's breach of reg. 131 (e) the mine-owner had failed to “comply with” that regulation, but he could not be said to have failed to enforce it. The learned lord justice said ([1941] 1 All E.R. 286) :

E “It is not necessary to decide whether the owner is bound to ‘comply with’ every one of the regulations to which reg. 117 refers. It may be that there are some with which, from their very nature, it is impossible that the owner should comply, and that his only duty with regard to these is to ‘enforce’ them. Further, it must, I think, be true to say that a breach of duty by some person who has not been entrusted by the mine-owner with the performance of the duty on his behalf is no evidence of a failure by the owner to comply with the Act. I find no difficulty, however, in holding that the mine-owner is under an obligation to ‘comply with’ reg. 131 (e), and that in the present case the defendants have failed in that duty. The person immediately responsible for the performance of this obligation is the electrician, or assistant electrician, who has to be appointed by the manager. (regs. 118 and 131 (b)). His duties are set out in reg. 131 (e), and, in my opinion, he must be regarded as the mine-owner's agent to perform those duties, and as the agent through whom the owner must act, and in this case did act. The mine-owner, through the manager, has entrusted him with the performance of the duty. It follows that the law attributes to the owner his acts and omissions, and regards them as the mine-owner's own acts and omissions, for which he is directly responsible. Proof of the facts which were established in this case in my opinion fully supported the pleaded allegation that ‘the defendants failed to comply with the Electricity Regulations.’”

H In that case the lord justice was considering the words “comply with” and not the words “carry out.” Furthermore, he was dealing with those words in a regulation which placed a duty on the mine-owner. MACKINNON, L.J., did not in terms refer to reg. 117, but I think that in reading his judgment it must always be borne in mind that the plaintiff's case was mainly based on this regulation. LUXMOORE, L.J., agreed with the judgments delivered by both the other members of the court, which he evidently did not regard as being in any way conflicting.

There is nothing in Yelland's case (2) which impels me to the view that I must construe the words "carry out" as imposing a liability on the manager and under-manager for the shot-firer's failure to perform the duties imposed on him under cl. 2 (e) of the Order of 1934. In this connection it is, perhaps, worth observing that DU PARCQ, L.J., himself uses the words "comply with" in contrast to "carry out" in a passage of his judgment, where he says (ibid., 285) :

"Even if the mine-owner were a natural person, and not, as in this case, a limited liability company, he would hardly be able to comply with any of the regulations, and certainly would be unable to comply with them all, in the sense of himself carrying them out, or even in the sense of constantly seeing to it that they were carried out."

In my view, in order to succeed on this appeal the plaintiff must satisfy us that cl. 2 (e) imposes a direct and absolute obligation on the mine-owners as well as on the shot-firer. This appears to have been the only issue raised at the trial and it was put in the forefront of the plaintiff's argument in this court. JONES, J., was of opinion that not much assistance was to be gained from David v. Britannic Merthyr Coal Co. (1), decided under the rules contained in s. 49 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and that Yelland's case (2) was distinguishable as having been decided under reg. 117, which expressly imposed a duty on the mine-owners. He was of opinion ([1949] 2 All E.R. 61) :

"... in the circumstances of the case and on the true construction of the material regulations there was not a duty on the mine-owners to carry out the provisions of para. 2 (e) of the Order of 1934, and that there was no breach of statutory duty by them."

After due consideration of the arguments advanced by counsel to the contrary and the authorities cited by him, I have arrived at the same conclusion as JONES, J.

The cases principally relied on were those already referred to, namely, David's case (1) and Yelland's case (2). It is difficult to derive much assistance from David's case (1). The rule with which that case was mainly concerned was s. 49, r. 12 (f), of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, which, so far as is material, provided:

"... no shot shall be fired except by or under the direction of a competent person appointed by the owner agent or manager of the mine."

The shot had, in fact, been fired by two unauthorised persons, though a regular shot-firer had been duly appointed. Section 50 of the Act of 1887 provided :

"Every person who contravenes or does not comply with any of the General Rules in this Act, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act ; and in the event of any contravention of or non-compliance with any of the said General Rules in the case of any mine to which this Act applies, by any person whomsoever, the owner agent and manager shall each be guilty of an offence against this Act, unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means, by publishing and to the best of his power enforcing the said rules as regulations for the working of the mine, to prevent such contravention or non-compliance."

At the trial CHANNELL, J., directed the jury that the duty imposed on the mine-owners was, first, to publish the rules, and, in the next place, to enforce them to the best of their power, and, if they did this, they were not liable if one of their servants committed a breach of the rules and another servant was thereby injured. He further directed the jury that the onus was on the plaintiff to prove that the defendants had neglected their duties as laid down above. COZENS-HARDY, M.R., in a dissenting judgment agreed with the direction given by CHANNELL, J. FLETCHER-MOULTON, L.J., was of opinion that there had been misdirection by the trial judge. He said ([1909] 2 K.B. 162) :

"I come, therefore, to the conclusion that, although every 'offence against the Act' for which a penalty is provided undoubtedly constitutes a breach of a statutory duty, the converse is not necessarily the case, and there may be statutory duties under the Act the breach of which is not made an 'offence under the Act' so as to be mulcted by a penalty ; and further—a conclusion that has a more direct bearing on the questions in this action—that statutory defences to proceedings of a criminal nature in respect of 'offences under the Act' are only defences to such proceedings, and are not statutory defences in civil proceedings based on the non-performance of the statutory duty. Penalties are not in lieu of civil liability ; they are additional to and independent of it. It follows, therefore, that in my opinion the learned judge misdirected the jury in telling them that 'there is not in this statute an absolute liability upon the owners to ensure compliance with these rules by their servants, but if they, to the best of their power, do their best to enforce these rules, then they are not liable in law for damage done by reason of their servants not performing the rules.' I hold that in the rules which form part of this Act there are many statutory duties imposed on the owners of the mines, and that with regard to these there is no exception to the ordinary rule that civil responsibility follows if these rules are broken and damage is occasioned to third parties, whether the actual act or default is due to the owner or his servants or agents."

As I read the judgment of the lord justice he was of opinion that on the facts proved the judge should have directed the jury that liability on the part of the defendants had been established, and I do not know, on this view of the case, what evidence the defendants could call on the new trial in order to escape liability. BUCKLEY, L.J., was of opinion (ibid., 168) that the defendants might escape liability by proving that they had taken all reasonable means to prevent the breach, but that the onus was on them to prove this in order to escape their prima facie liability for breach. On this view a new trial was clearly required.

On appeal to the House of Lords the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal was upheld, but LORD HALSBURY and LORD GORELL said that they could not agree with some of the reasoning of the judges in the Court of Appeal. LORD HALDANE in Watkins v. Naval Colliery Co., (1897), Ltd. (4) explained ([1912] A.C. 703) the order for a new trial in David v. Britannic Merthyr Coal Co. (1) on the ground that a new trial was all that was asked for, but COZENS-HARDY, M.R., in the report of the latter case said ([1909] 2 K.B. 152) :

"The plaintiff has appealed and claims either judgment or a new trial on the ground of misdirection."

In these circumstances I feel great difficulty in ascertaining what direction the judge was required to give to the jury at the new trial. Was it that indicated by BUCKLEY, L.J., or that which is implicit in the judgment of FLETCHER-MOULTON, L.J. ? It is for this reason that I find difficulty in extracting much assistance from this case. Taking, however, the view most favourable to the plaintiff in the present case, namely, that expressed by FLETCHER-MOULTON, L.J., the fact remains that he was construing a totally different rule, namely, one expressed in the words: "No shot shall be fired . . ." If I may respectfully say so, I can quite understand the view that these words impose an absolute and inescapable obligation on the mine-owner. The clause of the order in question in the present case is worded differently. It is dealing with the steps to be taken by the duly appointed shot-firer before he fires the shot. He shall "see that all persons in the vicinity have taken proper shelter." This is an obligation expressly imposed on him, he being the only person who is permitted to fire the shot. I cannot read this provision as imposing a direct and absolute obligation on the mine-owner, whether he be a natural person or a corporate body which can only act by an agent.

I agree with JONES, J., that reg. 117, which formed the basis of the judgment of DU PARCQ, L.J., in Yelland's case (2) and which must, I think, have been present throughout to the mind of MACKINNON, L.J. (though not expressly mentioned), distinguishes that case from the present. I feel that it would be straining the language of the order and regulations to decide in the present case that there was an absolute and direct obligation on the mine-owners and thereby escape from the consequences of the doctrine of common employment which at the date of this accident precluded the plaintiff from recovering damages for the admitted negligence and breach of statutory duty by Spence, for which, but for this doctrine, the defendants would have been clearly liable.

As I am of opinion, for the reasons stated above, that the defendants are not liable to the plaintiff, it is not necessary to this judgment to decide whether the defendants could have succeeded on the ground that their civil liability is to be measured in terms of their criminal liability under s. 90 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. As to this there have been conflicting dicta of high authority with regard to these provisions and similar provisions in other statutes. On the one hand, BUCKLEY, L.J., and COZENS-HARDY, M.R., in David's case (1) and LORD KINNEAR in Black v. Fife Coal Co., Ltd. (5), and LORD ATKINSON in Watkins v. Naval Colliery Co., (1897), Ltd. (4), all took the view that a defence available in criminal proceedings would also afford an answer to civil proceedings. On the other hand, FLETCHER-MOULTON, L.J., in David's case (1), DU PARCQ, L.J., in Yelland's case (2) and LORDS THANKERTON, WRIGHT and PORTER in Potts v. Reid (6), which was a case under the Factories Act, 1937, took the contrary view that provisions with regard to criminal liability and containing no reference to civil liability do not affect the existence of a contravention of the Act or regulations giving rise to civil liability. Notwithstanding this difference of opinion and recognising that such questions must in every case depend on the precise language of the statute in question, I have no hesitation in saying that, had it been necessary, I should have accepted the view expressed by DU PARCQ, L.J., in Yelland's case (2) in dealing with the Act now in question and the reasoning of LORD PORTER in Pott's case (6). For the reasons stated above, I would dismiss this appeal. I desire to add that in cases such as this, which involve difficult questions of law and are likely to be taken to appeal it is always desirable that the trial judge, whether or not he is specifically requested by counsel so to do, should assess the damages provisionally, if his decision is adverse to the plaintiff. Failure to do so frequently results in unnecessary further expense to the parties.

SINGLETON, L.J. : I agree.

JENKINS, L.J. : I agree and have very little to add. Accepting the evidence of the agent, manager and under-manager of the mine, the learned judge found that all precautions had been taken by the officials of the mine that shot-firing in the mine should be carried out with care, and he further found that the defendants took all reasonable means, by publishing the regulations, to enforce this and secure compliance with the regulations. This finding, as I understand it, has the effect of absolving the defendants and also their agent, manager and under-manager from being guilty of an offence under s. 75, or, alternatively, s. 90, of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, by reason of the shot-firer, Spence's, contravention of, or failure to comply with, the provisions of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934. If on the facts the defendants had been guilty of an offence under either of those sections, it would, no doubt, have followed that the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover damages from the defendants on the ground that the offence constituted a breach of statutory duty by which he had been injured. On the other hand, I agree with my Lord that

A the absence of any offence involving criminal liability does not conclude the matter as the better opinion both in principle and on the authorities appears to be that there may be a breach of statutory duty entitling an injured party to damages although the breach in question may not amount to a criminal offence. It by no means follows, however, that every breach of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934, or of the General Regulations of 1913 made under s. 86 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, necessarily constitutes a breach of statutory duty on the part of the owner of the mine simply because he is the owner, without regard to the terms of the provision in question, the nature of the duty which it imposes, or the person it charges with the performance of that duty. There are, of course, some provisions of the Order and regulations which do impose statutory duties on the owner in express terms. There may well be others which should be construed as doing so, even though the owner is not expressly mentioned as the person responsible, and, in general, I think a regulation to the effect that this or that shall or shall not be done in any coal mine, without any reference to the person by whom it is to be done or prevented, would prima facie cast on the owner, acting personally or through his agents, the duty of doing or preventing the act in question. The duties with which this case is concerned, however, were duties in terms laid on the shot-firer, by whom alone they were capable of being performed, and there is no regulation purporting to lay them on the owner as well. The only other persons expressly charged with any duty in this particular matter are the manager and under-manager, who, by reg. 1 of the General Regulations, are enjoined to "carry out and to the best of their ability enforce" the provisions of the order.

D In contrast to reg. 1, reg. 117 (which the court had to consider in Yelland v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd. (2) ), provides that

"It shall be the duty of the mine-owner, agent, and manager to comply with and enforce the following regulations [relating to electricity] . . ."

E The reason why the owner should have been included in reg. 117 and omitted from reg. 1 is not apparent, but, if it had been intended to make the owner responsible in both cases, he must surely have been referred to in both regulations or else (on the principle that he as owner was by implication fixed with an overriding and universal responsibility) omitted from both. Applying the ordinary principles of construction, the only conclusion I can draw from the omission of the owner from reg. 1, in contrast to his inclusion in reg. 117 is that it was intended, for some reason or other, to lay a general duty on him in regard to the matters covered by reg. 117, but not in regard to the matters covered by reg. 1. The owner is excluded from the technical management of the mine by s. 2 (4) of the Act of 1911, and he, therefore, clearly has no power to control the proceedings of a shot-firer, even if it were otherwise practicable for him to do so. Accordingly, I do not think he should be held to have committed a breach of statutory duty by reason only of the shot-firer's default unless the terms of the Act and regulations either expressly or by necessary implication produce that result. So far from that being the case (ss. 75 and 90 of the Act being out of the way), the language of reg. 1, especially when contrasted with that of reg. 117, points clearly in the other direction.

G As to the alternative argument advanced in this court to the effect that there was a breach of statutory duty on the part of the manager and under-manager under reg. 1, for which the defendants as their employers must be held responsible to the plaintiff, assuming it to be open to the plaintiff, I think it must fail for the reasons which my Lord has expressed. To those reasons I would only add this. The duty imposed on the manager and under-manager is "to carry out and to the best of their ability enforce" the Order. If the words "to carry out" are construed as imposing an unqualified obligation to secure compliance with the order, then the qualification of the obligation to "enforce" it, imported by the words "to the best of their ability," seems to me to be meaningless.

There can hardly be a failure "to enforce" the order unless there has been a failure on somebody's part to comply with it. Therefore, if the duty "to carry out" was broken every time there was a non-compliance by anyone, it would be no defence for the manager and under-manager to show that they had enforced the order in regard to the particular matter in question "to the best of their ability," and those words would, accordingly, be deprived of all effect. I agree that all three judgments in Yelland's case (2) must be treated as founded on the express imposition of a duty on the owner by reg. 117, which explicitly formed the basis of the judgment of DU PARCQ, L.J., and, accordingly, that there is nothing in that decision to conflict with the view, in which I concur, that in the present case the learned judge came to a right conclusion, and that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors : Corbin, Greener & Co., agents for Raley & Pratt, Barnsley (for the plaintiff) ; Solicitor to the National Coal Board, agent for C. M. H. Glover, Doncaster (for the defendants).

[Reported by C. St.J. NICHOLSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

HORTON v. LONDON GRAVING DOCK COMPANY, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Singleton and Jenkins, L.J.J.), November 30, December 1, 2, 21, 1949.]

Negligence—Invitee—Duty of occupier—Protection against "unusual danger"—Workman falling from staging—Workman's knowledge that staging faulty—No contributory negligence—Defence of volenti non fit injuria not available on evidence.

The plaintiff, a welder, was employed by sub-contractors to weld strips of steel on the ribs of a trawler which the defendants, the head contractors, were reconditioning. While working in the fish house (part of the hold), the welders had to work in pairs on a staging, provided by the contractors and comprising four boards, five feet apart, each about twenty feet long, eleven inches wide and three inches deep, supported on iron beams on angle-irons placed across the fish house at a height of five feet five inches from a cement lining at the bottom of the trawler. There were no cross boards to the staging, and the only means of getting from one board to another was by stepping on an angle-iron. The staging was under the exclusive control of the contractors, and the sub-contractors' workmen had no right to interfere with it, but they had complained of its insufficiency to the contractors' charge-hand, who had promised that something would be done to remedy the defect. Nothing, however, had been done. While working on the staging, the welder placed one foot on the middle deal and the other foot on an angle-iron to pass a tool-box to a fellow welder, and, in trying to get both feet on the middle deal, he slipped and was injured. In an action brought by him against the contractors, claiming damages for negligence, it was established that the accident was caused by the insufficiency of the staging, but the judge held that the contractors were not liable in negligence, as their duty to the welder, as an invitee, was only to protect him from an "unusual danger" and, as he was aware of the danger, it could not be an "unusual" one. On appeal :

HELD : an "unusual danger" was one which would not normally be expected, and a danger which was unusual did not become other than unusual merely because the person suing knew of it before his accident ; the danger created by the insufficiency of the staging was an unusual one in that it was of a kind not usually encountered, and, as the contractors knew that the staging was to be used by the sub-contractors' workmen, of whom the welder was one, they were under a duty to him, even as they were to their own workmen, to provide proper plant and appliances and to make good any deficiencies, and they were relieved from responsibility by reason of the welder's knowledge of the danger only if they could prove contributory negligence or establish a plea of volenti non fit injuria (Letang v. Ottawa Electric Ry. Co. ([1926] A.C. 725), applied); on the facts, however, there was no contributory negligence and, as the welder, although not one of the contractors' own servants, was a servant of the sub-contractors and was working alongside the contractors' servants, and had, moreover, complained of the danger, the defence of volenti non fit injuria could not apply (Bowater v. Rowley Regis Corpn. ([1944] 1 All E.R. 465), applied), and, therefore, the contractors were liable to the welder for their negligence.

Dictum of WILLES, J., in Indermaur v. Dames (1866) (L.R. 1 C.P. 288), explained.

Per SINGLETON, L.J. The defence of volenti non fit injuria ought not to prevail against a workman who has complained, but who thinks it right to get on with his work as best he can and as carefully as he can, especially if there be a promise on behalf of the occupiers of the premises on which he is injured to put the matter right or to do "the best I can."

Decision of LYNSEY, J. ([1949] 2 All E.R. 169), reversed.

[AS TO DUTY TO INVITEES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, pp. 600-609, paras. 851-858; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 41, 42, Nos. 247-258, and pp. 44, 45, Nos. 272-281.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Indermaur v. Dames, (1866), L.R. 1 C.P. 274; Har. & Ruth. 243; 35 L.J.C.P. 184; 14 L.T. 484; affmd., (1867), L.R. 2 C.P. 311; 36 L.J.C.P. 181; 16 L.T. 293; 31 J.P. 390; 36 Digest 35, 208.
- (2) Norman v. Great Western Ry. Co., [1915] 1 K.B. 584; 84 L.J.K.B. 598; 112 L.T. 266; 38 Digest 352, 580.
- (3) Griffiths v. Smith, [1941] 1 All E.R. 66; [1941] A.C. 170; 110 L.J.K.B. 156; 164 L.T. 386; 105 J.P. 63; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) Letang v. Ottawa Electric Ry. Co., [1926] A.C. 725; 95 L.J.P.C. 153; 135 L.T. 421; Digest Supp.
- (5) Bowater v. Rowley Regis Corpn., [1944] 1 All E.R. 465; [1944] K.B. 476; 113 L.J.K.B. 427; 170 L.T. 314; 108 J.P. 163; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (6) Heaven v. Pender, (1883), 11 Q.B.D. 503; 52 L.J.Q.B. 702; 49 L.T. 357; 47 J.P. 709; 36 Digest 8, 9.
- (7) Donoghue v. Stevenson, [1932] A.C. 562; 101 L.J.P.C. 119; 147 L.T. 281; Digest Supp.
- (8) Le Lievre v. Gould, [1893] 1 Q.B. 491; 62 L.J.Q.B. 353; 68 L.T. 626; 57 J.P. 484; 36 Digest 10, 26.
- (9) Addie, R. & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck, [1929] A.C. 358; 98 L.J.P.C. 119; 140 L.T. 650; Digest Supp.
- (10) Hillen v. I.C.I. (Alkali), Ltd., [1934] 1 K.B. 455; 103 L.J.K.B. 163; 150 L.T. 147; affd., on other grounds, sub nom., Hillen & Pettigrew v. I.C.I. (Alkali), Ltd., [1936] A.C. 65; 104 L.J.K.B. 473; 153 L.T. 403; Digest Supp.
- (11) Cavalier v. Pope, [1906] A.C. 428; 75 L.J.K.B. 609; 95 L.T. 65; 12 Digest 49, 273.
- (12) Brackley v. Midland Ry. Co., (1916), 85 L.J.K.B. 1596; 114 L.T. 1150; 80 J.P. 369; 36 Digest 41, 254.

- (13) Weigall v. Westminster Hospital, [1936] 1 All E.R. 232 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (14) Haseldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd., [1941] 3 All E.R. 156 ; [1941] 2 K.B. 343 ; 111 L.J.K.B. 45 ; 165 L.T. 185 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (15) Harrison v. National Coal Board, [1950] 1 All E.R. 171.
- (16) Oliver v. Saddler & Co., [1929] A.C. 584 ; 98 L.J.P.C. 87 ; 141 L.T. 305 ; Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a judgment of LYNSEY, J., dated June 2, 1949, and reported [1949] 2 All E.R. 169, in an action claiming damages for personal injuries arising out of the negligence of the defendants. A

The plaintiff, a welder employed by sub-contractors, was injured while working on a staging erected by the defendants, the head contractors, in the hold of a vessel which the defendants were re-converting into a fishing trawler. The accident was due to the fact that the staging was defective in that it was insufficient. The plaintiff and his fellow workmen had complained of the insufficiency to the defendants' charge-hand, but nothing had been done to remedy it. LYNSEY, J., held that the defendants' duty to the plaintiff, as an invitee, was to prevent damage from an unusual danger, and, as the danger was known to the plaintiff, there was no unusual danger, and, therefore, the defendants were not liable in negligence. From this decision the plaintiff now appealed and the Court of Appeal allowed his appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SINGLETON, L.J. B

Edgedale, K.C., and C. J. A. Doughty for the plaintiff.
Marven Everett for the defendants. C

Cur. adv. vult. D

Dec. 21. The following judgments were read.

SINGLETON, L.J. : The trawler Velmont had been used as a naval vessel. In the latter part of 1946 she was being re-converted into a fishing trawler. The defendants were the main contractors for that work and they are to be regarded as the occupiers of the trawler. Thames Welding Co., Ltd., had a sub-contract with the defendants in respect of certain welding work which had to be done on the trawler. The plaintiff was an electric welder employed by Thames Welding Co., Ltd. In December, 1946, work was being done in the fish house, part of the hold of the trawler. A staging was necessary for work above a certain level and there were two thwart ship iron beams on angle-irons, and four boards or deals were placed on these fore and aft, two on the starboard side and two on the port side. Each of the deals was about twenty feet long, eleven inches wide and three inches deep. There was a space of about eighteen inches between each of the outermost deals and the skin of the trawler and a space of about five feet between each of the deals. There were no cross boards. The results of this was that, if one of the welders had to go from one of the boards to another, it had to be done by his using one of the angle-irons, and the same kind of thing had to be done if one wished to pass a tool-box to another, or if one working on the staging wished to leave it and to go up or down by the one ladder which was available. In the condition in which it was, the staging was defective, in that it was insufficient. There is no doubt as to that. It could have been made satisfactory by the use of more deals, e.g., by the use of a couple of cross boards. As it was, it constituted a danger which led to an accident to the plaintiff. E

The staging was erected by the defendants, and the sub-contractors' men had no right to interfere with it. The welders worked in pairs, one relieving the other from time to time so as to avoid undue strain on the eyes. The plaintiff worked with a man named Fletcher. They had worked in the fish house for some time before it became necessary for them to use the staging. It is clear that before the date of the accident, Dec. 16, 1946, complaints as to the insufficiency of the staging were made by the plaintiff and by other welders to F the defendants' charge-hand. One of the witnesses (Death) said that he had complained to his employers' foreman as well as to the defendants' charge-hand. The plaintiff's evidence on this part of the case appears from the following question and answers :

G

H

"Q—Had you ever spoken to anybody about the absence of planks across the intervening gap ? A—About the gap ?

A Q—Yes, about the absence of planks across it ? A—Yes. The shipwright occasionally used to come to attend to the job. We spoke about there being insufficient boards there, but he said : ' We have not got this, that and the other ', or ' I will do the best I can and I will look round and have a look,' but that was the last we heard of it.

B Q—They promised to do something, but never did ? A—No, sir, that's it."

He added that Hewitt, the foreman of his employers, Thames Welding Co., Ltd., did not come to the trawler, and that appears to be confirmed by the evidence of Hewitt himself. The evidence of Fletcher, which was taken before an examiner, contains this passage :

C "Q—Had you yourself complained to anybody about the distance between the planks ? A—We only asked the shipwrights.

Q—What did you say to them ? A—We asked them if they could give us some more staging.

D Q—What would have been a safe distance to have those planks from one another ? A—A safe distance ? Safeness would be an extra two deals coming from one to the other. That would be the safe distance so that you could walk from one to the other. But there were none.

Q—How far were you working from the ship's bottom ? A—I should say about eight feet."

In fact, a cement lining had been put into the bottom of the ship and the angle irons were five feet five inches above that.

E On Dec. 16, 1946, the plaintiff had been working on the starboard side on one of the middle deals. That deal was five feet away from the deal which was nearest to the skin of the trawler on the starboard side. He had been welding an iron under the deck and had been using the tool-box, which contained hammer, chisels and welding rods and which weighed in all about fourteen pounds. He finished his work for the time being and his fellow welder, Fletcher, F climbed up on to the deal nearest to the starboard side, using the strips already welded as a ladder to reach the staging. When Fletcher reached the staging, the plaintiff picked up the tool-box in order to hand it to Fletcher. As there was a space of about five feet between the board on which the plaintiff was and the board on which Fletcher was standing, the plaintiff, having one foot on the starboard middle deal, placed his other foot on to the angle-iron and G handed the tool-box to Fletcher, who received it while he had one foot on his deal and the other foot on the angle-iron. Fletcher turned round to put the tool-box on the deal on which he was standing. The plaintiff tried to get both feet on to the middle starboard deal when his foot slipped and he fell astride the angle-iron. He was bruised about the pubic bone and he sustained a rupture.

H The plaintiff brought this action against the defendants, alleging that they were negligent in that they were under a duty to supply and erect a staging which was safe to persons using it and/or to provide safe means of access and/or a safe working platform to persons repairing and reconditioning the ship, and in breach of that duty and/or negligently they supplied a staging which was unsafe and/or did not provide a safe means of access and/or a safe working platform. Among the particulars they included an allegation that the defendants ignored complaints by those working on the staging that it was dangerous and inadequate. The defendants denied the plaintiff's allegations and pleaded that such injuries as the plaintiff sustained were occasioned by, or, alternatively, were contributed to by, negligence on the part of the plaintiff. There was no plea of volenti non fit injuria. LYNSEY, J., gave judgment for the defendants. He was of opinion that there was no unusual danger in so far as the plaintiff was concerned and that there was no breach of duty on the part of the defendants. He added that, if it had been necessary, he would have held that the plaintiff, freely and voluntarily, impliedly agreed to accept the risk of working on the staging with full knowledge of the nature and extent of the risk he ran. Before the learned trial judge, the plaintiff's case was put on the footing of the duty owed by an invitor to an invitee. On the hearing of the appeal counsel for the plaintiff was inclined to put the case on a somewhat wider basis, though his main argument was directed towards showing that LYNSEY, J., was wrong in his statement of the position on the assumption that the defendants were to be regarded as invitores and the plaintiff as an invitee.

I propose to deal first with the arguments based on "invitor" and "invitee." (The judge said that it was clear that the defendants owed to the plaintiff the duties which an invitor owes to an invitee.) This involves a close examination of the nature of the duty as laid down by WILLES, J. (L.R. 1 C.P. 285, 287 and 288) in Indermaur v. Dames (1). WILLES, J., used these words (ibid., 288):

"And, with respect to such a visitor at least, we consider it settled law, that he, using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger, which he knows or ought to know; and that, where there is evidence of neglect, the question whether such reasonable care has been taken, by notice, lighting, guarding, or otherwise, and whether there was contributory negligence in the sufferer, must be determined by a jury as a matter of fact."

The rule there stated ends with the words "knows or ought to know." The words which follow are an indication of some of the ways in which a defendant may escape liability, e.g., by giving notice of the danger, or by lighting, guarding or otherwise, and, of course, contributory negligence was a complete answer at that time. In such circumstances it is a question of fact whether reasonable care has been taken, and notice is an element which has to be taken into consideration.

The first difficulty arises from the words "unusual danger." The submission of counsel for the defendants was that "unusual" in this category means "unexpected by the plaintiff" and that, if the danger was known to him, it could not be an unusual danger, from which it would follow that there was no liability on the defendants. This submission met with the approval of LYNSEY, J., who, citing the judgment of PHILLIMORE, L.J. ([1915] 1 K.B. 596) in Norman v. Great Western Ry. Co. (2), said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 170):

"In my view 'unusual danger' means a danger unusual from the point of view of the particular invitee . . . It must be, from his point of view, unexpected in the particular circumstances in which he is availing himself of the invitation."

With respect, I do not regard this as the test in every case. "Unusual" may be defined as: "Not usual: uncommon: exceptional." It indicates the kind of thing which would not normally be expected. The danger created by the staging was through its being insufficient, and the danger was an unusual one in that it was of a kind not usually encountered. The plaintiff was an experienced welder, sixty-seven years of age, and he and others complained of the insufficiency of the staging. A danger which is unusual does not become other than unusual merely because the person suing knew of it before his accident. If it were otherwise, notice of an unusual danger might of itself render the rule in Indermaur v. Dames (1) wholly inapplicable, whereas notice is only an element to be considered. In the case of an invitee it is not necessary to show a concealed or a hidden danger, as it is in the case of a licensee. In this respect I think that the reference by VISCOUNT MAUGHAM ([1941] 1 All E.R. 74) to "a hidden danger" in Griffiths v. Smith (3), was a slip, and, in any event, the duty towards an invitee was not being considered in that case.

A The next question is whether the plaintiff's knowledge of the danger prevents him from recovering damages. WINFIELD ON THE LAW OF TORT, 4th ed., p. 562, refers to the two different interpretations which have been put on the rule in Indermaur v. Dames (1), as a result of "an ambiguity in its terms."

"(i) The occupier must take reasonable care to make the structure safe.

(ii) The occupier need only ascertain the existence of dangers and either remove them or give adequate warning of their existence . . ."

B The submission on behalf of the defendants was that, as the plaintiff knew of the danger, there was no need for them to give him any notice, and he could not recover, for he was in the same position as one to whom notice had been given. I am not sure that there is any ambiguity in the rule as stated by WILLES, J., if, as I think, the rule itself ends with the words "knows or ought to know," and the words which follow are regarded as indicating possible defences. Once
C there is evidence of neglect—and I think it is clear that there was, on the judge's finding as to the staging—it is a question of fact whether the notice given is sufficient to absolve the occupier from liability. I agree that one who has knowledge of the danger may well be treated as though he had been given notice of it. Whether the notice (or knowledge) is sufficient to absolve the occupier must depend on a variety of circumstances, including the nature of the risk and the position
D of the injured party. If a veterinary surgeon is called to a farm at night time to attend to a sick animal and the farmer tells him: "Be careful how you go down the yard or you may fall into a tank," and, in spite of every care, the veterinary surgeon meets with an accident through an unusual danger, though of the kind envisaged, he may be entitled to recover, notwithstanding the warning or notice. On the other hand, if a shopkeeper says to a customer:
E "Do not go to the far side of the shop. There is a hole there and it is dangerous," and the customer disregards the warning and thereby meets with an accident, it is unlikely that he could recover.

The plaintiff was employed to work on this staging. He had pointed out that it was insufficiently constructed. No doubt, he hoped that he would be able to carry on safely and, perhaps, he thought that the defendants would put the staging into a better condition. It was his duty to get on with the work. He was entitled to rely on the promise of the defendants' charge-hand that something would be done. There is no finding of contributory negligence against the plaintiff and it must be taken that at the time of his accident he was taking every care of himself and that the accident took place because of the insufficiency of the staging. Can it be said that reasonable care was taken "by notice . . . or G otherwise," so that the defendants are relieved from responsibility? In fact, they did nothing. I do not regard knowledge on the part of the plaintiff as an answer to the claim, unless it can be shown, not only that he realised the extent of the risk, but also that he freely and voluntarily undertook it—in other words, that the defence of volenti non fit injuria applies: see Letang v. Ottawa Electric Ry. Co. (4). I do not know how far volenti as a defence was considered in the H court of first instance. It was argued on the appeal, and I had not then noticed that it was not raised by the defence as pleaded.

We were referred to Bowater v. Rowley Regis Corpn. (5), in which it was said that the defence of volenti could seldom apply when the plaintiff was a servant of the defendants. It is difficult to see any real difference in principle between that case and this, for, though here the plaintiff was not a servant of the defendants, he was a servant of sub-contractors and was working alongside the defendants' employees. He had complained to the defendants' charge-hand, who had promised to do the best he could, but who, in fact, did nothing. The defence of volenti ought not to prevail against a workman who has complained, but who thinks it right to get on with his work as best he can and as carefully as he can, especially if there be a promise on behalf of the occupiers to put the matter right or to do "the best I can."

It remains for me to deal with the other ground on which the plaintiff's claim is put. It was said that, as the defendants knew that the staging was to be used by the sub-contractors' men, of whom the plaintiff was one, they were under a duty to him to exercise reasonable care in regard to it. It seems to me that this is a much better way of putting the position than to regard it as merely the case of an invitor and an invitee. There has been much criticism of the words of SIR WILLIAM BRETT, M.R., in Heaven v. Pender (6), where he said (11 Q.B.D. 509):

"The proposition which these recognised cases suggest, and which is, therefore, to be deduced from them, is that whenever one person is by circumstances placed in such a position with regard to another that everyone of ordinary sense who did think would at once recognise that if he did not use ordinary care and skill in his own conduct with regard to those circumstances he would cause danger of injury to the person or property of the other, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill to avoid such danger."

In Donoghue v. Stevenson (7), LORD ATKIN, referring to this passage in the judgment of BRETT, M.R., said ([1932] A.C. 580):

"As framed, it was demonstrably too wide, though it appears to me, if properly limited, to be capable of affording a valuable practical guide . . . You must take reasonable care to avoid acts or omissions which you can reasonably foresee would be likely to injure your neighbour. Who, then, in law is my neighbour? The answer seems to be—persons who are so closely and directly affected by my act that I ought reasonably to have them in contemplation as being so affected when I am directing my mind to the acts or omissions which are called in question. This appears to me to be the doctrine of Heaven v. Pender (6), as laid down by LORD ESHER (then BRETT, M.R.) when it is limited by the notion of proximity introduced by LORD ESHER himself and A. L. SMITH, L.J., in Le Lievre v. Gould (8)."

After citing extracts from those judgments LORD ATKIN continued (ibid., 581):

"I think that this sufficiently states the truth if proximity be not confined to mere physical proximity, but be used, as I think it was intended, to extend to such close and direct relations that the act complained of directly affects a person whom the person alleged to be bound to take care would know would be directly affected by his careless act."

The defendants in the case now before us were the main contractors and they were fully aware of the purposes for which they erected the staging, and, in particular, that it was to be used by sub-contractors' workmen. Applying the words of SIR WILLIAM BRETT, M.R., in Heaven v. Pender (6), as explained and modified by him in Le Lievre v. Gould (8) and by LORD ATKIN in Donoghue v. Stevenson (7), I consider that the defendants were under a duty towards the plaintiff to use ordinary care and skill in the erection of the staging, and they failed in the performance of that duty. The defendants owed to their own workmen a duty to use due care and skill to provide proper plant and appliances. If an accident had occurred to one of their own men through this defective staging, it seems to me that, apart from questions such as contributory negligence, the defendants would have been responsible in damages, and I fail to see why the position should be different in the case of sub-contractors' men, for whose use also the staging was erected by the defendants.

In truth, there would not appear to be a great deal of difference between this aspect of the case and that of invitor and invitee if the view which I have expressed of the rule in Indermaur v. Dames (1) is correct. In Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries), Ltd. v. Dumbreck (9), LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., said of invitees ([1929] A.C. 365) :

“Towards such persons the occupier has the duty of taking reasonable care that the premises are safe.”

A That was a shorter way of expressing the law and it omitted that part of the words of WILLES, J., which indicates what may provide a defence when there is evidence of neglect on the part of the occupier. LYNSEY, J., found that the staging was as described by the plaintiff and his witnesses. The defendants' charge-hand shipwright (Wright) admitted that the staging would be dangerous if it was as they had described it. Another of the defendants' witnesses (Atkinson) agreed that the staging was quite unsafe for welders, and he said that there were complaints every day about the staging. Clearly there was evidence of neglect on the part of the defendants, and I do not see anything in the evidence which can excuse them from liability, unless it can be said that the plaintiff freely and voluntarily undertook the risk. For the reasons I have given, I do not think that that avails the defendants in the circumstances of this case. I would allow the appeal and order that judgment be entered for the plaintiff with damages to be assessed.

C TUCKER, L.J. : This case appears to me to require us to decide a matter which has been much debated by the writers of text books, namely, as to the alleged ambiguity of the rule in Indermaur v. Dames (1). Does that rule require the occupier to take reasonable care to make the premises or structure reasonably safe for the purposes for which the invitee is invited thereto, or is the occupier's duty confined to taking reasonable care to prevent accidents arising from unusual dangers of which he is or ought to be aware, so that, if the danger is known to the injured person as a result of notice or otherwise, he is precluded from recovering ? It does not appear that in the long history of cases concerning inviters and invitees it has ever been necessary to the actual decision to answer this question. There have been numerous dicta either way. In Hillen v. I.C.I. (Alkali), Ltd. (10), SCRUTTON, L.J., referred to the conflict of opinion on the point in these words ([1934] 1 K.B. 465) :

E “It is unnecessary in this case to discuss whether that obligation is to use reasonable care to see that the premises are reasonably safe, as was held by the Court of Appeal in Norman v. Great Western Ry. Co. (2), or merely to give warning of a trap, the generally accepted view of WILLES, J.'s judgment in Indermaur v. Dames (1), as stated by LORD ATKINSON in Cavalier v. Pope (11), and held by the Court of Appeal in Brackley v. Midland Ry. Co. (12). On this point see SALMOND ON TORTS (7th ed.), pp. 462-464, and POLLOCK ON TORTS (13th ed.), p. 533, note (f).”

F He evidently regarded it as open to this court to adopt either view and nothing has occurred subsequently to alter the position.

G In 1929 LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., in Addie (Robert) & Sons (Collieries), Ltd. v. Dumbreck (9), had said ([1929] A.C. 364) :

H “The duty which rests upon the occupier of premises towards the persons who come on such premises differs according to the category into which the visitor falls. The highest duty exists towards those persons who fall into the first category, and who are present by the invitation of the occupier. Towards such persons the occupier has the duty of taking reasonable care that the premises are safe.”

“The first category,” as he had previously indicated, consisted of people who went by invitation, express or implied, of the occupier. Since that date and since the observations of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Hillen's case (10), SLESSER, L.J., in Weigall v. Westminster Hospital (13) cited ([1936] 1 All E.R. 234) the passage from LORD HAILSHAM's speech which I have just read, and SCOTT and GODDARD, L.JJ., in Haseldine v. Daw (14) have stated the duty as follows : SCOTT, L.J., said ([1941] 3 All E.R. 166) :

"On the scope of the occupier's duty to an invitee at common law, there is to-day general agreement, except on one aspect, and, if the plaintiff was an invitee, as I think that he was, the liability of the landlord in the present case to the plaintiff as his invitee turns on that very point. Is it his duty to provide 'reasonably safe premises,' or only to 'take reasonable care' to ensure that his premises shall be safe? The former standard is higher than the latter, 'a limited duty of insurance, as one may call it,' as was said in POLLOCK ON TORTS, 14th ed., p. 406, and, it has been suggested, may involve responsibility for the act of an independent contractor : see WINFIELD ON TORTS, p. 581, note (d). There are some judicial expressions to the former effect, but I do not know of any case where the point has been the ratio decidendi. In Indermaur v. Dames (1), WILLES, J., expressed it as a duty of care only, and I cannot see how, on principle, it can be put any higher."

GODDARD, L.J., used these words (ibid., 181) :

"However, even assuming that the plaintiff is to be regarded as an invitee, I think that his claim... must fail. Towards an invitee the occupier has the duty of taking care that the premises are reasonably safe."

IN HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 23, p. 604, para. 853, where all the authorities are referred to, the law is summarised as follows :

"The duty of the occupier of premises on which the invitee comes, is to take reasonable care that the premises are safe, and to prevent injury to the invitee from unusual dangers which are more or less hidden, of whose existence the occupier is aware or ought to be aware, or, in other words, to have his premises reasonably safe for the use that is to be made of them."

As this way of stating the duty appears to me to be apt to cover all the infinite variations of facts and circumstances which may exist in these cases and to meet the plain requirements of justice, I would be disposed to adopt it as a correct and comprehensive statement of the duty, unless I am compelled by authority to reject it. The only reason to the contrary of which I am aware is that the precise language of WILLES, J., in Indermaur v. Dames (1) has so often been quoted as correctly stating the whole duty that is owed by the invitor in such cases that it may be said to have become part of our law. I venture to think, however, that, as in every other case, the precise language used must be considered in relation to the particular facts which required decision. In that case there was a hole in the floor of the premises [which were used as a sugar-refinery], not due to any defect, but necessary to the operations being carried on on the premises. Before going there, the plaintiff had been cautioned in these terms :

"Now, mind, Indermaur, sugar-houses are very peculiar places : they neither allow candles nor lucifers. We must keep our eyes open. There is a man to go with us with a light. I shall follow the man ; and you keep close to me."

The existence of the hole was well known to the regular employees on the premises, but it was unknown to the plaintiff, who was working for a contractor. To him it was an unusual danger ; to the regular employees it was a familiar feature of the premises. In directing the jury ERLE, C.J., used this language (L.R. 1 C.P. 277) :

"The plaintiff has to establish that there was negligence on the part of the defendant ; that the premises of the defendant, to which he was sent in the

A course of his business as a gas-fitter, were in a dangerous state ; and that, as between himself and the defendant, there was a want of due and proper precaution in respect of the hole in the floor. To my mind, there would not be the least symptom of want of due care as between the defendant and a person [permanently] employed on his premises, because the sugar-baking business requires a lift on the premises, which must be as well known to the persons employed there as the top of a staircase in every dwelling-house. But that which may be no negligence towards men ordinarily employed upon the premises, may be negligence towards strangers lawfully coming upon the premises in the course of their business."

B It was in this connection that WILLES, J., laid down what he stated was at least the duty owed by the inviters. I do not read it as purporting to be a comprehensive statement covering all cases, and I regard it as a good example of the application of the duty to take reasonable care to make the premises reasonably safe, expressed in terms appropriate to the facts of the case.

C It would, I think, be strange and unfortunate if our law allowed an occupier, who has supplied gear or equipment for immediate use by those whom he has invited to his premises without having taken reasonable care to see that such gear or equipment is reasonably safe, to escape liability in whole or in part unless he proves contributory negligence or establishes a plea of volenti non fit injuria. In the present case contributory negligence has not been found and on the facts proved was clearly not established. Volenti non fit injuria was not pleaded, and, although it depends in every case on questions of fact, I am clearly of opinion that the facts proved in the present case went no further than to establish scienter, there being no material distinction between this case and that of master and servant. For these reasons I agree that the appeal succeeds. The observations that I made in Harrison v. National Coal Board (15), with regard to the desirability of the assessment of damages in these cases by the trial judge applies equally in the present case.

E JENKINS, L.J. : I agree with the conclusion at which my Lords have arrived. The degree of care owed by the defendants as inviters to the plaintiff as invitee must obviously be assessed with reference to the circumstances of the particular case. The relevant circumstances, as I understand them, were these. The plaintiff's employers, Thames Welding Co., had contracted with the defendants to do certain welding work on the ship, which the defendants were F re-conditioning as head contractors. The relevant part of this work involved the use of staging, and the contract was entered into on the customary basis that the defendants would provide the requisite staging, and that Thames Welding Co. or its employees would not interfere with the staging so provided, but would report any deficiencies to the defendants' shipwrights for attention. The position, therefore, as regards the welding work in the hold, in the course G of which the plaintiff was injured, was that the staging from which Thames Welding Co.'s employees had to work was provided by the defendants and was under their exclusive control as regards any additions or alterations required to make it adequate for the purpose. I think it follows that, in inviting Thames Welding Co.'s employees (including the plaintiff) into the hold for the purpose of doing the work contracted for from the staging so provided and controlled H by the defendants, the latter assumed a duty towards the former to ensure that the staging was reasonably safe for the purpose for which it was to be used. If one of the planks had been rotten and had broken under the plaintiff, or if the staging had been insecurely supported and had collapsed under him, the plaintiff would clearly have been entitled to recover, both on the narrowest construction of the definition of the duty of inviters to invitees, as stated in Indermaur v. Dames (1) and applied in so many subsequent cases to an almost infinite variety of facts, and also on the principle that a person who provides defective gear for a given purpose is liable to the person for whose use it is provided if the latter sustains injury through the defect, even though the person supplying the gear is not the employer of or otherwise contractually related to the person injured : see Heaven v. Pender (6) (as explained in Donoghue v. Stevenson (7)) and Oliver v. Saddler and Co. (16).

Does it make any difference that the defect actually in question lay, not in any unsoundness or insecurity in the members or construction of the staging, but in its inadequacy in the respects that the four planks provided and the transverse irons on which they rested were so narrow, and the planks were placed so far apart, that anyone attempting to cross, or to pass tools, from one plank to the next was likely sooner or later to slip and fall ? The defendants claim that this does make all the difference. The staging, they say in effect, was plain to see for what it was, and no more and no less dangerous than it actually appeared to be. The danger was obvious, and, if the plaintiff chose to use the staging, he did so at his own risk. I think that this argument involves an undue restriction on the duty owed by the defendants to the plaintiff in the circumstances of the case. It was their business to provide the staging, and, in using it as provided for the purposes of the work contracted for, the plaintiff was doing the very thing they invited him to do. It was also their business (and this I regard as a decisive element in the case) to make good any deficiencies in the staging, which the plaintiff was not entitled to supplement or re-arrange in any way. The staging, to be reasonably safe for the purpose in hand, had to be safe, not merely for a person using reasonable care to walk across or stand on, but for a person using reasonable care to work from and move about on, with his tools and so forth, in the course of welding operations of the kind contracted for. The degree of risk which the use of the staging as provided would be likely to involve in the various situations liable to arise in the course of the work would not be easy to assess in advance. It would, no doubt, have been theoretically possible for the plaintiff to refuse to work from the staging until it had been improved to his satisfaction, but the mere fact that he did not so refuse clearly did not suffice to bring him within the principle of volenti non fit injuria : see Letang v. Ottawa Electric Ry. Co. (4). The defendants must obviously be regarded as having known of the inadequacy of the staging as erected by their own employees, but, quite apart from this, the evidence shows that the plaintiff and his workmates complained to the defendants' employees of its inadequacy and that these complaints were ignored.

The defendants' position, therefore, comes to this. It was their business to provide staging for Thames Welding Co.'s employees to work from. They provided inadequate staging. It was also the defendants' business to make good any deficiencies in the staging. Complaints of the inadequacy of the staging were made to their employees and ignored. The plaintiff, using, in accordance with the defendants' invitation, the only staging which they thought fit to provide, slipped and was injured, without any negligence on his part, owing to the inadequacy of the staging provided. The plaintiff claiming damages, the defendants say in effect : " We are not liable. The accident was your own fault. It is true that the staging we provided and invited you to use was inadequate and that our employees did nothing when complaints about it were made, but, after all, you could have refused to use the staging and stopped work until we provided something better." This position seems to me to be wholly untenable. For these reasons, I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs. Judgment of the court below set aside and judgment entered for the plaintiff for £275 and costs.

Solicitors : Shaen, Roscoe & Co. (for the plaintiff) ; Carpenters (for the defendants).

[Reported by C. ST. J. NICHOLSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re EARL FITZWILLIAM'S AGREEMENT.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), December 13, 14, 15, 21, 1949.]

Death Duty—Estate duty—Property deemed to pass—Annuity purchased from trustees of son's marriage settlement—Liability on annuitant's death—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 2 (1) (c), s. 3 (1)—Finance Act, 1940 (c. 29), s. 44 (1).

A The Finance Act, 1894, s. 2, provides : “ (1) Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say : . . . (c) Property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under s. 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by s. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, if those sections were herein enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property and the words ‘ voluntary ’ and ‘ voluntarily ’ and a reference to a ‘ volunteer ’ were omitted therefrom.”

B The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38, provides : “ (2) The personal or movable property to be included in an account shall be property of the following descriptions, viz. : (a) Any property taken as a donatio mortis causa made by any person dying on or after June 1, 1881, or taken under a voluntary disposition, made by any person so dying, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust or otherwise, which shall not have been bona fide made three months before the death of the deceased.” The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11, provides : “ (1) . . . The description of the property marked (a) shall be read as if the word ‘ twelve ’ were substituted for the words ‘ three ’ therein, and the said description of property shall include property taken under any gift, whenever made, of which property bona fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained, to the entire exclusion of the donor, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise . . . ”

E By a settlement dated Apr. 19, 1933, made on the occasion of M.'s marriage, certain property was settled on discretionary and other trusts under which the whole income could be accumulated for twenty-one years (if M. or his father, F., should so long live) for the ultimate benefit of a class of beneficiaries consisting of the persons, other than F. but including M., capable of succeeding to the property subject to a re-settlement of the same date. On Jan. 30, 1934, the trustees of the settlement made a formal offer to sell to F. an annuity of £50,000 a year for his life for £375,000, which price was to be satisfied by the transfer to the trustees of certain shares in and debentures of limited companies at par value and eleven policies of assurance on F.'s life. The amount of the purchase price, seven and a half years' purchase, was that recommended as appropriate by two actuaries. F. accepted this offer, and on Feb. 14, 1934, the transfer of shares, debentures and policies was effected. It was not suggested that the transaction was other than a bona fide sale for full value in money or money's worth. The trustees paid the annuity to F. up to the date of his death, and also paid the premiums on the policies of assurance. On Feb. 15, 1943, F. died and estate duty was claimed under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), in respect of the property transferred to the trustees on the ground that the Finance Act, 1940, s. 44 (1) (which deals with the purchase of annuities from relatives) prevented the transaction from being treated as a sale within s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1894. The taxpayers argued that s. 2 (1) (c) was inapplicable and that s. 3 (1) and s. 44 (1) were, therefore, not material.

H HELD : the exclusion of the words “ voluntary,” “ voluntarily ” and “ volunteer ” from s. 38 of the Act of 1881 and s. 11 of the Act of 1889 by s. 2 (1) (c) of the Act of 1894 might have had the effect of causing dispositions made in consideration of marriage to fall within the charging provisions (until such transactions were removed from taxation by the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 59 (2)). but it did not charge to duty property which was the subject of a transaction for full value in money or money's worth such as that between F. and the trustees, and, therefore, s. 2 (1) (c) was inapplicable.

Dicta of PALLES, C.B., in A.-G. v. Smyth ([1905] 2 I.R. 553), criticised.
A.-G. v. Clarkson ([1900] 1 Q.B. 156), distinguished.

A

[AS TO PROPERTY DEEMED TO PASS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 13, pp. 234, 237-241, paras. 224, 227-230 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 21, pp. 8, 10-14, Nos. 28, 43-67.]

Cases referred to :

B

(1) A.-G. v. Johnson, [1903] 1 K.B. 617 ; 72 L.J.K.B. 323 ; 88 L.T. 445 ; 67 J.P. 113 ; 21 Digest 12, 55.

(2) A.-G. v. Holden, [1903] 1 K.B. 832 ; 72 L.J.K.B. 420 ; 88 L.T. 729 ; 67 J.P. 135 ; 21 Digest 11, 48.

(3) A.-G. v. Smyth, [1905] 2 I.R. 553 ; 21 Digest 10, h.

(4) H.M. Advocate v. Heywood-Lonsdale's Trustees, (1906). 43 Sc. L.R. 529 ; 21 Digest 10, k.

C

(5) A.-G. for Ontario v. Perry, [1934] A.C. 477 ; 153 L.J.P.C. 145 ; 151 L.T. 405 ; Digest Supp.

(6) A.-G. v. Worrall, [1895] 1 Q.B. 99 ; 64 L.J.Q.B. 141 ; 71 L.T. 807 ; 59 J.P. 467 ; 21 Digest 12, 54.

(7) Ormond Investment Co. v. Betts, [1928] A.C. 143 ; 97 L.J.K.B. 342 ; 138 L.T. 600 ; 13 Tax Cas. 400 ; Digest Supp.

D

(8) A.-G. v. Clarkson, [1900] 1 Q.B. 156 ; 69 L.J.Q.B. 81 ; 81 L.T. 617 ; 21 Digest 45, 288.

(9) A.-G. v. Fairley, [1897] 1 Q.B. 698 ; 66 L.J.Q.B. 454 ; 76 L.T. 526 ; 21 Digest 45, 287.

(10) Canadian Eagle Oil Co., Ltd. v. R., [1945] 2 All E.R. 499 ; [1946] A.C. 119 ; 114 L.J.K.B. 451 ; 173 L.T. 234 ; 27 Tax Cas. 206 ; 2nd Digest Supp.

E

(11) Cape Brandy Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Comrs., [1921] 1 K.B. 64 ; 90 L.J.K.B. 113 ; aff'd., [1921] 2 K.B. 403 ; 90 L.J.K.B. 461 ; 125 L.T. 108 ; 12 Tax Cas. 358 ; Digest Supp.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether on the death on Feb. 15, 1943, of the seventh Earl Fitzwilliam estate duty became leviable under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), incorporating the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38 (2) (a), as amended by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11 (1), in respect of funds which at the date of his death constituted or represented debentures of and shares in companies and policies of assurance which the seventh earl had in 1934 transferred to the plaintiffs (the trustees of his son's, Lord Milton's, marriage settlement) in consideration of the payment by them to him during his life of an annuity of £50,000. DANCKWERTS, J., held that estate duty was not so leviable. The facts appear in the judgment.

F

G

Upjohn, K.C., and N. C. Armitage for the plaintiffs, the trustees of Lord Milton's marriage settlement.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Frank Soskice, K.C.) and J. H. Stamp for the Crown.

H

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21. DANCKWERTS, J., read the following judgment. This is an originating summons taken out for the determination of the validity of a claim by the Inland Revenue Commissioners for estate duty on the occasion of the death of the seventh Earl Fitzwilliam on Feb. 15, 1943, in respect of funds apparently now of the value of over £548,000. The duty is claimed to be leviable by virtue of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), and the transaction which is claimed to have given rise to the claim arose in the following manner.

- In 1933, Earl Fitzwilliam, who was then about sixty-two years of age, wished to supplement his income by the purchase of an annuity, and it was suggested that he might purchase from the trustees of a settlement, dated Apr. 19, 1933, made on the occasion of the marriage of his son, Lord Milton, and known as “the special settlement”, an annuity of £50,000 a year for the sum of £375,000, that is to say, seven and a half years’ purchase, which was the rate recommended as being appropriate by two actuaries. The seventh earl had no beneficial interest under the special settlement, which settled certain capital monies and investments on discretionary and other trusts, under which the whole income could be accumulated for twenty-one years (if the seventh earl or Lord Milton should so long live) for the ultimate benefit of a class of beneficiaries consisting of the persons, other than the seventh earl, capable of succeeding to the property subject to a re-settlement of the Fitzwilliam estate of the same date, Apr. 19, 1933. The seventh earl’s son, Lord Milton, was, of course, within this class of beneficiaries. In pursuance of this suggestion, on Jan. 30, 1934, the trustees of the special settlement made a formal offer to sell to Earl Fitzwilliam an annuity of £50,000 a year for his life for the sum of £375,000, which was to be satisfied by the transfer to the trustees of the following property to which Earl Fitzwilliam was absolutely entitled: £121,534 four per cent. debentures of Earl Fitzwilliam’s collieries company, £88,998 six per cent. preference shares of £1 each in the same company, £61,418 five per cent. preference shares of £1 each in Earl Fitzwilliam’s Wentworth Estates Co., and eleven policies of assurance on the seventh earl’s life which were valued by an actuary at the sum of £103,050. The debentures and shares were to be taken at par value. This offer was accepted by the seventh earl, and the debentures, shares and policies were duly transferred to the trustees, as they acknowledged in writing on Feb. 14, 1934. It is not suggested that this transaction was other than a bona fide sale for full value in money or money’s worth. The trustees duly paid the annuity to the seventh earl down to the date of his death. The trustees also paid the premiums on the policies transferred to them after the date of such transfer down to the date of Earl Fitzwilliam’s death or the maturity of the policies as the case might be. Moneys received on policies that had matured and from a sale of some of the debentures transferred to the trustees were represented at the date of the earl’s death by advances to the eighth earl on mortgage amounting to a total of £86,534.
- On the death of Earl Fitzwilliam on Feb. 15, 1943, estate duty was claimed in respect of the moneys and investments then representing the property which had been transferred to the trustees by the seventh earl in 1934. As I have said, the transaction was a sale for full value, and, having regard to the Finance Act, 1894, s. 3, duty would not have been claimed but for the provisions of the Finance Act, 1940, s. 44, which is in the following terms:
- “(1) Where a person dying after the commencement of this Act has made a disposition of property in favour of a relative of his, the creation or disposition in favour of the deceased of an annuity or other interest limited to cease on the death of the deceased or of any other person shall not be treated for the purposes of s. 3, or of s. 7 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, as consideration for the disposition made by the deceased.”
- The disposition in the present case was, of course, in favour of the trustees of the special settlement, but, as Lord Milton was one of the beneficiaries under the settlement, it is admitted that in substance it was a disposition in favour of a relative of the seventh earl. It is, however, contended that the transaction did not fall within the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), and that neither s. 3 of that Act, nor s. 44 of the Act of 1940 are material.
- The Finance Act, 1894, substantially inaugurated a new scheme of taxation on death, but this Act incorporated certain provisions relating to the former account duty, and it is with these provisions (as altered by the Act of 1894) that this case is concerned. The Finance Act, 1894, s. 2, provides :

" (1) Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say :... (c) Property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under s. 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by s. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, if those sections were herein enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property, and the words 'voluntary' and 'voluntarily' and a reference to a 'volunteer' were omitted therefrom . . . "

It is necessary, therefore, to turn to the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38, which, after providing for a stamp duty to be charged and paid on accounts therein mentioned, provides :

" (2) The personal or moveable property to be included in an account shall be property of the following descriptions, viz. :—(a) Any property taken as a donatio mortis causa made by any person dying on or after June 1, 1881, or taken under a voluntary disposition, made by any person so dying, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust or otherwise, which shall not have been bona fide made three months before the death of the deceased. (b) Any property which a person dying on or after such day having been absolutely entitled thereto, has voluntarily caused or may voluntarily cause to be transferred to or vested in himself and any other person jointly whether by disposition or otherwise, so that the beneficial interest therein or in some part thereof passes or accrues by survivorship on his death to such other person. (c) Any property passing under any past or future voluntary settlement made by any person dying on or after such day by deed or any other instrument not taking effect as a will, whereby an interest in such property for life or any other period determinable by reference to death is reserved either expressly or by implication to the settlor, or whereby the settlor may have reserved to himself the right, by the exercise of any power, to restore to himself, or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property."

The period of three months mentioned in para. (a) has, of course, been extended successively to twelve months, three years, and (since Earl Fitzwilliam's death) to five years, but these periods are not material for the purposes of the present case. I have read the whole of sub-s. (2) because arguments were founded on the various provisions contained in it.

That section was amended by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11, which (so far as directly material) is in the following terms :

" . . . The description of property marked (a) shall be read as if the word 'twelve' were substituted for the word 'three' therein, and the said description of property shall include property taken under any gift, whenever made, of which property bona fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained, to the entire exclusion of the donor, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise . . . "

It is by reason of this provision, as re-enacted in the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2, that duty is claimed in the present case. The word "voluntarily" or "voluntary" does not appear in the provision, but the words "gift" and "donee" and "donor" appear in it, and as originally enacted there seems to be no reason to attribute to this statutory provision any intention to include transactions for value. But the contention of the Inland Revenue Commissioners is that by reason of the removal of the words "voluntary" "voluntarily" and "volunteer" by the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), from the former provisions of the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts, 1881 and 1889, transactions for value, even though sales for full monetary consideration, are now included in those provisions, as re-enacted by the Finance Act, 1894. If it was the intention of the legislature to make such a striking change as to include sales for full monetary value in the former provisions relating to gifts, it certainly seems that an odd method of carrying out such a change was adopted. So long as the provisions were dealing with gifts and purely voluntary transactions, the words "gift," "donor" and "donee" were the natural words to use and were entirely logical.

- A It seems to me that it would have been perfectly simple (if it were desired to include sales) to have substituted the word "assurance" for "gift" and "grantor" and "grantee" or "transferor" and "transferee" for the words "donor" and "donee." It is contended, however, on behalf of the commissioners, that such changes were unnecessary, because the words "gift" and "donor" and "donee" are words of more than one meaning and often
- B have reference simply to transfers, and I was referred to SHEPPARD'S TOUCHSTONE, 8th edn., vol. 1, p. 227. It is said that the materiality of the words "purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos" in the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38 (2) (a), is simply to show that the reference is to a transaction operating at once, and it is urged that this meaning must be the correct one as otherwise transactions which pretended to be something
- C other than a gift would not be caught by what is the evident intention of the section.

The case has been very fully and carefully argued, and I am very much indebted to counsel for their research and assistance. There does not appear to be any decided case directly holding that a sale for full value in money is within the provisions in question, but I was referred to a number of cases which were said

- D to have a bearing on the point and to a number of other provisions in the statutes relating to estate duty which were alleged to assist me in arriving at the true interpretation of these particular statutory provisions. In A.-G. v. Johnson (1) the deceased had paid a sum of £500 to a charity in lieu of a legacy on terms that the charity should pay to him £25 a year for life and to his wife £25 a year for her life after his death. It was held by the Court of Appeal that estate duty
- E was payable on the whole sum of £500 although the commercial value of the annuity of £25 was £210. It is plain that the transaction was treated not as a sale at all but as in substance a gift. For this reason the Court of Appeal rejected the contention that £210 should be deducted from the value of the property as a partial consideration for the transaction. As VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said ([1903] 1 K.B. 625): . . . "it was intended not to be a matter of pure business
- F but one of bounty." In A.-G. v. Holden (2), the respective fathers of the bride and bridegroom agreed to make settlements on their children on the occasion of those persons' marriage, and the sums so provided were held to be subject to estate duty. This was quite clearly a contract by the two fathers to make gifts, and gifts were, therefore, involved. I have no difficulty in seeing that when the word "voluntary" was removed from the statutory provisions these gifts
- G were clearly within their ambit.

The next case is A.-G. v. Smyth (3), in the King's Bench Division of Ireland, before PALLES, C.B., JOHNSON and JOBSON, JJ. It is technically not binding on me, but I should naturally attribute the greatest importance to a decision of that court on a point which I have to consider and decide, particularly having regard to the great reputation of PALLES, C.B., who delivered the reasoned

H judgment in that case. I think it is on this case that the commissioners principally rely. The question for determination, as stated by PALLES, C.B., was whether estate duty was payable on the death of a settlor on property included in an ante-nuptial settlement by him within twelve months before his death, on the marriage of his son, which settlement did not reserve to him an estate for life or for any period determinable by reference to his death, but for which there was no consideration in money or money's worth. The court held that estate duty was payable. PALLES, C.B., delivered a judgment in which he discussed the effect of the changes made by the Finance Act, 1894, at some length and supplied a number of the arguments which were used on behalf of the commissioners in the present case. The decision, of course, only deals directly with a case where a settlement is effected in consideration of marriage and has no direct bearing on a sale for full monetary consideration, but a wider field was covered by PALLES, C.B., in his judgment. With all due respect to the learned Chief Baron, the reasons which he gives for rejecting the arguments of the defendants as to the effect of the removal of the word "voluntary" do not seem to me convincing. A

It may well be that the result which he reached on the facts of the case was perfectly correct, but, if the word "gift" in the re-enacted provision be still regarded as something different from "sale," it does not follow that after the exclusion of the word "voluntary" the provision has the same meaning as before the Act of 1894 so that the change is nugatory. B
It seems to me that the effect of the change might be to bring in dispositions made in consideration of marriage (as in A.-G. v. Holden (2)) until such dispositions were removed from taxation under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), by the Finance (1909-1910) Act, 1910, s. 59 (2), which section, in fact, refers to "gifts" which are made in consideration of marriage or are proved to be part of the normal expenditure of the deceased. C
Secondly, it seems to me that the argument that regard must be had to the history of the statutory provisions may well operate in exactly the opposite way from that suggested by PALLES, C.B. If the history of the statutes shows that the word "gift" had a clear and sensible meaning in the statute as originally passed, why should one assume that a violent change has been caused to that word by the omission of the word "voluntary" alone? D
It also seems to me that there is no real basis for the subtle and scientific analysis on which PALLES, C.B., bases much of his explanation of the provisions in question. These provisions seem to me to have no more scientific basis than a desire to prevent evasion by a tax-payer of the duties which would otherwise be leviable on property devolving on his death by means of a few obvious devices. And, lastly, the theory propounded by PALLES, C.B., seems to me to be at variance with the view of the English Court of Appeal in A.-G. v. Johnson (1). E

However, the judgment of PALLES, C.B., has received approval, and, indeed, praise, from LORD DUNEDIN in H.M. Advocate v. Heywood-Lonsdale's Trustees (4). It seems to me, however, that this approval may have been somewhat uncritical as the court had, without assistance from A.-G. v. Smyth (3), already reached the conclusion that the judgment of the lord ordinary should be affirmed. This was another case of a transaction which was not in any sense a commercial transaction for monetary value, but a transaction operating under a marriage contract, to which it seems obvious different considerations would apply. F
Finally, it is said that A.-G. v. Smyth (3) received the approval of the Privy Council in a judgment delivered by LORD BLANESBURGH in A.-G. for Ontario v. Perry (5). In this case it was, in fact, held by the Privy Council that the reasoning of A.-G. v. Smyth (3) did not apply to the statute of Ontario which was in question. This result must in itself diminish the force of the approval. Furthermore, the approval given by LORD BLANESBURGH to the judgment of PALLES, C.B. (though described by him as "the leading authority on the subject") must have been of a limited character as LORD BLANESBURGH thought that a contract by a husband to settle property on his wife in consideration of her marriage to him was not within the terms of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c). G
LORD BLANESBURGH's view is, it seems to me, more clearly indicated by the following passage ([1934] A.C. 486) : H

"Their Lordships cannot leave the consideration of the Finance Acts without referring to a series of decisions under what may be regarded as the third limb of [s. 38 (2) (a)] of the Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by s. 11 of the Act of 1889. A reference to that limb of the subsection supra, shows that the gift therein being dealt with need not be preceded by a 'disposition,' but that the words following seem to contemplate that there may be within their meaning a gift, although accompanied by some benefit to the donor by contract. On that part of the section it has been held that a gift does not cease to be a gift although there is some consideration for it received by the donor: a gift, it has been said, may be something which is not 'a pure and simple gift.' A.-G. v. Worral (6) and A.-G. v. Johnson (1) may be cited as typical; and see A.-G. v. Holden (2)."

- A In referring to s. 38 (2) (a) in the above quotation I have corrected the mistaken reference to s. 38 (1) (9). LORD BLANESBURGH's language is quite inconsistent with the proposition that the word "gift" is to be treated as equivalent to "assurance" or "transfer" so as to include transactions for full monetary consideration.
- B I now turn to the consideration of certain statutory provisions which, it was argued, show that sales for full monetary consideration must be within the terms of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c). Section 3 of the same Act, which exempts from duty transactions "for full consideration in money or money's worth" (and which was amended by the Finance Act, 1940, s. 44), is the first of these, and was relied on by PALLES, C.B., it seems, to support his theory of the purposes of the Act. It seems to me, however, that s. 3 could have been intended, and on its face clearly was intended, to meet other cases than those that might fall within s. 2 (1) (c). It is to be observed, moreover, that the words of the section are that estate duty shall not be payable in respect of property passing on the death of the deceased "by reason only of a bona fide purchase." The reason advanced on behalf of the commissioners for the insertion of these words did not seem to me to be clear. It is evident that the words must contemplate some additional factor, and the section cannot apply unless the case would otherwise be within the charging provisions of the Act. It was contended on behalf of the commissioners that, if the provisions of an earlier statute are doubtful, that is to say, the provisions are "fairly and equally open to diverse meanings," it is permissible to look at a later statute in order to ascertain the meaning of the earlier statute, and especially so if the later statute declares the meaning of the earlier. As authority for this proposition I was referred to Ormond Investment Co. v. Betts (7) ([1928] A.C. 154-156 and 164-166). It was argued that certain statutory provisions subsequent to the Finance Act, 1894, and in one instance subsequent to the date of the seventh Earl Fitzwilliam's death, indicate that the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), must have the meaning attributed to it by the commissioners, that is to say, that transactions for full monetary consideration are subject to estate duty. These statutory provisions are the Finance Act, 1940, s. 44 (to which reference has already been made), the Finance Act, 1939, s. 31 (1), and the Finance Act, 1944, s. 38. Of course, none of these sections deals expressly with the interpretation of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), or the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts, 1881 and 1889, but it is argued that the inevitable deduction from their provisions is that the earlier provisions include sales for full value. Such a deduction does not seem to me to be by any means inevitable, and the sections appear to be equally capable of reference to other matters.
- G

- H Furthermore, it is said (and I think that this is really a development of the same point) that where the provisions of an earlier statute have been interpreted by the courts and then that interpretation has been incorporated in a later statute, it is no longer open to argument that the true interpretation of the earlier Act is otherwise. The authority for this proposition is A.-G. v. Clarkson (8). This dealt with a situation which was caused by the decision in A.-G. v. Fairley (9), in which it was held that estate duty was payable on property contingently settled, though the contingency might not in fact arise. As this was thought to be unfair, it was provided by the Finance Act, 1898, s. 14, that, if it was shown that the contingency had not arisen and could never arise, the duty which had been levied should be repaid. Then, in A.-G. v. Clarkson (8) a similar question to that decided in A.-G. v. Fairley (9) arose, and though the court felt doubt as to the true construction of the earlier statutory provision, the construction adopted in A.-G. v. Fairley (9) was followed in view of the statutory recognition given by the Finance Act, 1898, s. 14. This rule is referred to in Ormond Investment Co. v. Betts (7) ([1928] A.C. 155). It is to be observed that this rule was applied when the legislature was indisputably referring to the construction put on the earlier statutory provision and precisely providing for the situation which had thus arisen. In the present case the contention appears to be that the sections of the later Acts to which I have referred must be taken to have adopted, not merely the decision of the Irish King's Bench Division in A.-G. v. Smyth (3), but also the reasoning of PALLES, C.B., in his long judgment in that case. It seems to me that it is quite impossible to make any such deduction from the complicated and, in some respects, obscure sections in question. A

Stress was laid on the wide ambit of the Finance Act, 1894, which sought to bring into the area of taxation on death all property, real and personal, wherever situate, so that property must be said to be subject to duty unless an exemption can be found in the Act. That may be true in respect of property passing within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1. It cannot be true in regard to s. 2 of the Act. By the latter section a number of cases are brought artificially within the ambit of the Act so that property is deemed to pass. For the purposes of cases falling or claimed to fall within s. 2, therefore, it seems to me that a charge for duty must not be assumed prima facie to exist, but must be found to be created by the terms of the Act. Finally, it must not be forgotten that the provisions I have to construe are contained in a taxing statute. The rules to be applied to such a statute are well known, but it is worth while to refer to the statement by VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C. ([1945] 2 All E.R. 506) in Canadian Eagle Oil Co. v. R. (10) where he said : B

"The late ROWLATT, J., whose outstanding knowledge of this subject was coupled with a happy conciseness of phrase, said in Cape Brandy Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (11) ([1921] 1 K.B. 71): 'In a taxing Act one has to look merely at what is clearly said. There is no room for any intendment. There is no equity about a tax. There is no presumption as to a tax. Nothing is to be read in, nothing is to be implied. One can only look fairly at the language used.' C

In the present case the one thing which is clear is that the statutory provisions which are said to impose liability are obscure. I am asked to give a construction to these provisions which is beyond anything decided by any of the courts that have had to deal with the provisions in question, by reason of judicial statements which were purely obiter and were in no way, as it seems to me, necessary to the decisions in question. The application of these statements in the manner now contended for would carry the burden of taxation imposed in 1894 far beyond the subject-matter of the cases in which they occur. After all, the Finance Act, 1894, was an Act inaugurating a new scheme of taxation, and the complications of the sections added from time to time to deal with methods of evasion of duty which were discovered as the burden of death duties was made heavier were probably never anticipated at the date when that Act was passed. I do not think it would be right for me to attribute to the draftsman of the Finance Act, 1894, an intention to impose on the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts, 1881 and 1889, the far-reaching change for which the commissioners now contend, and I certainly cannot find in those statutory provisions words clearly imposing tax in the circumstances of the present case. D

Order accordingly. Inland Revenue Commissioners to pay the plaintiff's costs. E

Solicitors : Warren, Murton & Co., agents for Newman & Bond, Barnsley (for the plaintiffs) ; Solicitor of Inland Revenue. F

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.] G

H

Re WALLACH (deceased). WEINSCHENK v. TREASURY
SOLICITOR (WALLACH intervening).

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Hodson, J.), December 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 1949.]

Domicil—Widow—Retention of domicil of husband.

A In 1906 the intestate, a woman, married E.W. whose domicil of origin was German. In 1943 E.W. died in England where he had been living since 1939. Five days after her husband's death the intestate died. On the trial of an issue to determine the domicil of the deceased, the learned judge found as a fact that E.W. had acquired a domicil of choice in England.

B HELD : a widow retains her late husband's last domicil until she changes it, and, therefore, the intestate's domicil was English.

[AS TO THE DOMICIL OF A MARRIED WOMAN, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 6, pp. 209, 210, para. 255 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 11, pp. 332-334, Nos. 211-228.]

C AS TO INTESTATE SUCCESSION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 6, pp. 245, 246, para. 299 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 11, pp. 367-369, Nos. 468-491.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Gout v. Zimmermann, (1847), 5 Notes of Cases, 440 ; 9 L.T.O.S. 412 ; 11 Digest 332, 212.
- (2) In the Goods of Raffeneil, (1863), 3 Sw. & Tr. 49 ; 1 New Rep. 569 ; 32 L.J.P.M. & A. 203 ; 8 L.T. 211 ; 11 Digest 331, 192.
- (3) Udny v. Udny, (1869), L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. 441 ; 11 Digest 309, 19.

ACTION to determine domicil.

E The plaintiff claimed as the lawful second cousin of the deceased, Mrs. Lucie Wallach, who died intestate in England on July 21, 1943, to be entitled to share in the estate of the deceased in accordance with the law of France or, alternatively, Germany. In 1906 the deceased, who was born in France, married Eugene Wallach whose domicil of origin was German and at the time of the marriage was carrying on business in France. In 1939 the husband came to England where he lived with the deceased until his death in 1943, shortly before that of his wife. For the Treasury it was claimed that the deceased on marriage F acquired the domicil of her husband which she retained after his death until she changed it. HODSON, J., upheld this contention, found that the husband had acquired a domicil in England, and that the Treasury Solicitor was the only person entitled to succeed to the estate of the deceased.

Raeburn, K.C., and ~~Graveson~~<sup>t</sup> for the plaintiff.

G Geoffrey Cross, K.C., and J. Stirling for the Treasury Solicitor.
Pennycuik, K.C., and Michael Browne for the intervener.

H HODSON, J. : In this action, which concerns the estate of Mrs. Lucie Wallach, who died on July 21, 1943, the plaintiff claims to be the lawful second cousin of the deceased, who died domiciled in France or, alternatively, Germany, and, as such, to be one of the persons entitled in accordance with the law of France or Germany to share in her estate. The plaintiff denies that the Treasury Solicitor, the defendant, has an interest in the estate. The Treasury Solicitor, by his defence, denies the allegations as to domicil and the interest of the plaintiff and alleges that the deceased died intestate and domiciled in England, without leaving anyone entitled, by virtue of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 46 (1), to share in her estate, so that the Treasury Solicitor is the only person entitled to succeed to it. On these pleadings an issue was directed to be tried as to the domicil of the deceased.

The deceased, having been a married woman until five days before her death and being then a widow, according to the accepted principles of English law retains her late husband's domicile until she changes it: see DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., p. 111, which contains the following rule :

"A widow retains her late husband's last domicile until she changes it."

Counsel for the plaintiff, who has argued that this rule is wrong, referred me to a case in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, Gout v. Zimmermann (1), the head-note to which reads (5 Notes of Cases 440) :

"A testatrix, born at Smyrna, of Dutch or Russian parents there residing, under the protection of the Dutch consulate at Smyrna, married to a British subject, and, after his death, continuing to reside during the remainder of her life in the Levant, makes a will, disposing of property in England, in the English form : Held, that her British domicile acquired by marriage had not been changed, nor had her domicile of birth reverted, and the protest to the jurisdiction of the court overruled."

The proposition advanced by counsel is that the domicile which a woman acquires by marrying a man is a sort of mantle which she wears during her coverture and during her coverture only, and that when she becomes a widow she reverts automatically to her domicile of origin. That proposition was not advanced in Gout v. Zimmermann (1) or in another case to which I was referred, namely, In the Goods of Raffanel (2), where it was assumed that the rule which I have mentioned applied without any argument to the contrary being put forward. The proposition that the domicile which a married woman takes from her husband can be dropped in that way is based by counsel for the plaintiff on the use of the word "dependent," which is used in this connection, because her domicile is said to be dependent on that of her husband, and counsel argues that when a woman's husband dies there is no reason why she should not shed her domicile with her coverture and no binding authority that she does not do so.

Counsel for the Treasury Solicitor, on the other hand, pointed out that the proposition has been universally accepted as one of the principles of English law for a long time and it would lead to manifest inconvenience if the contrary were to be established as the law because this form of dependent domicile applies equally to infants. Counsel instanced a case of commorientes where, for example, a woman, although, apparently, dying at the same moment as her older husband, is deemed by the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 184, to have survived him. She, having had no opportunity of changing her domicile after his death, would be deemed, if the proposition of counsel for the plaintiff were correct, to revert automatically to her domicile of origin which might entail a most troublesome enquiry.

The speeches delivered in the House of Lords in Udny v. Udny (3) all point against the validity of the proposition of counsel for the plaintiff—in particular, that of LORD WESTBURY where he used this language (L.R. Sc. & Div. 457) :

"Other domicils, including domicile by operation of law, as on marriage, are domicils of choice."

He, therefore, included the domicile which counsel for the plaintiff prefers to call a dependent domicile under the heading of domicile of choice and that seems to me to be the appropriate heading under which to put it because when a woman marries a man she exercises a choice in the marriage and takes the consequence of that choice which in law involves the acquisition of his domicile. There is no reason why, if it is a domicile of choice, it should be lost in a way different from that in which any other domicile of choice can be lost, namely, by abandonment.

Having arrived at this conclusion, I need not consider in detail the question of the domicile of origin of Mrs. Lucie Wallach herself. The domicil I have to consider is the domicil of Mr. Eugene Wallach, her husband, to whom she was married in 1906 in Frankfurt, Germany. His domicil of origin was German, he having been born in 1874 in Kassel. [His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and concluded :]—I find that he acquired a domicil of choice in this country which existed at the time of his death. The issue, therefore, falls to be determined in favour of the Treasury Solicitor as to the English domicil and it is unnecessary to make any further finding.

Solicitors : Alexander Rubens & Co. (for the plaintiff) ; Treasury Solicitor (for the Treasury) ; Norden & Co. (for the intervener).

[Reported by R. HENDRY WHITE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

G. W. GRACE AND CO., LTD. v. GENERAL STEAM NAVIGATION CO., LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), December 12, 13, 14, 15, 21, 1949.]

Shipping—Charterparty—"Good and safe port"—Ship damaged by ice—Extraordinary risk—Liability of charterers.

On Jan. 10, 1947, the Sussex Oak, being then in the Thames under time charter in the Baltimore form, was ordered by the charterers to load a cargo of flour for Hamburg. On the voyage to Hamburg, she sustained damage by ice in the River Elbe. The charterparty provided by cl. 2 that the vessel was "to be employed . . . between good and safe ports," and by cl. 15 that the vessel was not to be ordered to any ice-bound place or where there was a risk that ordinarily the vessel would not be able, on account of ice, to reach the place or to get out. The arbitrator found that Hamburg was not a good and safe port for the Sussex Oak at any time between Jan. 5 and mid-March and that, owing to the exceptionally severe weather, there was an extraordinary risk in a voyage to the port, and he made an award against the charterers. There was no finding that when the Sussex Oak was in the Elbe the ice dangers were considered likely to be more than temporary.

HELD : (i) on the facts found by the arbitrator, Hamburg was a port which the Sussex Oak could not safely reach, the voyage to Hamburg was not one which an ordinarily prudent and skilful master could find a way of making in safety, and there had, therefore, been a breach of cl. 2.

Palace Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Gans S.S. Line ([1916] 1 K.B. 138), applied.

(ii) the application of the general words of cl. 2 was not affected by the specific words of cl. 15, the only object of which was to make special and detailed provision for matters which the parties thought were of special importance.

(iii) Hamburg having been found to have been in fact unsafe, it was irrelevant that at the time well-informed men might erroneously have pronounced it to be safe, because the shipowners' right to damages depended on a wrong done and an injury actually sustained and not on an estimate whether a wrong was likely to be done or an injury likely to be sustained.

(iv) it having been conceded that the charterparty, on its true construction or by implication, forbade the giving by the charterers of orders outside their powers, the order to sail to an unsafe port was a breach of the charterparty, and, as the master had acted in the ordinary course of things and not blameworthily, there was nothing to break the chain of causation between the order given by the charterers and the damage, and the charterers were, therefore, liable.

Dictum of BRANSON, J., in West (Samuel), Ltd. v. Wright's (Colchester), Ltd., (1935), (40 Com. Cas. 192), criticised.

Lensen Steamship Co. v. Anglo-Soviet Steamship Co. (1935) (52 Ll.L. Rep. 141), followed.

[AS TO WHAT IS A SAFE PORT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 30, pp. 516-519, paras. 669, 670 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 41, pp. 521-523, Nos. 3497-3517.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Palace Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Gans S.S. Line, [1916] 1 K.B. 138 ; 85 L.J.K.B. 415 ; 115 L.T. 414 ; 41 Digest 522, 3503.
- (2) Johnston Brothers v. Saxon Queen S.S. Co., (1913), 108 L.T. 564 ; 41 Digest 523, 3516.
- (3) Royal Greek Government v. Minister of Transport (unreported).
- (4) S.S. Knutsford, Ltd. v. Tillmans & Co., [1908] A.C. 406 ; 77 L.J.K.B. 977 ; 99 L.T. 399 ; 41 Digest 522, 3504.
- (5) Embiricos v. Reid (Sydney) & Co., [1914] 3 K.B. 45 ; 83 L.J.K.B. 1348 ; 111 L.T. 291 ; 41 Digest 409, 2548.
- (6) Limerick S.S. Co. v. Stott, [1921] 2 K.B. 613 ; 90 L.J.K.B. 865 ; 125 L.T. 516 ; affmg. [1921] 1 K.B. 568 ; 41 Digest 521, 3496.
- (7) West (Samuel), Ltd. v. Wright's (Colchester), Ltd., (1935), 40 Com. Cas. 186 ; Digest Supp.
- (8) The Pass of Leny, (1936), 155 L.T. 421 ; Digest Supp.
- (9) Hall Brothers S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Paul (R. & W.), Ltd., (1914), 111 L.T. 811 ; 41 Digest 523, 3515.
- (10) Axel Brostrom & Son v. Louis Dreyfus & Co., (1932), 38 Com. Cas. 79 ; Digest Supp.
- (11) Lensen Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Anglo-Soviet Shipping Co., Ltd., (1934), 50 Ll.L. Rep. 62 ; affmd. (1935) 52 Ll.L. Rep. 141 ; 40 Com. Cas. 320 ; Digest Supp.
- (12) Vsesojuznoje Objedihenii Sovfracht v. Temple S.S. Co., Ltd., (1945), 173 L.T. 373 ; 79 Ll.L. Rep. 1 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (13) Portsmouth Steamship Co. v. Liverpool Salvage Co., (1929), 34 Ll.L. Rep. 459.
- (14) Summers v. Salford Corpn., [1943] 1 All E.R. 68 ; [1943] A.C. 283 ; 112 L.J.K.B. 65 ; 168 L.T. 97 ; 107 J.P. 35 ; 2nd Digest Supp.

SPECIAL CASE stated by an arbitrator.

In January, 1947, the claimants were the owners of a vessel which suffered damage from ice in the River Elbe while on a voyage to Hamburg, and they claimed damages from the charterers on the ground that the charterers, in breach of cl. 2 of the charterparty, had ordered the vessel to make the voyage at a time when Hamburg was an unsafe port. The arbitrator found that at the time Hamburg was an unsafe port by reason of ice and that the charterers were liable for the damage sustained by the vessel, subject to the decision of the court on the Special Case. The charterers contended that a port was not unsafe by reason only of the fact that ice dangers were encountered on the way to it ; that the sole remedy for dangers from ice lay in cl. 15, which provided that the vessel was not to be ordered to an ice-bound place or one which ordinarily might not be reached on account of ice ; that the absence of safety was temporary only ; that there was no evidence to support the finding that the port was unsafe ; that the only result which could flow from an order to sail to an unsafe port was that the master was at liberty to refuse to go ; and that the damage was caused solely by the master's voluntary act in taking the navigational decision to proceed up river. DEVLIN, J., found for the shipowners on all points. The facts appear in the judgment.

Roskill, K.C., and B. S. Eckersley for the claimants.

R. M. Wilson for the charterers.

Dec. 21. DEVLIN, J., read the following judgment. The facts stated in this Special Case show that the Sussex Oak, being then in the Thames and under time charter in the Baltimore form, was, on Jan. 10, 1947, ordered by the charterers to load a cargo of flour for Hamburg. After her arrival there, she was ordered by the charterers to load a cargo of timber for London. On the voyage to and from Hamburg, she sustained damage by ice in the River Elbe. The charterparty

A contained the usual provision in cl. 2 that the vessel was "to be employed . . . between good and safe ports." The arbitrator has found that Hamburg was not a good and safe port for the Sussex Oak to reach or leave at any time during her service under the charterparty after Jan. 5 or at any time before the middle of March and that its approaches were not good and safe places during that time. Subject to the decision of the court, he has awarded that the charterers are

B liable to pay for the damage sustained by the vessel, and he has left to the court the question whether, on the facts found by him and the true construction of the charterparty, the charterers are so liable. Slightly different considerations apply to the two voyages, and I take the voyage up to Hamburg first. Counsel for the charterers has formulated six points of law for determination by the court and I shall take them in the order in which they were advanced.

C Counsel submits, first, that a port is not unsafe because ice dangers are encountered on the way to it. In my judgment, there is a breach of cl. 2 if the vessel is employed on a voyage to a port which she cannot safely reach. It is immaterial in point of law where the danger is located, though it is obvious in point of fact that the more remote it is from the port the less likely it is to interfere with the safety of the voyage. The charterer does not guarantee that

D the most direct route or any particular route to the port is safe, but the voyage he orders must be one which an ordinarily prudent and skilful master can find a way of making in safety. In the present case the only route to Hamburg was by the Elbe, and the arbitrator has found that this approach was unsafe by reason of ice. The view of the law which I have expressed is supported by the authority of Palace Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Gans S.S. Line (1), and, so far as it

E rests on that authority, is not challenged by the charterers, but it is contended that the principle, which SANKEY, J., there applied to military or naval dangers likely to be encountered on the voyage, does not apply to marine dangers, for these the master is appointed to deal with. I cannot see any distinction in principle here. The reasoning, if it is sound, should apply with equal force to marine dangers within the area of a port, but dangers from wind and weather

F can make a port unsafe: see Johnston Brothers v. Saxon Queen S.S. Co. (2). It is true that a master is better equipped than a landsman to deal with marine perils, and, doubtless, better equipped to deal with marine perils than with naval perils. That is a consideration which is relevant as a matter of fact when the degree of danger is being determined. Likewise, the ordinary sea perils, such as heavy weather or storm, will not usually last long enough to make the

G port or the route to it more than temporarily unsafe. That gives rise to another point which I consider later, but I see no reason why dangers which can be classified as marine—and I suppose that that includes ice—should be disregarded altogether in determining the safety of a port or voyage.

Next, it is contended that cl. 2 does not apply at all, because its general provisions are, in relation to ice dangers, ousted by the specific provisions of cl. 15, which gives an exclusive remedy for such dangers. Clause 15 provides that the vessel is not to be ordered to any ice-bound place or where there is a risk that ordinarily the vessel will not be able, on account of ice, to reach the place or to get out. On this clause the arbitrator has found in the charterers' favour. The wide provisions of cl. 2, it is argued, must not be extended to prohibit what is impliedly permitted (since it is not expressly prohibited) by the specific provisions of cl. 15. In a very recent case, Royal Greek Government v. Minister of Transport (3), I pointed out what seemed to me to be some of the general objections to this type of argument in relation to charterparties, and I shall not repeat them here. In this particular case the argument can, I think, be sufficiently tested by considering what, if it is sound, is impliedly permitted by cl. 15. In the finding of the arbitrator that there was no risk that ordinarily the vessel would not be able, on account of ice, to reach Hamburg, the significant word is "ordinarily." The case as a whole makes it abundantly clear that in January, 1947, there was such a risk, and it is also clear, I think, from what he says in the Case about the exceptional severity of the period, that the arbitrator regarded the risk as extraordinary. The alleged implication would, therefore, result in the charterers having the right to insist that the ship should go to a port which ex hypothesi was unsafe because the danger that made it unsafe was extraordinary instead of ordinary. I cannot think that such a result was intended. Commercial men like to make special and detailed provision for matters they think of special importance. That, in my judgment, is all that cl. 15 is doing.

Thirdly, it is contended that the condition of unsafety was temporary only. It is the law that the danger must be operative for a period which, having regard to the nature of the adventure and of the contract, would involve inordinate delay : see, in particular, S.S. Knutsford, Ltd. v. Tillmanns & Co. (4). This raises primarily a question of fact. The arbitrator notes in the Case the charterers' contention that the obstacle was temporary only and must be taken by his finding to have decided it against them. The period of the ice danger compared with the duration of the charterparty and the shortness of the voyage to Hamburg clearly justifies this conclusion. Indeed, it is not, I think, directly challenged, but it is said that the arbitrator acted on a wrong basis. The question of safety it is argued, must be determined at the time when the master has to make his decision to proceed. It must, therefore, be determined on the estimate of the position which would be reached at that time by a well-informed and experienced master, and a decision based on such an estimate will not be affected by the fact that, in the light of after-events, it is proved to be erroneous. There is in the Special Case no finding that, on Jan. 14, when the Sussex Oak was in the Elbe, the ice dangers were then considered likely to be more than temporary. Indeed, there is no finding that at that point of time the port or its approaches were then considered to be unsafe. The only evidence that there is points, it is said, the other way, for it consists of the views of the river pilots who thought it safe to proceed.

This leads to the fourth contention of the charterers, that there was no evidence to support the finding that the port was unsafe, and I can conveniently consider these two contentions together. The argument is, I think, mistaken. I am not here dealing with the decision of the master not to proceed. I am dealing with the fact that the master, whether advisedly or not, did proceed, and thereby the ship was damaged. If I was dealing with a decision and its validity, it might well be that the test propounded is the right one. Johnston Brothers v. Saxon Queen S.S. Co. (2), on which counsel for the charterers relied for this purpose, suggests that view. This is an illustration of a principle of wide application in commercial affairs, best expounded in the well-known passage from the judgment of SCRUTTON, J., in Embiricos v. Reid (Sydney) & Co. (5) ([1914] 3 K.B. 54) :

"Commercial men must not be asked to wait till the end of a long delay to find out from what in fact happens whether they are bound by a contract or not ; they must be entitled to act on reasonable commercial probabilities at the time when they are called upon to make up their minds."

That principle is at least as old as the conception of constructive total loss, but it is a principle to be applied with discrimination. It involves the court in proceeding on an erroneous estimate of the facts and probabilities, for, if the estimate is not erroneous, no point arises. That course can be taken only when it serves the important commercial purpose indicated by SCRUTTON, J. When a claim for damages is being considered, the event has happened and need no longer be forecast. The right to damages depends on a wrong done and an injury actually sustained, not on someone's estimate of whether a wrong is likely to be done or an injury likely to be sustained. A master is not to be deprived of his remedy because, in ignorance of the danger, he entered a port which well-informed men might erroneously have pronounced to be safe, nor is he to be given damages if he sustains injury in conditions which fall short of the danger-point merely because well-informed men might have erroneously pronounced his entry into the port to be foolhardy. In my judgment, the arbitrator, being concerned only with a claim for damages for injury to the ship, rightly proceeded on the view he formed of the true facts.

The fifth and sixth contentions of the charterers may be taken together. The fifth contention is that the only result which can flow from an order to sail to an unsafe port is that the master is at liberty to refuse to go. The order being one which the master is not bound to obey, there can be no remedy for him in damages if he chooses to obey it. The sixth contention is that the damage was caused solely by the voluntary act of the master in taking the navigational decision to proceed up river. The first of these points gives rise to a little difficulty, for the position, on the authorities, is not entirely clear. In Limerick S.S. Co. v. Stott (6), SCRUTTON, L.J., ([1921] 2 K.B. 621) reserved his opinion on the point. In West, Ltd. v. Wright's, Ltd. (7), the ship alleged that she had sustained damage at an unsafe berth to which she had been ordered by the consignees of the bill of lading (incorporating the terms of a voyage charterparty). BRANSON, J., dismissed the claim, saying (40 Com. Cas. 192) :

"It seems to me that the true position is that the charterparty gives the consignee a right to order the vessel alongside any particular wharf, but if the vessel does not know what it is going to find there it can make inquiry, and if it finds that it cannot safely deliver by going there, then it is excused from obeying that order ; that is all, in my view, that is intended by those words of the charterparty."

In The Pass of Leny (8), a similar claim under a voyage charterparty, but based on breach of warranty, was dismissed by BUCKNILL, J., on the ground that the charterer did not expressly or impliedly warrant that the berth was safe. There have been cases in which the ship has been given, by way of damages, the expenses of lightering or of tug assistance in order to enter a port otherwise unsafe : see Hall Brothers S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Paul (R. & W.), Ltd. (9) and Axel Brostrom & Son v. Louis Dreyfus & Co. (10). Counsel for the charterers seeks to distinguish these on the ground that in them the master was avoiding the risk instead of incurring it. In the former case I note that it was unsuccessfully argued that the master, by accepting the order, was estopped from alleging that the port was unsafe. In Limerick Steamship Co., Ltd. v. Stott (6) on a point which did not reach the Court of Appeal, BAILHACHE, J. ([1921] 1 K.B. 575), awarded as damages the expenses of cutting the masts in order that the vessel might safely leave Manchester. Counsel has distinguished this on the ground that when it comes to leaving the port, as distinct from proceeding to it, the master has no choice.

While the main strength of counsel for the charterers lies in the dictum of BRANSON, J., his main difficulty is created by Lensen Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Anglo-Soviet Shipping Co., Ltd. (11). In that case, the ship, which was under time charter, was ordered to a berth which, although neither party knew it, was in fact unsafe, and she thereby sustained damage and had to be repaired. The charterers appear to have deducted hire during the period of repair, and the owners claimed the balance of hire, or, alternatively, damages, and a declaration that the charterers were liable to pay the cost of the repairs. The arbitrator awarded in their favour. MACKINNON, J., upheld the award, holding (50 Ll.L. Rep. 66) that "it was a breach of the charterparty to send her to that berth." Clause 1 of the charterparty was, so far as material, in the same terms as cl. 2 of the charterparty which I am considering. The Court of Appeal also, by a majority, MAUGHAM, L.J., dissenting, upheld the award. GREER, L.J., held that, although cl. 1 referred to ports and not expressly to berths, it extended, on its proper construction, or, alternatively, by implication, to berths within the port. He, therefore, held (52 Ll.L. Rep. 148) :

“ that the ship was employed at a loading berth which was outside the limits in which the owners agreed that she should be employed . . . ”

SLESSER, L.J., disagreed with the construction, but accepted the implication. The court does not appear to have dealt with the claim for damages as such. GREER, L.J., held that the breach of cl. 1 disentitled the charterers from relying on the off-hire clause. He also relied on cl. 8 (the indemnity clause) and cl. 12, which made the charterers responsible for loss or damage caused to steamer by goods being loaded contrary to the terms of the charterparty. The effect of the case was, therefore, that the owners recovered for damage to the ship.

West, Ltd. v. Wright's, Ltd. (7) was decided between the hearing before. MACKINNON, J., and the hearing before the Court of Appeal. It was cited in the Court of Appeal and distinguished by GREER, L.J. (ibid.), on the ground that it did not relate to a time charter, nor did the contract contain a term that the master should obey the orders of the charterers as to the employment of the ship. With the greatest deference, I find this distinction difficult to follow. It implies that whereas under a voyage charterparty the master is not bound to obey the order of the charterer to go to a port or berth outside the contractual limits, under a time charterparty he is. I cannot think that the clause in the time charterparty which puts the master under the orders of the charterer as regards employment is to be construed as compelling him to obey orders which the charterer has no power to give. It is, perhaps, sufficient for my determination of the present case that it concerns a time charterparty and is, therefore, governed by Lensen Shipping Co. v. Anglo-Soviet Shipping Co. (11) and not by West, Ltd. v. Wright's, Ltd. (7). Counsel for the owners, while not able to offer any explanation of GREER, L.J.'s dictum which satisfied him, contended that I am bound by it. If I am, I, of course, accept it, but, even if I am not, I should reach the same conclusion, for I should respectfully disagree (for reasons which I shall give later) with the dictum of BRANSON, J.

Before I leave the authorities, I may refer to Vsesojuznoje Objedihenii Sovfracht v. Temple S.S. Co., Ltd. (12). Under the curious form of charter which was considered by the House of Lords in that case the charterer ordered the vessel to Garston, to which he had no power to order her, and she went to Garston where she was requisitioned. The House treated the order as a breach of the charterparty and upheld an award of damages based on the difference between a free and a requisitioned ship.

As the authorities are not clear and conclusive on the point I have to determine, I shall state my own view of it. I think that it is necessary, first, to determine whether the giving of the order constitutes a breach of contract. Ex hypothesi, the order has no contractual force, and is, therefore, of no greater validity than an order given to the ship by a stranger. The charterers in this case do not expressly warrant that their orders will be within their powers, and it might be argued that it is for the recipient to determine for himself whether they are binding on him or not. In some types of contract, that may be so, but in this case counsel for the charterers concedes that the charterparty, either on its true construction or by implication, forbids the giving by the charterers of orders outside their powers, and, accordingly, that the giving of an order to sail to an unsafe port is a breach of the charterparty. If this concession had not been made, counsel would plainly have found it difficult to explain Hall Bros. S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Paul (R. & W.), Ltd. (9), Axel Brostrom & Son v. Louis Dreyfus & Co. (10) and the judgments of BAILHACHE, J., in Limerick S.S. Co. v. Stott (6) and of MACKINNON, J., in Lensen Shipping Co. v. Anglo Soviet Shipping Co. (11), which all proceeded on the basis that the order to go to an unsafe port or berth was a breach of the charterparty. The same result might be reached, irrespective of the giving of any order, by construing cl. 2 as a warranty that the ship would not be employed otherwise than between good and safe ports, but, in view of the charterers' concession, I need not consider this.

A Once the breach of contract is established, it seems to me to follow that, subject to the ordinary rule of remoteness, damages must result. There may be cases in which the charterer is innocent of any intention to break the contract and where the master deliberately decides to enter a port which he knows to be unsafe. ROCHE, J., on a rather similar point in Portsmouth Steamship Co. v. Liverpool Salvage Co. (13), indicated that the master should not follow the instructions of the charterer if they lead to obvious danger, but these factors go to the question of causation only. The giving of an order does not necessarily cause the damage that flows from an act done in pursuance of it. Put more specifically, the decision of the master to obey the order may in certain circumstances amount to a novus actus interveniens, but, in the circumstances of this case, the arbitrator clearly regarded the acts of the master as done in the ordinary course of things and not blameworthy. He was doing what any intelligent observer, knowing exactly how he was circumstanced, would have expected him to do. I take these phrases from the speech of LORD WRIGHT in Summers v. Salford Corpn. (14) ([1943] 1 All E.R. 74). The facts set out in the Special Case fully justify this conclusion.

B This disposes of the damage done to the ship on her way to Hamburg. The damage done to the ship on her way down the Elbe was, on the arbitrator's view as a matter of causation, the result of her leaving an unsafe port. A safe port means "a port to which a ship can safely get and from which she can safely return" : per BAILHACHE, J., in Limerick S.S. Co. v. Stott (6) ([1921] 1 K.B. 575). The point that the master might have avoided the damage by using an icebreaker is, in my view, concluded against the charterers on the facts found : see para. 10. Since, after consideration, I have reached a clear conclusion about the breach of C cl. 2 and its consequences, I need not further consider two other grounds on which it was sought to sustain the award and which were based on the indemnity clause (cl. 9) and the re-delivery clause (cl. 7). I answer in the affirmative the first part of the first question stated in para. 21 of the Case, and that answer is sufficient to uphold the award made in para. 18.

E Judgment for the claimants (upholding the award) with costs of setting down and F hearing.

Solicitors : Sinclair, Roche & Temperley (for the claimants) ; Keene, Marsland & Co. (for the respondents).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

SIR LINDSAY PARKINSON & CO., LTD. v. COMMISSIONERS OF WORKS AND PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen, Asquith and Singleton, L.JJ.), May 11, 12, 13, 16, 17, June 22, 1949.]

Building Contract—Liability to pay for alterations and additions—Contract amended by deed of variation—Payment to contractor limited—Subsequent large increase in works—Right of contractor to payment for additional work. A

On Jan. 6, 1937, a building contractor contracted with the Commissioners of Works to erect an ordnance factory, at a cost of £3,505,834, by Jan. 30, 1939, subject in specified circumstances to extensions of time, time being of the essence of the contract. Under the contract the commissioners were empowered "at their absolute discretion to modify the extent, character, sections, quantities or dimensions of the work shown or described in the contract or the levels or positions of any of the works . . . or to order additional works . . . without vitiating or in any way making void the contract," and the contractor was required to "perform such extra and additional works in the same manner as nearly as the circumstances will admit as if the same had originally formed part of the works." A note to the bills of quantities (found to import, not a contractual obligation, but a representation as to the scope of the contract) stated that: "It is probable that further work to the value of approximately £500,000 will be ordered on a measured basis under the terms of the contract." The value of alterations and additions to the work ascertained in accordance with specified rules was to be added to or deducted from the contract sum. Owing to delay in receipt of information from the commissioners, the contractor became entitled to extensions of time, but by a deed of variation, dated Aug. 18, 1937, it was provided that the work should be completed by the date originally fixed by employing exceptional and uneconomic methods of carrying it out, at an estimated additional cost of £1,000,000, which, with the value of the further work estimated at £500,000, would increase the contract price to £5,000,000. The deed also provided that the sum to be paid to the contractor under the contract should be calculated in accordance with the terms of the contract, but should be not less than the cost of the works, ascertained in accordance with prescribed rules, plus a net profit remuneration of £150,000, and not more than such cost of works plus £300,000, viz., three per cent. and six per cent. of £5,000,000 respectively. As a result of variations made by the commissioners, the works executed were greatly in excess of the quantity and value provided for in the varied contract, the actual cost being £6,683,056. B C D E F

HELD: on the true construction of the deed of variation it was not within the contemplation of the parties at the time of the execution of the deed that there would be such large increases in the amount of work to be executed; at that time both parties contemplated work which, with the introduction of exceptional methods, would cost approximately £5,000,000 and it was on that basis that the maximum profit was agreed at the figure of £300,000; and, the additional work having been performed by the contractor at the request of the commissioners, he was entitled to be paid a reasonable profit or remuneration in respect of it. G H

Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (1874). (L.R. 10 C.P. 125), and Bush v. Whitehaven Port and Town Trustees (1888). (2 Hudson's B.C. 4th ed., 122, C.A., 130), applied.

[AS TO LIABILITY TO PAY FOR ALTERATIONS AND ADDITIONS ON A BUILDING CONTRACT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 3, pp. 266-269, para. 478-485; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 7, pp. 378-381, Nos. 181-198.]

(Cases referred to :

(1) Bush v. Whitehaven Port and Town Trustees, (1888), 52 J.P. 392 ; 2 Hudson's B.C., 4th ed., 122 ; affmd., 2 Hudson's B.C., 4th ed., 130 ; 7 Digest 392, 232.

(2) Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd., (1874), L.R. 10 C.P. 125 ; 44 L.J.C.P. 27 ; 31 L.T. 789 ; affg., (1873), L.R. 8 C.P. 572 ; 42 L.J.C.P. 284 ; 12 Digest 386, 3175.

(3) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Raphael, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Ezra, [1935] A.C. 96 ; sub nom., Re Sassoon, 104 L.J.Ch. 24 ; 152 L.T. 217 ; Digest Supp.

(4) Shirlaw v. Southern Foundries, (1926), Ltd., [1939] 2 All E.R. 113 ; [1939] 2 K.B. 206 ; 108 L.J.K.B. 747 ; 160 L.T. 353 ; affmd., [1940] 2 All E.R. 445 ; [1940] A.C. 701 ; 109 L.J.K.B. 461 ; 164 L.T. 251 ; 2nd Digest Supp.

(5) Naylor, Benzon & Co. v. Krainische Industrie Gesellschaft & Co., [1918] 2 K.B. 486 ; 87 L.J.K.B. 1066 ; 118 L.T. 783 ; affg., [1918] 1 K.B. 331 ; 118 L.T. 442 ; 12 Digest 395, 3212.

(6) Pepper v. Burland, (1791), Peake, 139 ; 7 Digest 371, 155.

(7) Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr & Co., [1918] A.C. 119 ; 87 L.J.K.B. 370 ; 117 L.T. 766 ; 82 J.P. 61 ; 12 Digest 399, 3233.

(8) Distington Hematite Iron Co., Ltd. v. Possehl & Co., [1916] 1 K.B. 811, 85 L.J.K.B. 919 ; 115 L.T. 412 ; 2 Digest 175, 403.

APPEAL by the Commissioners of Works from a judgment of LEWIS, J., dated Oct. 29, 1948.

By a contract dated Jan. 6, 1937, the plaintiffs, who were building contractors, contracted with the commissioners to construct an ordnance factory. Under the original contract they were to be paid for the value of variations and additions to the works ascertained in accordance with prescribed rules, but a deed of variation subsequently entered into by the parties owing to delay in the works provided for completion within the time originally specified by using exceptional and uneconomical methods and fixed the minimum and maximum net profits to be paid to the plaintiffs on the work done at £150,000 and £300,000 respectively. Owing to the fact that large additions to the work were required by the commissioners under the terms of the contract, the work could not be completed within the time prescribed, and the payment based on cost plus profit under the deed of variation was much less than would have been due under a valuation of the additions in accordance with the terms of the original contract. The plaintiffs contended that the upper and lower limits of profit were based on an estimated cost of the works made at the time of the execution of the deed, and that, since that estimate had been greatly exceeded, he was entitled to be paid a reasonable remuneration in respect of the excess work, or, alternatively, a quantum meruit for that work as not coming within the scope of the contract. LEWIS, J., upheld this contention. The Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgments of COHEN and ASQUITH, L.JJ.

Rewcastle, K.C., and Dingle Foot for the commissioners.

Sir Valentine Holmes, K.C., E. J. Rimmer and Stewart-Brown for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 22. The following judgments were read.

COHEN, L.J. : This dispute arises out of a contract between Sir Lindsay Parkinson and Co., Ltd. ("the contractor") and the Commissioners of Works and Public Buildings. In 1936 the contractor was invited to tender for the erection of an ordnance factory at Chorley in Lancashire. On Jan. 6, 1937, the tender was accepted. The original contract, which was reduced into writing, bears the same date, but it was not, in fact, signed until Apr. 1, 1937, on which date a letter was also signed modifying the conditions of the contract in certain particulars. The contract recited the acceptance of a tender whereby the contractor undertook to erect the ordnance factory according to the general conditions of the contract, specifications and bills of quantities and drawings annexed to the contract. By cl. 1 the contractor covenanted to execute the works set out in the annexed documents in a thoroughly sound and workmanlike manner in accordance in every respect with the requirements, stipulations and conditions of the said annexed documents. Clause 2 reads as follows :

" In consideration of the covenant for the payment by the commissioners hereinafter contained the contractor hereby covenants with the commissioners that the contractor will execute and complete in a thoroughly sound and workmanlike manner all the works set out in the said specifications bills of quantities and drawings in accordance in every respect with the requirements stipulations and conditions of the said general conditions of contract specifications bills of quantities and drawings."

Clause 3 declared that the provisions of the general conditions of the contract, specifications and bills of quantities should be as binding on the contractor and on the commissioners as if the same had been repeated in the contract and should be read as part of the contract. Condition 1 of the general conditions contains the following definition of " works " :

" ' The works ' shall mean the works indicated on the drawings and/or described in the specifications and/or bills of quantities including all modified extra or additional works and all obligations to be performed under the contract."

By condition 2 the contractor was bound to carry out the work in accordance with the directions of the commissioners' architect, who was authorised to give directions inter alia as to variations or modifications of the design, quality or quantity of the works, or the addition to or omission or substitution of any work pursuant to condition 33 (1)—" any other matter not in condition 2 particularly described." Condition 2 ended as follows :

" The contractor shall from time to time forthwith comply with all the architect's instructions and duly execute any work comprised therein. The contractor shall not be entitled to any compensation additional allowance rate or payment or extension of time for completion by reason of his compliance with the architect's instructions, except in those cases where specific provision to that effect is contained in these conditions."

By condition 3 it was provided that the contractor should have no claim for additional payment by reason of certain specific matters and that he should not be relieved from any risks or obligations imposed on or undertaken by him under the contract on any of the grounds therein specified or on the grounds—and some reliance was placed on these words—that he could not or did not foresee any matter which might, in fact, affect or have affected the execution of the work. Condition 5 provided for day and night work in certain conditions. Condition 27 gave the commissioners power to suspend or determine the contract at their discretion, but gave the contractor a right to reasonable and just compensation if the suspension or determination should not have been occasioned by the failure of the contractor to observe the provisions of the contract or should not have been ordered under condition 26 which dealt with suspension for frost, etc. Condition 27 fixed the date for completion as Jan. 30, 1939, but subject to an extension of time in a number of events, including inter alia if the contractor should be required to execute any modified or additional work. Condition 29 provided for the payment of liquidated damages by the contractor if the works should not be completed and the site cleared on or before the date for completion. Condition 33, which deals with alterations, additions or omissions, is in the following terms :

"The commissioners shall have power from time to time by written instructions to the contractor from the architect at their absolute discretion to modify the extent, character, sections, quantities or dimensions of the work shown or described in the contract or the levels or positions of any of the works or to order any portion or portions of the works to be omitted with or without substitution of any other works in lieu thereof or to order any work or any portion of any work executed or partially executed, to be removed, changed or altered, or to order additional works, or to change the nature of the materials with which the works are intended to be constructed, without vitiating or in any way making void the contract and the contractor shall on the receipt of written instructions before mentioned make such alterations and changes or as the case may be perform such extra and additional works in the same manner as nearly as the circumstances will admit as if the same had originally formed part of the works. The value of all alterations, omissions or abandonments ordered as aforesaid shall be ascertained in accordance with condition 35 hereof and shall be added to or deducted from the contract sum as the case may be."

I pause here to observe that, although the contractor fixed a price and date for completion, both price and date were plainly elastic having regard to the very wide scope of condition 33 and to the provisions for varying the price and date of completion if the commissioners should exercise their right under condition 33. Condition 35 dealt with the valuation of alterations, additions and omissions and provided that, unless previously or otherwise agreed, the valuation should be made in accordance with the provisions therein set forth which, so far as material, were as follows :

"(a) The net rates or prices in the bills of quantities shall determine the valuation of work of similar character executed under similar conditions as work priced therein. Where the net rates or prices do not apply, but where there shall have been no change in the conditions of execution of the work, the value shall be based upon prices deduced therefrom so far as it is practicable to do so ; (b) If it is not practicable, or (by reason of a change in the conditions of execution of the work) not reasonable, either to apply the net rates or prices in the bills of quantities or to deduce net rates or prices therefrom the said value shall be ascertained on the basis of such net rates or prices as shall be agreed on between the architect and the contractor, or failing agreement, fixed by arbitration under condition 58 hereof; . . . (e) In the case of alterations additions or omissions which are valued otherwise than as daywork there shall be added to the contract sum any increased cost in respect of preliminaries (other than water or insurance) mentioned or referred to in bill No. 1 of the bills of quantities actually incurred by the contractor by reason of any such alterations or additions and there shall be deducted from such sum any saving or decrease in cost in respect of such preliminaries (other than as aforesaid) effected by the contractor by reason of or resulting from any such alterations or omissions."

Condition 37 provided that the description and quantity of the work covered by the contract sum should be deemed to be that which was set out in the bills of quantities and that any error therein or omission therefrom should not vitiate the contract nor release the contractor from his obligations, but should be rectified or treated as an alteration, addition, or omission as the case might be under condition 35. Condition 41 provided for advance payments to the contractor during the progress of the work of ninety per cent. of the value of the work from time to time certified by the architect, the balance of ten per cent. being retained by the commissioners until the retention moneys should be £100,000. The only other condition to which I need refer is condition 58, the arbitration clause, under which the dispute now before us was afterwards referred to arbitration.

I turn now to the bills of quantities. The only one to which our attention was called is bill No. 1. Item 1 therein describes what is called the scope of the contract. Item 33 states that the next thirty-four items are extracts from the general conditions, and among these 34 items is the following :

“ 57. Alterations additions or omissions. The prices in these bills of quantities shall not in any way be affected by any alterations additions or omissions being made to the works. (Condition 33) Note :—It is probable that further work to the value of approximately £500,000 will be ordered on a measured basis under the terms of the contract.”

At this point I must observe that the arbitrator found, and the learned judge agreed, that this note to item 57 had no contractual effect. The arbitrator had said :

“ Whilst this note is not contractual in the sense of obliging the commissioners to order such further work or giving rise to a claim by the contractor if such further work is not ordered it constitutes a representation as to the scope of the contract having regard to condition 33 of the conditions of contract (which is in wide terms) and in item 57 in the bills of quantities is a direct reference to condition 33 of the conditions of contract. The object of such a note is to place the contractor in a position to gauge the probable ambit of the contract and to price the bills of quantities accordingly having particular regard to the time required for completion and the probability of the work being executed in the time stipulated in the invitation to tender.”

The letter of Apr. 1, 1937, which formed part of the contract, provided for adjustment of the contract price in the event of a change in (a) the price of structural steel or (b) the wages of workmen pursuant to a national agreement and made certain other modifications to which I need not refer.

I turn now to the history of the contract, taking the facts from the arbitrator's award and from his findings of additional facts pursuant to a direction of the learned judge in the court below. The works proceeded, but, owing to the contractor not receiving information in time, he became entitled to an extension of time for the completion of the works. As, however, the commissioners still desired the works to be completed not later than Jan. 30, 1939, negotiations took place between the parties, as the result of which a deed of variation was drawn up and was executed on Aug. 18, 1937. That deed, after reciting (i) the original contract to carry out the work for a sum of £3,505,834 7s. 7d., adjusted as might be necessary in accordance with the provisions of the general conditions of contract, (ii) the letter of Apr. 1, 1937, amending the said original contract and (iii), a deed of assignment by which the rights of the original contractors were assigned and vested in the contractor with the consent of the commissioners, contained the following further recitals :

“ And whereas the date stipulated to the general conditions for the completion of the works is Jan. 30, 1939, or in the case of any extensions of time as provided for by the general conditions then the date of expiry of such extensions And whereas the contractor has entered on the execution of the works and the same have been in part completed and the contractor has become entitled under the general conditions to extensions of time for completion of the remainder of the works but the commissioners are desirous that the works shall nevertheless be completed not later than the said Jan. 30, 1939 And whereas the contractor has satisfied the commissioners that so far as concerns the part of the works already completed as aforesaid the contract has proved profitable to the contractor and that the contract if normally completed in its entirety under and with any extensions of time properly allowable by the existing terms and conditions thereof And whereas the parties are agreed that completion by Jan. 30, 1939 cannot be effected unless exceptional methods are used including where practicable and desirable the employment of machinery where in ordinary circumstances it would not be economical so to do, by increase of employment of labour day and night, by the purchase of materials in advance of definite requirements and by disregarding, where necessary to achieve the object the economic sequence of the work. And whereas the commissioners recognise that if such exceptional methods are used prices for future work will prima facie but not necessarily come to be valued under cl. 35 (b) of the conditions of contract."

I think something has been missed out between the words "contract" and "if normally completed" and the following words should appear "may be expected to prove profitable throughout to the contractor." The words "prima facie but not necessarily" in the last recital are at first sight a little difficult to understand, but counsel for the contractor suggested, I think rightly, that the reason for the words was that the price of materials, for example, the price of a brick, would not be affected by the adoption of the exceptional methods referred to in the previous recital and would, therefore, not come to be valued under condition 35 (b). The operative part of the deed is as follows :

"Clause 1. The contractor will use his utmost endeavours to complete the works by or before Jan. 30, 1939, and will for that purpose use exceptional methods as aforesaid and generally will take and prosecute all steps and measures reasonably practicable for the purpose of completing the works by or before the said date or as soon thereafter as practicable."

Clauses 2 and 3 contain corresponding obligations on the commissioners to do certain things in order to facilitate the completion of the work by the contractor before Jan. 30, 1939. Clause 4 is in the following terms :

"The sum to be paid to the contractor is to be calculated in accordance with the provisions of the contract and in particular the value of the works is to be ascertained prima facie but not necessarily in accordance with condition 35 (b) of the general conditions of contract Provided always that the sum eventually to be paid to the contractor shall be not less than the actual cost as hereinafter defined plus a net profit remuneration of £150,000 and shall not be greater than the said actual cost plus a net profit remuneration of £300,000."

It is this clause which has given rise to the dispute between the parties. For the ultimate cost of the work far exceeded the figure specified in cl. 1 of the original contract plus the sum of £500,000 stated in the note to item 57 in the bills of quantities as being the probable amount of the extras to be ordered under condition 33 of the general conditions, and the contractor contends that the profit limit of £300,000 cannot have been intended to apply to so large an increased cost. Clause 5 provides for the calculation of the annual cost and it is common ground that this clause covered every conceivable item of cost. Clause 8 was strongly relied on by counsel for the contractor and is in the following terms :

"Without prejudice to the right of the contractor to show that advances due under condition 41 of the general conditions of contract are in excess of the amounts paid from time to time the commissioners shall pay on monthly account to the contractor during the currency of the works such sum as shall bring the amount paid to the contractor in respect of the work to the actual cost incurred by him plus such proportion of £150,000 as shall represent the proportion of the amount of work executed to the whole of the work Provided always that at the option of the commissioners they may keep in reserve a sum not exceeding £100,000 and interest on such sum at four per centum per annum shall be deemed to be part of the actual cost under cl. 5."

Clause 9 provides for the adjustment of the amount payable by way of advances to the contractors so as to ensure that the contractor did not receive more than £300,000 payment on account of profits. Clause 10, on which the commissioners rely, is in the following terms :

" This deed shall be complementary to the contract and the contract and all the terms provisions and conditions thereof shall be read and construed subject to the provisions of this deed but subject as thereby varied shall be and continue of full force and effect."

This clause they say preserved the rights to which they claim to be entitled under the original contract to order extras to an unlimited amount provided the extras ordered were within the scope of the project and were not of such a quantity as to render the contract fantastic or absurd.

The contract having been thus varied, the work proceeded. In about September, 1938, when the payments to the contractor amounted to approximately £4,500,000, including payments in respect of the expeditious and uneconomical working, the contractor, at the request of the commissioners, supplied further information to assist the commissioners in making a further indent on the Treasury. It is suggested that this application for information was necessary because the commissioners had originally estimated the work at an amount which was nearing exhaustion. On Nov. 5, 1938, the contractor wrote to Sir James West, the chief architect of the commissioners, claiming that he was being called on to execute more work than was contemplated by the varied contract and that he was entitled to extra remuneration for work in excess of the contemplated work. In the same letter he pointed out that he thought his cost of finishing the work (without remuneration) would be not less than £6,000,000 on the basis that no further work would be ordered before completion. Some discussions took place, but on July 12, 1939, one Goodale, on behalf of the commissioners, refused to recommend any increased payments, alleging that when the deed of variation was entered into the full character and extent of the work involved could be, and was, no doubt, clearly appreciated by the contractor. The contractor then proposed to suspend all work unless he was paid additional remuneration, but continued with the work on the understanding that his claim for additional remuneration would be referred to arbitration. The job was completed early in 1940 at a cost far in excess of the original estimate, the actual cost being £6,683,056 to which the commissioners added the maximum profit of £300,000 allowed under cl. 4 of the deed of variation. The contractor refused to accept this sum as being a final settlement of his claim under the varied contract, contending (a) that the minimum and maximum profit had been fixed on the basis of a sum of approximately £5,000,000 made up of the following elements :—£3,500,000, the original cost price ; £500,000, the approximate limit indicated in the note to item 57 in the first bills of quantities ; and £1,000,000, being the estimated amount of additional expenditure arising from the adoption of exceptional methods ; (b) that this calculation was in the contemplation of both parties, and that, accordingly, they were entitled to additional profit in respect of work done at a cost in excess of this sum of approximately £5,000,000. It is to be observed that having regard to the correspondence to which I have already referred this claim was not an after-thought by the contractor. I should add that certain subsidiary contracts were entered into in respect of which the contractor was paid additional remuneration. The arbitrator has found that there were minimum and maximum profits fixed in the subsidiary contracts and that they were based on three per cent. and six per cent. respectively of the cost or estimated cost of the work involved. The contractor suggests that the minimum and maximum profits fixed in cl. 4 of the deed of variation were based on similar percentages of the £5,000,000, which, he says, was the agreed estimated cost of the work contemplated when the deed of variation was executed. This, however, is disputed by the commissioners.

The commissioners persisted in their rejection of the demand of the contractor for remuneration in excess of the maximum of £300,000 fixed by cl. 4 of the deed of variation and the dispute was referred to the arbitration of a distinguished architect, Mr. Woodward, under cl. 58 of the original contract. Pleadings were directed and the contentions of the contractor are set out in paras. 8-11 of the points of claim. Paragraph 8 contains the contentions as to the contemplated work and the method of ascertaining the minimum and maximum fixed by cl. 4 of the deed of variation. In the paragraph the work represented by the original sum of £3,506,584 plus the allowance of £500,000 for extras made in item 57 of bill No. 1 is referred to as "the stipulated work." Paragraphs 9, 10 and 11 are as follows :

" 9. In the circumstances aforesaid and from the custom of the industry to relate profit remuneration to the cost or estimated cost of the work to be done it was to be implied as a term of the varied contract that should the work carried out by the claimants [contractor] substantially exceed in quantity and value the stipulated work the claimants [contractor] should be paid a proportionate or alternatively a reasonable profit remuneration on the cost of such excess work. 10. Alternatively on the true construction of the varied contract the proviso to cl. 4 of the supplementary contract applied only to the stipulated work, and the claimants [contractor] were [was] entitled to be paid for work in excess of the stipulated work a sum calculated in accordance with the provisions of the contract and prima facie but not necessarily in accordance with condition 35 (b) of the general conditions of contract. 11. In the further alternative on the true construction of the varied contract the respondents [commissioners] were not entitled to require the claimants [contractor] to execute thereunder work in excess of the stipulated work."

Paragraphs 12 and 13 contain figures which are now agreed as representing the cost of the work on various bases. From this it appears that, measured and valued at the prices in the said bills of quantities, the cost was £6,263,296, while, measured and valued in accordance with condition 35 (b) pursuant to cl. 4 of the deed of variation, the cost was not less than £7,471,238. There were attached to the pleadings schedules A and B. Schedule A showed that, taking measurements and not values, the amount of the work on a number of items such as excavation, planking, strutting, etc., were very largely increased, the amount for excavation, for instance, being more than doubled. Schedule B contains similar particulars as regards values. The commissioners contended that the contractor's claim had no foundation in law, and, in particular, they said that the note to item 57 in bill of quantities No. 1 had no contractual or other effect on the legal relations between the parties and that the true position was as set out in paras. 8 and 12 of their answer. Paragraph 8, so far as material, was in the following terms :

" The respondents [commissioners] deny that the varied contract referred to in the points of claim is to be construed as containing any such implied term as is alleged in para. 9 of the points of claim. In point of fact, as both parties fully understood when the contract was negotiated and made between them, the respondents [commissioners] had not at that time decided what work would eventually be required to be carried out at the factory in question and the contract was accordingly drawn up in such terms as would, by the operation of the provision as to omissions variations and additions, enable the respondents [commissioners] when they eventually decided what their requirements were, to order what they wanted to be done without there being any question of any such work being outside the contract. Neither expressly nor by implication did the parties at any time agree on any maximum limit regarding the amount or value of the work to be covered by the contract, and to imply any such limitation, were it possible to do so, would be to contradict the express terms of the said contract."

Paragraph 12 concludes as follows :

" All the work in respect of which the claimants [contractor] here claim[s] was either work expressly provided for by the varied contract or work executed as the result of instructions given to them under the provisions of the varied contract which empowered the respondents [commissioners] to vary and add to the contract work and, having accepted and acted on such instructions, it is not open to the claimants [contractor] to allege that such work or any part of it was either work not contemplated by the varied contract, or work in respect of which they are entitled to be paid any sum in addition to that expressly provided by the varied contract to be paid."

The arbitrator made his award in the form of a Special Case. I have already referred to most of his findings, but I think I should read paras. 2, 3 and 4 of his award. They are in the following terms :

" 2. That the quantity and value of work executed, though not different in character from that covered by the varied contract, was largely in excess of the quantity and value of work the subject of the varied contract. The contract time of two years for completion was not sufficient in which to execute the excess quantity of work in addition to the quantity of work in the varied contract. 3. That it is a well recognised usage in the building industry to relate profit remuneration to the actual or estimated costs of the work and to the time required to execute the work. 4. That the quantity of work and the time required to execute such work was so varied and extended that, if the respondents' [commissioners'] contentions are upheld, the aforesaid trade usage would in this case be rendered of no effect."

Counsel for the contractor did not contend that there was any trade custom to be incorporated into the contract. He relied on findings 3 and 4 to support his contention that the £5,000,000 was in the contemplation of both parties since the commissioners were familiar with building contracts of this kind and must be taken to know that without some such agreed basis the contractor could not calculate the prices at which he would tender. The arbitrator was in considerable difficulty in dealing with the question of what was in the contemplation of the parties, as Col. Parkinson, who had negotiated the matter on behalf of the contractor, was dead and the commissioners did not call Sir James West who had dealt with the matter on their behalf. On the documents and facts the arbitrator stated the questions for the opinion of the court as follows :

" (i) Whether on the true construction of the varied contract the [contractor is] entitled to be paid a proportionate or reasonable profit or remuneration in respect of the 'excess work' ? (ii) Whether, in the alternative, the [contractor is] in law entitled to be paid for the excess work on the basis of a quantum meruit as work not coming within the scope of the contract ? (iii) Whether in the further alternative the [contractor is] in law entitled to be paid for the whole of the work executed by [him] on the basis of a quantum meruit ?"

When the matter first came before LEWIS, J., he decided that more information was required to enable him to reach a conclusion and he remitted the matter to the arbitrator to answer a series of fifteen questions. The arbitrator answered these questions on Mar. 16, 1948. The answers, like the award, are set out in full in the judgment of LEWIS, J. It is sufficient for my purpose to refer to the following findings :

“(i) That on or before Aug. 18, 1937, there was not any information available to the [contractor] and no instructions had been given to [him] indicating that [he] would be called on to execute work which would exceed the ‘stipulated work’ as defined in para. 8 of the points of claim either in quantity or when measured and valued on a comparable basis. That on July 5, 1937, Sir James West on behalf of the [commissioners] called on the [contractor] to supply a complete time and progress schedule of the work to be carried out, and early in August, 1937 the [contractor] informed Sir James West that it would be possible to complete the work by the original contract date (Jan. 30, 1939) if abnormal methods were used. (ii) (a). That when the [contractor] entered into the varied contract and agreed to take a minimum and maximum profit he did not know and had no reason to believe that the ultimate quantity of work would or might be greater than work valued at £4,000,000 or thereabouts at bills of quantities prices. (iii) That on Aug. 18, 1937 the extent of the work which the [contractor] was ultimately called on to execute was not and could not have been appreciated by [him]. (iv) That the [contractor], on the information available to [him] in August, 1937, estimated that the cost of the work which [he] would be called on to execute would be in the neighbourhood of £4,005,834 plus £1,000,000 as mentioned in para. 1 (k) of my award of Aug. 22, 1947. There was no evidence enabling me to answer the question as to whether or not the [commissioners] had in mind any different estimate at that time. (v) That by Aug. 12, 1937 the [contractor] had only executed work to the value of £459,910, and this shewed a profit of sixteen per cent. (vi) That, as stated in para. 1 hereof on July 5, 1937, Sir James West on behalf of the [commissioners] called on the [contractor] to supply a complete time and progress schedule of the works to be carried out, and the [contractor] early in August, 1937, informed Sir James West that it would be possible to complete the work by the original contract date (Jan. 30, 1939) if abnormal methods were used . . . (xii) That the increases in the minimum and maximum profits provided for in the subsidiary contracts were based on three per cent. and six per cent. respectively of the cost or estimated cost of the work involved.”

It is further stated in the answer to question 14 that the contractor erected 667 buildings instead of the 468 described in the original specifications and bills of quantities, but that there was no evidence on which to base any comparison between the type of the 468 buildings and the 667 buildings.

Before LEWIS, J., as before us, the principal authority on which counsel for the contractor relied was Bush v. Whitehaven Port and Town Trustees (1). LEWIS, J., carefully considered that case and also several cases laying down principles to be applied in considering whether a term which is not expressed can properly be implied in a contract. After referring to the judgments of this court in Bush's case (1) LEWIS, J., said :

“LORD ESHER, M.R., held to be right the principle laid down in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (2), namely, that you are to look and see what were the circumstances under which the contract was made in construing the contract, and you have to see whether what has happened was an event which was in the contemplation of the parties when they made it and, if it was not, you are entitled to construe that particular clause of the contract (having looked at the whole of the contract also, of course) to see whether or not it can clearly be said that the interpretation put on it by one side is an interpretation which could be the right interpretation, bearing in mind what was in the mind of the parties when they entered into the contract.”

LEWIS, J., having stated this principle, continued :

" I do not propose to read the whole of those extremely useful judgments in that very well known case, but, in my view, they laid down the principle which I have endeavoured to enunciate, and on the facts of this case I am satisfied that it was never contemplated, when the deed of variation was entered into, that the limit of profit clause was to be applied to the variations (which amounted, as I have said, to something like £2,000,000) and that the contractor was not to be paid on some other basis and he had not got to look only to his maximum profit for remuneration for the additional work which was imposed on him after that varied agreement was entered into. I am quite satisfied that that was never in the contemplation of the parties."

LEWIS, J., then gives his reasons for thinking that this large increase in the amount of work was no more in the contemplation of the commissioners than it was in the contemplation of the contractor saying:

" The arbitrator has found that it was never in the contemplation of the contractors and this is his finding, which I hope I am paraphrasing correctly : they could not know, and they had no idea and no reason to believe that there would be these large increases. About the commissioners he says : ' I cannot tell you what they thought because I have no evidence before me of that and after all the test is : What did the parties contemplate ? ' I cannot believe that if those who negotiated this deed of variation had in mind that they were dealing on the basis of putting in that clause on the basis that they were contemplating a very great increase in the amount of work which the contractor is going to be asked to do they would not have said so—but they did not. Please do not let it be thought that I am suggesting anything like bad faith on behalf of the contractor—of course I am not—but I should have thought that the commissioners, when dealing with a thing, if they had that in their minds, would have gone out of their way to make it quite clear to Messrs. Lindsay Parkinson and said : ' True we have put £500,000 in the original contract as the probable amount of additional work that we shall want, but do not let us have any misunderstanding about that ; we are entering into this varied contract now and we know we may want something like £2,000,000.' I cannot believe that, if they had contemplated that, they would not have made it perfectly clear to Messrs. Lindsay Parkinson. The arbitrator found that Messrs. Lindsay Parkinson did not contemplate it and had no reason to contemplate it, and I think the proper inference to draw from that is that just as Messrs. Lindsay Parkinson had no reason to contemplate it so also had the commissioners no reason to contemplate it."

He concludes by answering the first two questions in favour of the contractor, leaving the third question unanswered. I confess I feel some difficulty in following how these two alternative questions can both be answered in the affirmative, but it may be that the learned judge did so because the arbitrator had said that on either basis the amount of his award would be the sum of £90,298.

Counsel for the commissioners attacked this judgment on two grounds. First he said that it was inherent in the learned judge's decision that he was importing into the varied contract a term that the limitation on profit thereby imposed was not to apply if the extras ordered brought the total valuation of the contract work beyond the sum of approximately £5 million. He relied on the observations of LORD WRIGHT in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Raphael (3), where the learned Lord said ([1935] A.C. 142) :

" I must however deal shortly with the authorities which have been so strenuously urged on behalf of the appellants as leading to the contrary conclusion. It must be remembered at the outset that the court, while it seeks to give effect to the intention of the parties, must give effect to that intention as expressed, that is, it must ascertain the meaning of the words actually used. There is often an ambiguity in the use of the word 'intention' in cases of this character. The word is constantly used as meaning motive, purpose, desire, as a state of mind, and not as meaning intention as expressed. The words actually used must no doubt be construed with reference to the facts known to the parties and in contemplation of which the parties must be deemed to have used them : such facts may be proved by extrinsic evidence or appear in recitals : again the meaning of the words used must be ascertained by considering the whole context of the document and so as to harmonise as far as possible all the parts : particular words may appear to have been used in a special sense, which may be a technical or trade sense, or in a special meaning adopted by the parties themselves as shown by the whole document. Terms may be implied by custom and on similar grounds. But allowing for these and other rules of the same kind, the principle of the common law has been to adopt an objective standard of construction and to exclude general evidence of actual intention of the parties; the reason for this has been that otherwise all certainty would be taken from the words in which the parties have recorded their agreement or their dispositions of property. If in some cases hardship or injustice may be effected by this rule of law, such hardship or injustice can generally be obviated by the power in equity to reform the contract, in proper cases and on proper evidence that there has been a real intention and a real mistake in expressing that intention : these matters may be established, as they generally are, by extrinsic evidence. The court will thus re-form or re-write the clauses in order to give effect to the real intention. But that is not construction, but rectification."

Applying that statement of the law to the present case, counsel said that the varied contract was plain and unambiguous ; condition 33 of the original contract gave the commissioners an unlimited power of ordering extras, even to the extent of altering the character of the work ; and there was no hardship in such a provision, as, if extras were ordered, the contractor would get additional payment under condition 33 and an extension of time for completing the works under condition 28. Condition 33, he said, was preserved unaltered by the deed of variation (see cl. 10 thereof) and he met the argument that a provision for unlimited modification which might be reasonable when there was a provision for increased remuneration became unreasonable when a maximum profit was fixed by pointing out that under the revised contract the contractor got the benefit of a guaranteed minimum profit. The contractor, he said, was seeking to get rectification under the guise of reconstruction. He further argued that it would have been perfectly easy to cover expressly the event which the contractor was now seeking to cover by the implied term if the parties had intended any such term, and that it was obvious to anyone who read condition 33 of the original contract that the event might arise. Finally, on this part of the case, counsel cited the passage about the "officious bystander" from the judgment of MACKINNON, L.J., in Shirlaw v. Southern Foundries (1926), Ltd. (4) ([1939] 2 All E.R. 124), which had been cited by LEWIS, J. In the present case, said counsel, it would be quite impossible to imagine the parties saying "of course" if the officious bystander had suggested the insertion of implied limit in the application of the maximum fixed by cl. 4 of the deed of variation which the contractor now sought to introduce, for the commissioners had rejected it when the contractor first raised the point in 1938, and the very nature of the work—the construction of an ordnance factory in time of emergency—made it unlikely that the commissioners would ever have accepted it.

But, said counsel, it was suggested that the learned judge was relying, not on an implied term, but on a principle supposed to be derived from Bush v. Whitehaven Port and Town Trustees (1). If so, he misapplied that case. To appreciate this point it is important to see exactly what Bush's case (1) decides. In that case the plaintiff had entered into a contract with the defendants to construct a fifteen inch water main from Ennerdale Water towards Whitehaven for £1,335. The contract allowed for extras, the defendants were to give the plaintiff the use of so much of the site as might from time to time, in the opinion of their engineer, be required to enable them to commence and continue the work, but the contract contained this provision :

"But the non-delivery in the manner aforesaid of the use of such site, or any part thereof, shall not vitiate or affect the contract, nor any provision therein or in this specification contained, nor entitle the contractor to any increased allowance in respect of money, time, or otherwise unless the engineer may grant him any extension of time, and then only to that extent under the provisions for that purpose hereinafter contained."

A time was fixed for completion, but the engineer had power to extend it. Time was made of the essence of the contract and penalties for delay were imposed. The plaintiff's tender was sent in on June 12, 1886, and he was given to understand that he was to begin at once and to have four months in which to finish the work, and his calculations were based on that footing, as the cost of doing the work in the winter months would be at least fifty per cent. higher than the tender. The contract was accepted on June 23 and the plaintiff was then told that arrangements for immediate possession had been made with five out of eight owners and five out of ten occupiers of the land necessary for the works. The plaintiff began work on July 12 before the corporation had sealed the contract, but the land was not all available until Oct. 6. In consequence of this delay, the work was thrown into the winter months, and the contractor was put to heavy extra expense for which he sued the defendants. The action was tried before CAVE, J., with a jury, and a number of questions were left to the jury. Questions 1, 2, 5 and 8 and the answers thereto are as follows :

"(1) Was it the duty of the defendants under the contract to be in a position at the commencement of and at all times during the contract to give the contractor the use of so much of the site of the works as might, in the opinion of the engineer, be required to enable the contractor to commence and continue the execution of the works in accordance with the contract ? A.—Yes. (2) Was the contract made on the basis that the defendants would be in a position to act as aforesaid ? A.—Yes. (5) Were the conditions of the contract so completely changed, in consequence of the defendants' inability to hand over the sites of the work as required, as to make the special provisions of the contract inapplicable ? A.—Yes. (8) What damages had the plaintiff suffered by reason of the inability of the defendants to hand over the sites required for the purpose of this work ? A.—£600 over and above the contract price."

It appears that on these findings the judge found himself unable to reach a conclusion. The defendants, therefore, moved before a Divisional Court that judgment should be entered for them with costs. The Divisional Court, however, directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for £600. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., states the question before the court as follows (Hudson's B.C., 4th ed., 124) :

"It is an action brought by a contractor who has signed a contract, and who has undertaken to be bound by the terms of that contract, to recover not only the contract price, but to recover a sum of money either by way of quantum meruit or by way of damages against the defendants—it does not very much matter which view is taken—to recover a considerable sum of money beyond the contract price, on the ground that the circumstances under which he completed the contract were wholly different from those under which he entered into it, and that therefore he is set free from the terms of it and has a right to recover this sum of money.”

He first of all deals with the question whether a term could be implied for breach of which the plaintiff could recover damages and was inclined to answer it in the affirmative, but goes on to say that, even if he was wrong on that point, there was another principle on which he thought the plaintiff was entitled to recover. He states that principle in these terms (ibid., 127) :

“ Now, what is that principle ? I find it stated in very clear terms in the judgment of the majority of the court in Jackson v. Unicorn Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (2), and after going through a variety of authorities, with which I need not now trouble myself, the result is stated in this way (L.R. 8 C.P. 581) : ‘ These authorities seem to support the proposition, which appears on principle to be very reasonable, that where a contract is made with reference to certain anticipated circumstances, and where, without any default of either party, it becomes wholly inapplicable to, or impossible of application to any such circumstances, it ceases to have any application ; it cannot be applied to other circumstances which could not have been in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made.’ ”

He then proceeds to examine the facts of the case before him in the light of that principle. He points out that what was to have been a summer contract had been turned into a winter contract, saying :

“ It was turned into a winter contract—into a contract when wages were different, probably, or may have been ; when days were short, instead of long ; when weather was bad, instead of good ; when rivers which had to be dealt with, and had to be crossed by the pipes, were full not empty ; and when, in fact, I will not say every circumstance, but a great many most important circumstances under which the contract was to be executed, had wholly changed from those which, it is reasonable to suppose, were in the contemplation of both the parties when the contract was entered into. The contract, nevertheless, was carried on, and was completed. It was carried on and was completed, of course, with the knowledge of the contractor, and equally, of course, with the knowledge of the defendants. The defendants knew as well as the contractor that the work was being carried on under totally different circumstances to those contemplated in the contract. They knew that perfectly well, and although the plaintiff possibly or probably might at the expiration of the four months have thrown up the contract and refused to proceed, he had also a perfect right, if he had thought fit, with the knowledge and assent of the defendants, which in this case is to be presumed, and, indeed, was proved, to go on with the contract and to complete it under the altered conditions, or I will not say to complete the contract, but to complete the work under the totally altered conditions that had arisen.”

He then relies on finding 5 of the jury’s finding to show that there was such a change of circumstances as to make applicable the principle he had stated. MATHEW, J., agreed with this conclusion, saying (ibid., 130) :

“ It appears to me there was abundant evidence to justify the conclusion of the jury that the plaintiff and the defendants permitted the works to go on on the understanding that those works were being done, not under the original contract, but under a contract with altered conditions.”

This decision was affirmed by this court on the second ground stated by LORD COLERIDGE, the ground with which MATHEW, J., concurred. LORD ESHER, M.R., said (ibid., 131) :

“ Now, the answer to the fifth question (if you take it to be a binding finding of the jury), in my opinion, comes to this, that the condition of things had so been altered after the making of the original contract (they had been so greatly altered) that it was not reasonable, or right, or fair, or just to hold that the original contract was made with regard to those circumstances. In other words you may put it thus, that the condition of things was so altered that if they had been supposed to be the things with regard to which the first contract was made, neither party acting as (I must use my favourite phrase) reasonable men of business could have made the original contract in the terms in which it was with regard to that state of circumstances. The result of that, if it is true, is this, that the original contract is made with regard to a different subject-matter from the subject-matter which was dealt with by the parties . . . The one party goes on to deal with the new state of circumstances and does work with regard to those. The other party knows that that party is dealing with that new state of circumstances and allows him to do so. Therefore, the one does work which he intends to be for the other. The other person allows him to do that work, knowing that it is intended to be done for him. It is work which he knows that the one party is doing on the terms of being paid for it somehow, and he allows him to go on, with an understanding that he is to be paid for it somehow. What does that give rise to ? It gives rise to a claim for a fair remuneration for that work done. That fair remuneration is called in legal language a payment according to a quantum meruit. If the first contract was gone, if the state of circumstances with regard to which it was made were really no longer in existence as between the parties, if the one did work for the other on the new state of circumstances which the other accepted, knowing that it was being done on the terms of being paid for, that gives rise to a quantum meruit."

To complete my citation, let me take a short passage from the judgment of LINDLEY, L.J., where he says (ibid., 133) :

" . . . a state of things was assumed by both parties which was never realised, and . . . the contract was based on the supposition that the state of things assumed would exist."

Now it is said that the ratio decidendi of this case does not involve any implied term. I doubt whether that is correct. It seems to me at least to involve the implication of a term that the contractor shall not be bound to complete the work if the assumed state of affairs did not exist and it certainly involves the implication outside the contract of a fresh contract to pay a quantum meruit for the work done by the contractor and accepted by the owner. Both LORD ESHER, M.R., and LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., based their conclusion on the decision in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (2). It will be convenient, therefore, to refer to that case before reverting to the argument of counsel for the commissioners. The actual question in that case was whether the insurance company were liable on an insurance of chartered freight, the charterers having thrown up the charter because the ship went aground on its way to the port of loading and was much damaged and was still under repair at the date of trial. The court held the charterers were absolved from loading the vessel, and, therefore, the defendants were liable to the shipowner. The ratio decidendi is conveniently stated in a short passage in the judgment of BRAMWELL, B., in the Exchequer Chamber, where he says (L.R. 10 C.P. 141) :

" In considering this question, the finding of the jury that 'the time necessary to get the ship off and repairing her so as to be a cargo-carrying ship was so long as to put an end in a commercial sense to the commercial speculation entered into by the shipowner and charterers,' is all important. I do not think the question could have been left in better terms ; but it may be paraphrased or amplified. I understand that the jury have found that the voyage the parties contemplated had become impossible ; that a voyage undertaken after the ship was sufficiently repaired would have been a different voyage, not, indeed, different as to the ports of loading and discharge, but different as a different adventure,—a voyage for which at the time of the charter the plaintiff had not in intention engaged the ship, nor the charterers the cargo ; a voyage as different as though it had been described as intended to be a spring voyage, while the one after the repair would be an autumn voyage.”

Applying the principle of those decisions to the case before us, counsel for the commissioners says that they show that the character of the adventure must be changed before a party can claim to be discharged from his obligation. He relies on the finding of the arbitrator that the quantity and value of the work executed was not different in character from that covered by the varied contract and says that the fact that it was largely in excess of the quantity and value of work the subject of the varied contract is not sufficient to make the principle of the cases cited applicable. Counsel for the contractor, on the other hand, says that the principle established by these cases is that, if the circumstances in which a contract is carried out differ so completely from the circumstances which were in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made that the parties cannot be taken to have intended to apply the provisions of the contract, or some of them, to the work as actually done, the provisions in question will not apply, and if such work has been done by one party at the request of the other party for which no remuneration is provided under the contract as thus amended, the party doing such extra work will be entitled to payment therefor on a quantum meruit basis. He argued that the principle would have been applicable to the original contract. He relied on the observations of McCARDIE, J., in Naylor, Benson & Co., Ltd. v. Krainische Industrie Gesellschaft & Co. (5) where the learned judge said ([1918] 1 K.B. 335):

“ It is essential to remember, however, that words, even though general, must be limited to circumstances within the contemplation of the parties.”

He referred to various provisions in the contract document, and, in particular, to the note to item 57 in the first bill of quantities which, though not contractual in character, was, he said, an indication that the parties contemplated work of the value of approximately £4 million, namely, £3½ million mentioned in para. 1 of the original contract and half a million mentioned in the note to item 57. He said that an increase in the amount of work ordered might be so great as plainly to amount to a complete change of the circumstances contemplated by the parties and thus bring the principle in Bush's case (1) into operation. The question, he said, when that point was reached must really be a question of fact, and para. 2 of the arbitrator's award really amounted to a finding in his favour on this point. But, said counsel, whatever be the position on the original contract, the varied contract made it plain that the parties were proceeding on the basis of work represented by the original contract price of approximately £3½ million and the allowance of approximately half a million for extras. His argument continued on the following lines : (i) On any other basis completion of the contract by Jan. 30, 1939, would be impossible. Not only did the recitals in the deed of variation show that this was the object of the parties, but the contractor had been called on for a time and progress report, and had informed the commissioners early in August, 1937, that completion by Jan. 30, 1939, would be possible if the abnormal methods were adopted. (ii) It is inconceivable that the contractor would have agreed to a limit of profit of £300,000 if the commissioners were to have the right to tie up his men and equipment for an indefinite period by calling for extras to an unlimited amount under condition 33. (iii) The upper and lower limits of profit must have been calculated on some basis. This basis was three per cent. and six per cent. on an estimated cost of £5 million made up as to £3½ million of the original cost price of the work, as to half a million of the original estimate of extras, and as to £1 million of the estimated cost of adopting the exceptional methods referred to in the penultimate recital to the deed of variation. The arbitrator had found that the maxima and minima in the subsidiary contracts were based on three per cent. and six per cent. of the cost or estimated cost of the work involved in those contracts and it was a reasonable inference that the maximum and minimum in the deed of variation were fixed on the same basis. (iv) Clause 8 of the contract would be unworkable unless "the whole of the work" was an ascertained sum.

Counsel for the commissioners said that this argument was based on a misconception of cl. 8 and on a number of assumptions unsupported by findings of the learned arbitrator. In particular, he stressed the fact that the learned arbitrator had stated that there was no evidence enabling him to find what was the state of the mind of the commissioners at the date of the deed of variation. As regards cl. 8 he said that, if counsel for the contractor was right, all that the draftsman of the clause need have done would have been to provide that each payment should be of an amount equal to three per cent. of the cost of the work comprised in the relevant architect's certificate and that the clause is quite workable if "the whole of the work" is read as meaning the whole of the work ordered at the date of the certificate. There is some force in this criticism, but cl. 8 is not essential to the argument of counsel for the contractor on the varied contract. As regards the criticism that the arbitrator had found himself unable to make a finding as to the state of mind of the commissioners, I think the arbitrator was merely saying that, as the commissioners had chosen to call no evidence, he had no direct evidence as to their state of mind. I think he failed to appreciate that it was open to him to draw inferences from the facts deposed to before him and the documents in the case. As he failed to do so, it was, I think, within the province of the learned judge and is within our province to draw such inferences as are justified by the arbitrator's findings and the documents.

Looking at the matter as a whole, I have come to the conclusion that, whatever might have been the position had the contract not been varied, the argument of counsel for the contractor that both parties entered into the varied contract on the basis that the work to be comprised therein would be the work covered by the original estimate of £3½ million and half a million is well founded. How could the parties have arrived at the conclusion that the work could be done by Jan. 30, 1939, by the use of the exceptional methods if they had not in their minds an estimate of the work to be done? Knowing that this had originally been estimated at approximately £4 million and knowing that this was the basis on which the contractor was proceeding, is it not a reasonable inference that the commissioners were contracting on the same terms? Counsel for the commissioners said there was no evidence that the commissioners had estimated or accepted the contractor's estimate of £1 million as the cost of the exceptional methods. As no evidence was adduced to suggest that any part of the excess cost of the work ultimately executed was attributable to the exceptional methods, I do not think it is of vital importance to determine whether or not the commissioners agreed the figure of £1 million, but I think the proper inference is that they did. I agree with the argument of counsel for the contractor based on the minimum and maximum amounts fixed by cl. 4 of the deed of variation that these must have been calculated on a figure of £5 million which included, therefore, an estimate of £1 million for the cost of the exceptional methods.

In the result, I am of opinion that LEWIS, J., was right in his conclusion that the principle of Bush v. Whitehaven Port and Town Trustees (1) is applicable to this case. The work executed so far exceeded the stipulated work, that is to say, the work comprised in the original estimate of £4 million that it seems to me, to use the language of counsel for the commissioners, fantastic and absurd to suppose that such a large increase as, in fact, occurred was within the contemplation of the parties when the deed of variation was executed. We are, I think, amply justified (a) in reaching the conclusion that the basis of the varied contract was that the quantum of work which the commissioners were entitled to require was work measured approximately by the said sum of £5 million, and (b) in implying a term that the commissioners should not be entitled under the contract to require work materially in excess of that sum. It follows that, such excess work having been done by the contractor at the request of the commissioners, the commissioners are liable to pay the contractor reasonable remuneration therefor. I was at one time inclined to think that the result of the application of Bush's case (1) should have been to answer the arbitrator's first two questions in the negative and the third question in the affirmative, thus making the quantum meruit basis applicable throughout, but counsel for the contractor referred us to the decision in Pepper v. Burland (6) which supports an award of the contract price for the work within the contract and a quantum meruit for the excess. In the result, I am of opinion that the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree. The question in this appeal is whether the original contract between the parties, as varied by the deed of Aug. 18, 1937, is to be read as producing this extraordinary result, namely, first, that in no circumstances may the contractor's remuneration exceed £300,000, but, secondly, that nevertheless, after he has earned that profit, the commissioners are entitled to require him to perform further additions and variations till the end of time without paying him an extra penny in respect of them. For brevity, I will call such variations and additions "extras."

I propose to consider, in its bearing on this problem, first, the construction of the original contract, and, secondly, the effect of the superimposition on it of the deed of August, 1937. Under general condition 33 of the original contract, read literally, the commissioners were entitled to require the contractor to carry out "extras" without limit of quantum or time. They could require him to erect a series of buildings on the site, pull them down, and put them up again, with or without alterations, as often, and for as long, as they chose. When the original contract alone was concerned, this was not such an unreasonable stipulation as on its face it appears, since two factors would in practice militate against the abuse by the commissioners of their strict legal rights. First, under that contract they would have to pay for all extras under either sub-cl. (a) or sub-cl. (b) of condition 35, and, secondly, pay for them out of public funds. The contractor might feel some legitimate confidence that, whatever their strict rights, the commissioners would not in practice choose, or, perhaps, in a democratic country be allowed, to waste the taxpayers' money wantonly. A further consideration suggests some doubt whether such a course of conduct would even be within their strict legal rights. There is a note to item 57 of the first bill of quantities which reads as follows : "It is probable that further work to the value of approximately £500,000 will be ordered on a measured basis under the terms of the contract." So far as the original contract is concerned, it is not suggested that this note was per se a term of that contract in the strict sense that the commissioners were undertaking to order not less or not more than about £500,000 by value of "extras." The very words "it is probable" rule out any such construction, for they necessarily imply that, in less probable events, the commissioners may order less (or more) than this quantum of extras, a possibility which would not exist if they were not entitled to do so. It was, however, suggested that the presence of this note is indirectly relevant as supporting an implied limitation of the literal scope of condition 33, a limitation to extras on some such scale as £500,000, and at all events precludes so literal a reading of condition 33 as would entitle the commissioners to require extras to be carried out to the tune of, say, £100,000,000, or, indeed, £2,000,000.

It is not necessary to decide this point. If it were, I should for myself feel serious doubt whether any such limitation could validly be implied. When, however, the original contract is read subject to the overriding effect (where the two are inconsistent) of the deed of August, 1937, the case for reading condition 33 as subject to an implied restriction on its literal tenor is much stronger. Two new considerations here intervene, the first derived from the terms of the deed itself and the second derived from the circumstances which surrounded and led up to its execution.

To deal with these in turn, first, if the original contract plus the deed are read without any implied limitation on their literal meaning, the result, as indicated above, is that after £300,000 profit has been earned by the contractor, he can be compelled to labour like the Danaids without reward or limit, on any further "extras" which the commissioners may elect to exact from him, "till the last syllable of recorded time." The restraining practical factor that such "extras" will have to be paid for, and paid for out of the taxpayers' funds, no longer operates, because of the proviso to cl. 4 of the deed imposing a maximum profit. Only the most compelling language would induce a court to construe the combined instruments as placing one party so completely at the mercy of the other. Where the language of the contract is capable of a literal and wide, but also of a less literal and a more restricted, meaning, all relevant surrounding circumstances can be taken into account in deciding whether the literal or a more limited meaning should be ascribed to it. What, if any, then, were, in the present case, the relevant surrounding circumstances at the time when the varying deed was executed? They include the following: (a) Owing to the default of the commissioners, the contractor had by August, 1937, become entitled to an extension of time beyond Jan. 30, 1939, the date fixed for the completion of the work by the original contract. The commissioners were most anxious that he should not enforce his right to any extension. (b) Early in August the contractor informed them that it would be possible to complete by the original date if certain time-saving, but uneconomic, methods were adopted. The main object of the varying deed was to commit the contractor to their adoption. In passing, it is to be noted that (subject to their adoption) the contractor felt he could give an assurance that he would complete by a specific date. It is hard to see how he could give such an assurance unless he at least contemplated a more or less fixed quantum of work, ascertained at the time when the assurance was given. He certainly could not give it if he contemplated a quantum indefinitely expansible at the option of the other contracting party. (c) The quantum of work originally contemplated as that which the contractor could or was likely to be called on to perform was (i) work valued at bills of quantities prices at £3½ million, plus (ii) extra work which was thought likely to work out, at the same prices, at roughly half a million pounds. The bills of quantities prices were to be adjustable if and so far as wages and the price of structural steel rose or fell, but this does not affect the quantum of the work. It merely affects its measure in money. (d) If the "uneconomic devices" were applied, this same quantum of work would cost an additional sum estimated by the contractor at £1,000,000. I will call this quantum by the name given to it in the points of claim, "the stipulated work." The money measure (if we adopt the contractor's estimate of the cost of the uneconomic devices) of "the stipulated work" was thus in August, 1937, almost exactly £5,000,000 if the uneconomic devices were adopted—almost exactly £4,000,000 if they were not. (e) When the deed came to be drawn, it provided for a "floor" and a "ceiling" to the contractor's profit. His guaranteed minimum profit was to be £150,000; his maximum £300,000. This first figure is precisely three per cent. on £5,000,000; the second precisely six per cent. (f) On Aug. 11 or 12, 1937, a few days before the deed was signed, Col. Parkinson had a conference with Sir James West, chief architect to the commissioners, the result of which is confirmed in a letter of that date by the commissioners to the contractor, which letter names these two figures as minimum and maximum profit respectively. (g) The arbitrator says there was no evidence enabling him to determine what the commissioners, as opposed to the contractor, contemplated as to the quantum of work, if any, to be performed in excess of the stipulated work under the contract as varied—whether, for instance, the commissioners had in mind a fixed total of work measured within a narrow margin by the sum of £5,000,000 and whether they concurred in the contractor's estimate of £1,000,000 (one element in building up the £5,000,000) as the extra cost referable to the "uneconomic devices." By saying there was "no evidence," in my view, the arbitrator meant no more than that, Col. Parkinson at the time of the arbitration being dead and Sir James West not being called as a witness, he had no direct oral evidence showing what the commissioners contemplated under these heads immediately before the execution of the deed. It seems likely that the arbitrator, mistakenly, supposed he was disabled from drawing inferences of fact from the facts proved by the oral evidence. This court at least is under no such disability, and, in drawing such inferences, is not disturbing any finding by the arbitrator, but merely filling a blank which he could, and perhaps should, have filled. (h) I am much impressed by the argument of counsel for the contractor that when the figures of £150,000 and £300,000 emerged—first in the commissioners' letter of Aug. 12, 1937, and then in the deed itself—they were not, presumably, as he put it, "drawn from a hat." It seems overwhelmingly probable that they would be related to some basic figure as percentages. They happen to form precise percentages of £5,000,000, a figure which was clearly in the mind of the contractor as measuring the quantum of the work he had to carry out—the "stipulated work." (i) If so, it seems also overwhelmingly probable that in the interview or interviews leading up to the deed this £5,000,000 figure was communicated to and accepted by the commissioners as the basis of the minimum and maximum profit figures agreed on in the deed. The parties at these interviews must have discussed why the contractor should receive these sums and not some others, and their precise mathematical relationship to £5,000,000 cannot be a miraculous coincidence. I should draw the same inference from the terms of the deed itself, viewed in the light of the surrounding circumstances, even if the letter of Aug. 12 were entirely excluded from consideration. If so, the conclusion seems justified that the parties to the varying deed contracted on the basis of a maximum and minimum profit directly related and limited to a total quantum of work measured approximately by £5,000,000 and on the basis that the commissioners should not be entitled under the contract to require work materially in excess of this quantum. Hence no claim to exact an extra quantum of work measured by about £2,000,000 can be sustained under the contract and, such extra work having been in fact requested and performed, the contractor is entitled to claim in respect of it, not under the contract, but dehors the contract, for a reasonable remuneration.

Many authorities were cited to us on the construction of the contract as varied by the deed. The majority of these were decisions on "frustration." Frustration cases differ from the present case, in so far as in many of them a catastrophic event is involved. A catastrophic event, caused by the act of neither party, intervenes, destroying some basic, though tacit, assumption on which the parties have contracted, and with that assumption destroying the contract itself. In the present case there is no such external event, for the commissioners' act in demanding £2,000,000 worth of "extras" cannot be regarded in that light and is in any case the act of one of the parties. The ground common to this case and frustration cases—the area of overlap between them—is limited to this, that in many frustration cases a stipulation absolute, if literally construed, has been construed as subject to an implied restriction by reason of the circumstances surrounding the formation of the contract and contemplated by the parties at that time, and it is sought in the present case by the contractor to import a similar implied restriction. In a frustration case "X" may contract to sing in the Albert Hall on Tuesday, and the obligation, if read literally, is unconditional, yet the contract is construed as subject to an implied term that the Albert Hall shall not have been burnt to the ground on the previous Monday. The continued existence of the Albert Hall was a basic assumption, only not expressed in the contract because the parties thought (or would have thought if they had considered the point) that it was too obvious to need expressing. So, again, where an obligation is subject to a clause modifying its incidence in certain named events, such a clause may itself have to be construed against its literal tenor if the literal construction runs counter to some similar basic assumption. A contract often provides that in the event of "delay" through specified causes, the contract is not to be dissolved, but merely suspended, yet such a provision has been held not to apply where the delay was so phenomenal, so pre-emptive, as to fall outside what the parties could possibly have contemplated in the suspension clause—in other words, "delay," though literally describing what has occurred, has been read as limited to normal, moderate delay, and as not extending to an interruption so differing in degree and magnitude from anything which could have been contemplated as to differ from it in kind.

Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick Kerr, Ltd. (7) is a good illustration of this. Dick Kerr, Ltd., contracted in July, 1914, to build a reservoir for the water board within six years, with a proviso that if, by reason of any "difficulties, impediments, or obstructions whatsoever and howsoever occasioned, the contractors should, in the opinion of the engineer, have been unduly delayed or impeded in the completion of the contract," it should be lawful for the engineer to grant an extension—in other words, such a delay should neither dissolve the contract nor leave it unaffected, but should suspend its execution. In February, 1916, the Ministry of Munitions required the company to cease work on the contract, thereby making its further performance temporarily illegal. It was held that the provision for extending the time did not apply to the prohibition of the Ministry, but that the interruption created by the prohibition was of such a character and duration as to make the contract when resumed a different contract from the contract broken off. Such a prohibition plainly fell literally within the designation "all difficulties, impediments, or obstructions whatsoever and howsoever occasioned." It was both a difficulty, an impediment and an obstruction, and it was occasioned. It was both a difficulty, an impediment and an obstruction, and it was occasioned somehow, yet it was held that the parties who framed that provision did not and could not have contemplated an interruption of so extreme a nature, and the provision was read as impliedly excluding it. (Compare also Distington Hematite Iron Co., Ltd. v. Possehl & Co. (8)). The famous case of Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (2) illustrates the same process, namely, a restriction imposed on the literal scope of the language actually used by the parties, by implication from what they must have contemplated. In that case a ship was bound under a charterparty to sail in February for Newport "with all convenient speed . . . accidents of navigation excepted." She was stranded on her way to the loading port and was under repair until August—seven months in all. There had nevertheless been no breach of the charterparty by the owners, for the ship had proceeded "with all convenient speed" towards Newport and had only not arrived there because of an "accident of navigation." On a literal construction of the contract, it should still have been open to and obligatory on the owners to perform the chartered voyage in August, but it was held that the seven months' delay would have turned a spring voyage into an autumn voyage, that the parties had contemplated a spring voyage only—this was the basic unexpressed assumption—and that the owners could not claim, nor could the charterers require them, to perform something wholly different in quality, namely, an autumn voyage. A sufficient delay may convert the stipulated adventure into something else, something unstipulated and dehors the contract.

I pass from Jackson's case (2) to Bush v. Whitehaven Port and Town Trustees (1) which is a convenient bridge between the frustration cases and the present one. In Jackson's case (2) as just indicated, an un contemplated turn of events altered the character of a voyage from that of a spring to an autumn voyage. In Bush's case (1) an un contemplated turn of events converted a summer building contract into a winter building contract. In each case a delay or interruption was fundamental enough to transmute the job the contractor had undertaken into a job of a different kind, which the contract did not contemplate and to which it could not apply, although there was nothing in the express language of either contract to limit its operation in this way. Indeed, in Bush's case (1) the contract appeared, on a literal construction, to make express positive provision for the legal consequences of the very event which in fact changed the contract from a summer to a winter one. The event in question was the failure of the defendants to make available the whole of the site, on which the plaintiffs were to erect certain works, in time for the plaintiffs to erect those works during the summer months. The contract, by cl. 11 and 22, read literally, provided that the non-delivery of the site in time to enable the contractor to "commence and continue the works" should not vitiate the contract, nor entitle the contractor to anything except an extension of time (at the discretion of the engineer) which would enable him to avoid the penalties imposed by the penalties clause. It was held, however, that these clauses, though literally applicable, did not apply to a delay in providing the site so extreme as to throw the work from the summer into the winter months and so to revolutionise its character. The works were thrown into, and in fact carried out in, the winter, and the contractor succeeded in a claim to extra payment, based in the alternative on a quantum meruit or a breach of the contract. The basis on which he succeeded was that none of the work he did was done under the contract, and that he was entitled to payment of reasonable remuneration for the work he had actually done under conditions of greater expense. He had in fact been paid at contract rates and, credit being given for those payments, recovered £600 in excess.

In the case now under appeal, as in some of the cases just reviewed, the contractual documents contain terms capable literally of a very wide meaning. The varying deed speaks of the "works," and by its tenth paragraph saves so much of the original contract (including the general conditions) as is consistent with its own terms. No. 1 of the general conditions defines the work as "the work indicated on the drawings and/or described in the specifications and/or bills of quantities including all modified extra or additional works and all obligations performed under the contract." Condition 33, again read literally, gives the commissioners the right "at their absolute discretion" to "modify the extent, character, quantities or dimensions of the work shown or described in the contract" and generally to require the contractor to perform extra work without any express limit as to its quantum or even its character. Literally, therefore, the "work" in the contract as varied includes an unlimited quantity of "extras," but, for the reasons given above, I think the contract as varied should not be construed according to its literal tenor, having regard to the circumstances surrounding the execution in particular of the deed of August, 1937, and the implications, in the light of those circumstances, of the sums of £150,000 and £300,000 expressed in it. In the result, the quantum of work exigible, including extras, is measured by £5,000,000 roughly, the extras constituting about £500,000 worth, at bill of quantities prices, of this total. Some margin above this may be taken as contemplated and covered, but anything resembling £2,000,000 worth of "extras" over and above this is, in my view, impliedly excluded from the contemplation of the parties and the scope of the contract. I, therefore, agree with the order proposed.

SINGLETON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: If one had to consider this matter on the original contract alone, the contractor's difficulties would be almost insurmountable. The commissioners were entitled to call on him to carry out additional works or alterations, and payment for any such works would have been based on the prices in the bills of quantities, which included profit or remuneration for the contractor. The deed of variation introduced an entirely different method of payment. All cost incurred by the contractor had to be paid and a minimum profit was guaranteed and a maximum profit was stipulated. At the time this arrangement was made both parties had in mind work which could be completed by Jan. 30, 1939. I cannot think that the commissioners, or their advisers, thought that there would be any material alteration beyond the £500,000 mentioned in item 57 of the bill of quantities No. 1. If there had been any thought of material increase at that time, surely there would have been something said about it. As the arbitrator found, the object of such a note as that to item 57 is to place the contractor in a position to gauge the probable ambit of the contract and to price the bills of quantities accordingly, having particular regard to the time required for completion. A
B
C

I regard the time factor as of great importance. A "thrust" was being made to have the work completed (using exceptional methods) by Jan. 30, 1939. The additional work which was ordered subsequently, and which was executed, meant that the work could not be completed until early in the year 1940. In other words, the contractor was occupied a year longer on the work than was contemplated, and a year longer than he would have been but for the additional work ordered. The arbitrator finds that the contract time of two years for completion was not sufficient in which to execute the excess quantity of work in addition to the quantity of work in the varied contract. He further states that it is a well recognised usage in the building industry to relate profit remuneration to the actual or estimated cost of the work and to the time required to execute the work. Now, the commissioners must have been well aware of this usage, and both parties had in contemplation work which could be completed by Jan. 30, 1939. At the date of the deed of variation there had been nothing to indicate that the contractor would be called on to execute work which would exceed the stipulated work as defined in para. 8 of the points of claim. Indeed, he had been called on to supply a complete time and progress schedule of the work to be carried out, and early in August, 1937, he had informed Sir James West that it would be possible to complete the work by Jan. 30, 1939, if exceptional methods were used. The arbitrator finds expressly that when the contractor entered into the deed of variation and agreed to a maximum profit, he did not know, and had no reason to believe, that the ultimate quantity of work would or might be greater than the stipulated work, and, further, that the extent of the work which he was ultimately called on to execute was not, and could not have been, appreciated by him. In his further findings of fact (para. 4) the arbitrator concludes that the contractor, on the information available to him in August, 1937, estimated that the cost of the work would be £4 million plus £1 million estimated cost of the exceptional or abnormal methods of working to be adopted to secure completion by Jan. 30, 1939. He adds that there was no evidence enabling him to answer the question whether or not the commissioners had in mind any different estimate at the time. D
E
F
G
H

It is submitted by counsel for the commissioners that this defeats the claim of the contractor in that there is no finding by the arbitrator of a figure which was in the contemplation of both parties. It is, I think, unfortunate that no document in relation to the discussions of August, 1937, was disclosed by the commissioners. I find it difficult to imagine that there could be discussions as to maximum or minimum profit amounting to £300,000 or £150,000, as the case might be, without a memorandum of some kind. No one was called on behalf of the commissioners. In the case of certain subsidiary contracts, the minimum and maximum profits were based on three per cent. and six per cent. respectively of the cost or estimated cost of the work involved. The case for the contractor was that the £150,000 and £300,000 figures were arrived at in the same way, namely, three per cent. and six per cent. on £5 million. I find it difficult to resist this conclusion. No one agrees in advance figures of profit of this nature without some basis on which to work. It would have been easy for someone to have been called on behalf of the commissioners if there was any doubt as to this. I was impressed, too, by the argument based on cl. 8 of the deed of variation, though it may be that the clause is open to more than one construction.

I find myself unable to agree with the submission of counsel for the commissioners that, under the contract as varied by the deed of variation, the contractor would have been bound to continue making alterations and additions, if ordered, for years and years, without any extra payment by way of profit. That would have led to manifest absurdity and injustice, as MATHEW, J., said in Bush v. Whitehaven Port and Town Trustees (1). There must be a limit. I think that LEWIS, J., drew the right inference, and that it was an inference which he was entitled to draw, namely, that at the date of the deed of variation both parties contemplated work which, with the introduction of exceptional methods, would cost approximately £5 million, and that it was on that basis that the maximum profit was agreed at the figure of £300,000. The additional work called for and executed later was something outside the contemplation of the parties in August, 1937. The contractor executed it at the request of the commissioners, and he was entitled to be paid a reasonable profit or remuneration in respect of it. I would dismiss the appeal of the commissioners.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors : J. H. Lambert & Co. (for the contractor) ; Treasury Solicitor (for the commissioners).

[Reported by C. ST. J. NICHOLSON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

F KAYSER v. LONDON PASSENGER TRANSPORT BOARD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Humphreys, J.), January 11, 12, 1950.]

Street Traffic—Duty of driver—Right to proceed when satisfied that persons crossing are out of danger.

Where the driver of a vehicle is satisfied that persons who are lawfully entitled to cross the road, whether they are on a pedestrian crossing or not, are out of any danger from him if he goes on in the normal course, he is entitled to do so, but only at such a pace as will enable him to stop almost immediately should the persons who are crossing do anything dangerous or negligent.

[FOR THE PEDESTRIAN CROSSING PLACES (TRAFFIC) REGULATIONS, 1941, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 34, p. 350.]

Case referred to:

(1) London Passenger Transport Board v. Upson, [1949] 1 All E.R. 60 ; [1949] A.C. 155; [1949] L.J.R. 238.

ACTION for damages for personal injuries.

On May 17, 1946, the plaintiff, a girl aged fourteen (who sued through her mother), was knocked down and injured by a motor omnibus belonging to the defendants, London Passenger Transport Board. It was contended on her behalf that the accident was due (a) to the negligence of the driver of the omnibus, and (b) to breaches of statutory duty on his part, in that (i) he had ignored the indication given by the traffic light signals, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 49, and (ii) he had failed to comply with the provisions of the Pedestrian Crossing Places (Traffic) Regulations, 1941, regs. 3 and 5. The evidence established that there were no breaches of statutory duty on the part of the driver, as the traffic lights were in his favour and the plaintiff was not on the pedestrian crossing at the time when the accident occurred. HUMPHREYS, J., now held that there was no negligence on the part of the driver, and he gave judgment for the defendants. The facts appear in the judgment.

Krikorian for the plaintiff.

Glyn-Jones, K.C., and King Anningson for the defendants.

HUMPHREYS, J.: The accident to the plaintiff happened on May 17, 1946, but the matter was held up until the House of Lords delivered their judgment in London Passenger Transport Board v. Upson (1), in which their Lordships had to consider the Pedestrian Crossing Places (Traffic) Regulations, 1941, reg. 3. I deprecate the view that, if the House of Lords is considering some question, the hearing of any case which relates to that matter should be delayed until the House of Lords have delivered their opinions. The House of Lords do not sit as a tribunal every day, having other duties to perform, and, in consequence, it is often a long time before they are able to announce their decision, with the result that it may be some years before the case which is held over comes on for hearing. It is very difficult to obtain accurate evidence of a momentary happening three or four years previously, as everyone has more or less forgotten what the facts were. In this case the plaintiff was, undoubtedly, knocked down by a motor omnibus belonging to the defendants, but the all-important facts, e.g., what people said at the time of the accident and what the plaintiff's position was when the police constable came up are unknown, because the police officer's notebook, in which all those facts were set out, has been destroyed. Apparently, the police have a rule that police notebooks are to be destroyed at the end of three years. That seems to me to be rather an unfortunate rule, particularly in a case where the police officer has already been subpoenaed to produce his notebook and give his evidence. Naturally, the police officer has forgotten all about the accident, and his notebook is not available.

The best evidence that I have had of the material facts of this case is the evidence of the driver of the omnibus, which was corroborated by other witnesses. His evidence is as follows. As he was going from Cricklewood to Edgware he stopped his omnibus at a compulsory stop at some distance from the pedestrian crossing near Stag Lane and Watling Avenue, both wide thoroughfares leading out of the main road. When the conductor rang the bell to tell him to start again, he did so. At that time there were two trolley buses in front of him, and, as the traffic lights turned green so that he was free to proceed on his way, he did so, following the two trolley buses. When he was about an omnibus length and a half from the lights that controlled the traffic on his side of the road, he saw three pedestrians (two girls and a man) hurrying across the road, holding hands and talking. They were walking, not straight across the road, but diagonally. As it was obvious to him that they would have crossed the road, which was a wide one, before he reached the place where they were crossing, he went on, but, as there was a temporary obstruction, i.e., an air-raid shelter of considerable length and height, which made it difficult for him to see who was on the crossing (even as there was an obstruction, i.e., a taxicab, in London Passenger Transport Board v.

Upson (1) ), he was going very slowly at the time—"cruising" in first gear, as he put it—so that he could put on his brakes and stop within a foot or two if necessary.

The driver said:

A "My eyes then turned to Stag Lane to see if there was any difficulty in Stag Lane. The next thing that I saw was, for some reason—I did not know at the time what it was—these three people scatter. As soon as they did that, I pulled on my brakes. I braked hard. The young man was pulling one of the girls. As my 'bus stopped, I realised that the third person, who disappeared from my view, was just under the 'bus. Fortunately, I stopped so quickly that I had not actually gone over her, but I actually touched her and, no doubt, knocked her down. She was not actually on the crossing. She was going diagonally. She probably had started on the crossing—that is very likely—but she had gone off the crossing and was moving towards . . . her left front. As she lay there, my off wheel had to be moved back about six inches from her. It was actually on her clothes. I should say that, as she lay, she was probably within twelve feet of the crossing and she was at that time quite close to the kerb, and so was I."

This evidence was confirmed by other witnesses, one of whom said that the plaintiff started to run back, probably as a result of seeing that there was something coming in the opposite direction, and, as she ran back, she really ran into the omnibus. She lay just off the crossing, and I do not think that it is material in this case to determine on which side of the crossing she was.

D [HIS LORDSHIP then dealt with the evidence of the plaintiff and continued:] According to the evidence on both sides, the accident happened because the plaintiff, having got half way across the road, suddenly altered her mind—it may have been for a good reason—and decided to run back. If it is the duty of a driver, when he is satisfied that people who are crossing the road are well out of any danger from him, to stop until they have touched the kerb on the other side, the traffic of London could not go on. The law must be, and I hold that it is, that, where a driver is satisfied that persons who are lawfully entitled to cross the road—whether they are on a pedestrian crossing or not—are well out of any danger from him if he goes on in the normal course, he is perfectly entitled to go on, but, of course, only at such a pace as will enable him to stop almost immediately in the unlikely happening of those persons doing something dangerous and negligent themselves. I am satisfied that the driver in this case was driving at such a pace, and the allegation that he was driving too fast is, I think, totally unsupported by any evidence. As the real explanation of the accident was that the plaintiff, having got half way across the road, made up her mind to run back, and, in running back, ran into the omnibus, which was on its proper side of the road, with the lights in its favour, and was going very slowly, there was no negligence on the part of the driver, and for that reason I give judgment for the defendants.

Judgment for the defendants with costs.

Solicitors: Ernest Bevir & Son, agents for Hanchett Copley & Hails, Edgware (for the plaintiff); M. H. B. Gilmour (for the defendants).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

LINDLEY v GEORGE W. HORNER &amp; CO., LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Sellers, JJ.),
January 12, 1950.]

Food and Drugs—Proceedings against manufacturer—Nail found in sweet—Absence of negligence—Liability of manufacturer—Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56), s. 3 (1), s. 83 (3).

The Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 83 (3), provides : " Where it appears to the authority concerned that an offence has been committed in respect of which proceedings might be taken under this Act against some person and the authority are reasonably satisfied that the offence of which complaint is made was due to an act or default of some other person and that the first-mentioned person could establish a defence under sub-s. (1) of this section, they may cause proceedings to be taken against that other person without first causing proceedings to be taken against the first-mentioned person. In any such proceedings the defendant may be charged with and, on proof that the contravention was due to his act or default, be convicted of, the offence with which the first-mentioned person might have been charged."

A customer who had bought some sweets from a retailer discovered a nail in one of them. On an information under s. 83 (3) against the respondents as manufacturers of the sweets, charging them with an offence under s. 3 (1) of the Act in that there had been a sale to the customer of food which was not of the nature, substance, or quality of the article demanded, the magistrate found that the respondents had taken every reasonable precaution to prevent such an occurrence, and dismissed the information.

HELD : s. 3 (1) imposed an absolute duty on the respondents regardless of negligence and, therefore, they should have been convicted of the offence charged.

[FOR THE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT, 1938, s. 83 (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 10, p. 458.]

CASE STATED by Leeds stipendiary magistrate.

On July 19, 1949, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Leeds, an information was preferred by the appellant, an officer of the Public Health Department of the city of Leeds, against the respondents, a firm of sweet manufacturers, charging them under s. 83 (3) of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, with an offence under s. 3 (1) of that Act. On June 9, 1949, a customer bought from a retailer some sweets manufactured by the respondents in one of which was found a nail. It appearing to the local authority that an offence had been committed in respect of which proceedings might have been taken under the Act against the retailer in that the retailer had sold sweets which were not of the nature, substance, or quality of the article demanded by the customer contrary to s. 3 (1) of the Act, and being satisfied that the offence was due to an act or default of the respondents and that the retailer could establish a defence under s. 83 (1), took proceedings against the respondents. The magistrate was of the opinion that the nail had got into the sweet at some point during its manufacture by the respondents and that they had used every reasonable precaution to prevent any such occurrence, and he dismissed the information. The Divisional Court now allowed the appeal and remitted the case with a direction to convict.

Vernon Gattie for the appellant.

Fenwick, K.C., and Norman Harper for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case stated by the learned stipendiary of the city of Leeds, before whom the respondents were charged with an offence against the Food and Drugs Act, 1938.

A woman bought some sweets at a shop and in one of the sweets she found a nail. She handed the sweet containing the nail to an inspector employed by the local authority, and the local authority, having ascertained that the shopkeeper had bought the sweets from the respondents, who were the manufacturers of the sweets, took "third party" proceedings under s. 83 (3) against the respondents, as being the persons whose act or default was responsible for the presence of the nail in the sweet, in contravention of s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1938.

A By s. 83 (1), if the local authority proceeds against the retailer, the retailer can give notice and bring the manufacturer before the court. The retailer can then show that he used all due diligence in carrying on his business with regard to the particular article, and that the extraneous matter which got into the goods was due to the act or default of the manufacturer. By s. 83 (3) it is provided that the local authority may, if they choose, "short-circuit" the matter by proceeding at once against the manufacturer.

B The learned stipendiary has found that all due diligence was used in the manufacture of these articles. That may be, but, nevertheless, a nail was found in the sweet, and that is extraneous matter. If the proceedings had been taken against the retailer, the retailer would have had no defence unless he could have brought himself within that given by s. 4 (4), which provides :

C "Where the food or drug in question contains some extraneous matter, that the presence of that matter was an unavoidable consequence of the process of collection or preparation."

D In my opinion, that sub-section does not cover this case. It cannot be said that the presence of a nail in the sweet was an unavoidable consequence of the process of collection or preparation. The manufacturer or his servant did not notice the nail. If it had been noticed, its presence could have been avoided and it could have been taken out. The Food and Drugs Act imposes absolute duties quite apart from mens rea. Section 83 (3) refers to the "act or default" of the manufacturer and not to a "negligent act or default." It provides that, if the contravention is due to the act or default of the manufacturer, he may be convicted of the offence with which the retailer might have been charged. He must answer for it, whether he has been negligent or not. The court below has confused matters of defence with matters which may be considered in mitigation of sentence. In my opinion, there is no defence here to the summons, although it may be that the magistrate, having heard all the evidence, will think there are matters which can go in mitigation. The case must be remitted to the magistrate with a direction that the offence was proved.

F LYNKEY, J. : I agree.

G SELLERS, J. : I agree.

Appeal allowed with costs. Case remitted with direction to convict.

Solicitors : Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for O. A. Radley, Leeds (for the appellant); Hyde, Mahon & Pascall, agents for Wilkinson & Marshall, Newcastle-on-Tyne (for the respondents).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

---

CHAPELLE v. CHAPELLE.

[MANCHESTER MICHAELMAS ASSIZES (Willmer, J.), November 18, December 15, 1949.]

Divorce—Jurisdiction—Marriage already declared void ab initio by decree of court in Malta in 1944—Legal effect of decree—Petitioner husband domiciled in Malta until 1945—Marriage in England in 1931—Wife domiciled in England until marriage—Domicil of wife after purported marriage—Wife's claim to Maltese domicil founded on marriage.

The parties were married at a register office in England on Nov. 3, 1931. At that time the husband was domiciled in Malta, and until the marriage the wife had been domiciled in England. The wife had been previously married and had been divorced in 1928. Since then she had been resident in Malta, but the parties came to England to be married as re-marriage during the lifetime of the previous spouse of a person whose marriage had been dissolved by civil decree was deemed to be void under Maltese law. After the marriage the husband and wife returned to Malta where they cohabited until 1941. The wife then returned to England and remained there until the present time. In 1943 the husband instituted proceedings for nullity in the Civil Court in Malta, and, by a decree dated Aug. 7, 1944, the Maltese court pronounced the purported marriage to be void ab initio on the ground that it had not been celebrated in accordance with the canon law, and, therefore, could not be recognised in Maltese law. The husband, having acquired an English domicil since 1945, presented a petition for divorce in England, alleging desertion and adultery by the wife, and the preliminary question arose whether it was competent for the court to pronounce a decree of dissolution in respect of a marriage already annulled by decree of the court in Malta. It was contended (inter alia) by the wife that, as the marriage took place in England, her domicil must be determined by English law under which she acquired a Maltese domicil by the marriage, and, therefore, as both parties were domiciled in Malta at the time of the commencement of the Maltese proceedings, the principle in Salvesen v. Austrian Property Administrator ([1927] A.C. 641) applied, and the court was bound to hold that the decree of the court in Malta was binding and conclusive.

HELD : as the court in Malta had pronounced the marriage of 1931 to be void ab initio, the wife could not base her claim to be within the jurisdiction of that court on the ground that she had acquired a Maltese domicil through that marriage; the court in England would not accept as binding a decree of the court in Malta which, by its very terms, destroyed the ground on which the claim to exercise jurisdiction over the wife was based; and, therefore, as the wife had not established a common domicil with the husband in Malta, the principle in Salvesen v. Austrian Property Administrator (supra) could not be applied, and the court had jurisdiction to entertain the husband's petition.

White (otherwise Bennett) v. White ([1937] 1 All E.R. 708), applied.

[AS TO FOREIGN DECREES OF NULLITY OF MARRIAGE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 6, pp. 312-314, para. 365, and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 11, p. 431, Nos. 944-946.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Salvesen (or von Lorang) v. Austrian Property Administrator, [1927] A.C. 641; 96 L.J.P.C. 105; 137 L.T. 571; Digest Supp.
- (2) De Massa (otherwise Horveno) v. De Massa, [1939] 2 All E.R. 150, n.; Digest Supp.
- (3) Galene v. Galene (otherwise Galice), [1939] 2 All E.R. 148; [1939] P. 237; 108 L.J.P. 82; Digest Supp.

- (4) White (otherwise Bennett) v. White, [1937] 1 All E.R. 708 ; [1937] P. 111 ; 106 L.J.P. 49 ; 156 L.T. 422 ; Digest Supp.
- (5) De Reneville v. De Reneville, [1948] 1 All E.R. 56 ; [1948] P. 100 ; [1948] L.J.R. 1761 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (6) Ogden v. Ogden, [1908] P. 46 ; 77 L.J.P. 34 ; 97 L.T. 827 ; 11 Digest 334, 228.

A PRELIMINARY ISSUE on the application of the wife (the respondent) to determine whether the court had jurisdiction to pronounce a decree of dissolution in respect of a marriage already annulled by decree of His Majesty's Civil Court in Malta. The husband was of Maltese domicil until 1945, since when he had acquired an English domicil, and the wife's domicil before the marriage was English. The marriage took place at a register office in England in 1931 and the husband and wife resided together in Malta from 1931 to 1941, the wife then returning to England. In 1944 the husband obtained a decree of nullity in the Civil Court in Malta on the ground that the marriage, not having been celebrated in accordance with the canon law, could not be recognised in Maltese law and was absolutely void ab initio. After acquiring an English domicil, the husband presented a petition for divorce in England and an issue was directed to determine the legal effect of the decree of the court in Malta on the validity of the purported marriage. The wife contended that the court in Malta had jurisdiction to pronounce the decree as both parties were domiciled in Malta, and she based her claim to Maltese domicil on (inter alia) her marriage to a husband domiciled in Malta. The issue was argued before WILLMER, J., at Liverpool Assizes on Nov. 18, 1949, and judgment was given at Manchester Assizes on Dec. 15, 1949.

D WILLMER, J., now held that the wife could not base her claim to be within the jurisdiction of the court in Malta on the fact that she had acquired a Maltese domicil by the marriage because that marriage had been declared by that court to be void ab initio, and he gave judgment for the husband on the preliminary issue. The facts appear in the judgment.

E J. G. Burrell for the wife.
Baucher for the husband.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 15. WILLMER, J., read the following judgment. The material facts in this case are as follows. The petitioner and the respondent (to whom I will refer hereafter as "the husband" and "the wife" respectively) went through a ceremony of marriage on Nov. 3, 1931, at the register office in Lincoln. At that time the husband, who professed the Roman Catholic faith, was domiciled in Malta, and he continued to be so domiciled until about the end of 1945, since when he has acquired an English domicil. The wife, who was a Protestant, was the divorced wife of one Bennet, from whom she was divorced in 1928. Until that time she had an English domicil, and, although it is alleged that during the next three years she was resident in Malta, it is not suggested that prior to the marriage ceremony in 1931 she acquired a Maltese domicil. No civil decree of divorce is recognised by the law of Malta, and, if a person whose marriage has been dissolved by civil decree purports to re-marry during the lifetime of the previous spouse, such re-marriage is deemed to be void in Maltese law. For this reason the parties, though both resident in Malta during 1931, proceeded to England for the express purpose of being married in this country. Thereafter they returned to Malta, and cohabited in Malta as man and wife until 1941. The wife gave birth to two children, both of whom were born on Nov. 13, 1933. Early in 1941 the husband, who was then serving in His Majesty's Forces, was posted to India, and did not return to Malta until 1943. In the meantime the wife left Malta in October, 1941, and returned to England. Since then she has been resident in England, and there has been no further cohabitation between the parties. The husband, by his petition, alleges that the wife deserted him in October, 1941, and further alleges that since that date she has committed adultery with a named co-respondent, and on these grounds he prays for a dissolution of the marriage. In June, 1943, the husband instituted proceedings for nullity in His Majesty's Civil Court in Malta. The wife was not herself present at the hearing, but her legal representatives were heard in opposition to the husband's claim. By a decree dated Aug. 7, 1944, the court in Malta pronounced the purported marriage between the parties to have been null and void. The ground of the decision was that Maltese law—the law of the husband's domicile—did not recognise as valid any form of marriage celebration which did not comply with the requirements of the canon law. It was held, therefore, that the purported marriage in this case, not having been celebrated in accordance with the canon law, was defective in form and, consequently, could not be recognised as valid in Maltese law. It is important to observe that the court in Malta treated the marriage, not as voidable, but as one that was absolutely void ab initio. The wife did not appeal from the decree of the court in Malta, and on being served with the petition in the present case immediately raised the question whether it is competent for this court to pronounce a decree of dissolution in respect of a marriage already annulled by decree of the competent court in Malta. In these circumstances and to avoid the possibility of unnecessary costs being incurred in determining the merits of the husband's petition, an issue was directed to determine the legal effect of the decree of His Majesty's Civil Court in Malta on the validity and subsistence of the purported marriage. The matter was argued before me at Liverpool Assizes on Nov. 18, 1949, when it was contended on behalf of the wife that the decree of the court in Malta should be held to be binding, in which event there could be no subsisting marriage capable of dissolution by decree of this court. On behalf of the husband doubt was expressed as to the legal effect in this country of the decree of nullity obtained in Malta. I was given to understand that the husband's main concern was merely to obtain a definitive ruling from this court so as to safeguard his position if only to the extent of protecting him from a possible charge of bigamy in the event of his being minded to contract a fresh marriage. The questions raised were of some difficulty and novelty, and, having regard to this fact, as well as to the great importance of the matter from the point of view of the parties. I thought it right to take time to consider my judgment.

The argument on behalf of the wife was based on the proposition stated in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., p. 381, r. 73 (1), which is in the following terms :

“ The courts of a foreign country have jurisdiction to pronounce a decree of nullity of marriage if . . . the parties were domiciled in such foreign country at the commencement of the proceedings for nullity.”

This rule is founded on the decision of the House of Lords in Salvesen v. Austrian Property Administrator (1), in which it was held that, where the parties are domiciled in a foreign country, a decree of nullity of marriage pronounced by a competent court of that country will, in the absence of fraud or collusion, be recognised as binding and conclusive by the courts of England and Scotland, unless it offends against British notions of substantial justice. I was referred to De Massa v. De Massa (2) and Galene v. Galene (3), in both of which this court accepted as conclusive and binding French decrees of nullity pronounced in respect of marriages celebrated in this country between parties both of whom were domiciled in France. It was contended that the present case was indistinguishable on the ground that the parties herein were both domiciled in Malta, and, consequently, the Civil Court in Malta was a court of competent jurisdiction to pronounce a decree of nullity. If I accept the premise, namely, that both parties in this case were domiciled in Malta at the time of the commencement of the Maltese proceedings, I have no doubt that the conclusion contended for by the wife would follow, and I should be bound on the authorities to hold that the decree of nullity pronounced by the court in Malta is conclusive. There is no doubt that at the material time the husband was domiciled in Malta. The wife claims a Maltese domicile on two alternative grounds, (a) from the fact of her marriage to a husband domiciled in Malta, or, alternatively, (b) from the fact of her residence in Malta for some ten years following the celebration of the marriage with the intention of remaining there permanently. I will deal first with the former claim, which, to my mind, raises

A a difficult position of law.

The argument of the wife is that her domicile at the material time must be determined by English law. The marriage celebrated between the parties in 1931 was celebrated in England and complied with all the requirements of English law. It is, therefore, contended that by English law the wife acquired the domicile of her husband. On behalf of the husband, however, it is objected that, the court

B in Malta having pronounced the marriage void ab initio, the wife can no longer rely on the fact of her marriage as giving her a Maltese domicile—in other words, the court in Malta, by its own act in pronouncing the decree of nullity, cut away the very ground on which its jurisdiction over the wife was based. Salvesen v. Austrian Property Administrator (1) and the other cases to which I have referred were decided on the basis that the parties unquestionably shared a common

C domicile. In the present case, however, on the basis of the Maltese decree the wife did not acquire a common domicile with her husband from the mere fact of a marriage which, by the self-same decree, was held never to have been a valid marriage at all.

In White v. White (4), it was clearly recognised by BUCKNILL, J., that the principle of Salvesen v. Austrian Property Administrator (1) does not apply

D where there is no common domicile. On this point the decision in White v. White (4) was recently approved by the Court of Appeal in De Reneville v. De Reneville (5). Though the facts of the latter case bear little resemblance to those of the present case, the reasoning of LORD GREENE, M.R. ([1948] 1 All E.R. 60), wherein he stresses the distinction, in relation to domicile in proceedings for nullity, between marriages which are void ab initio and those which are merely voidable, is most

E helpful and instructive. A wife originally domiciled in this country and seeking a decree of nullity here against a husband domiciled abroad must fail if her claim is based on the marriage being voidable, for in that event, until a decree is pronounced, the marriage remains valid, so that the wife will have acquired the husband's foreign domicile. Where, however, the claim is based on the marriage being void ab initio, such a wife may successfully proceed in this country, for

F the effect of the decree for which she asks will be to preserve her English domicile, since in the absence of any valid marriage she will never have acquired her husband's domicile. Conversely, it seems to follow that such a wife, suing abroad in the court of her husband's domicile, shares a common domicile with her husband in the case of a marriage which is merely voidable, but not if the marriage is void ab initio. The view is expressed in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed.,

G p. 383, para. (d), that, where a husband domiciled abroad obtains in the court of his own domicile a decree of nullity in respect of a marriage void ab initio, this court will accept the foreign decree as binding only if this court is itself satisfied that the marriage is void in the sense that no decree of the court would have been required to avoid it. That, however, is hardly the case here. Here we have a marriage which was, undoubtedly, celebrated in accordance with the

H requirements of English law, the validity of which, but for the decree of the Maltese court, could not be questioned, nor could there be any question but that, under English law, the wife, by her marriage, must be regarded as having acquired her husband's domicile in Malta. In such circumstances is this court bound to accept as conclusive a decree of the Maltese court annulling a marriage which would clearly be valid by English law as against a wife who, unless for any other reason she acquired a Maltese domicile, must by the terms of the decree itself be regarded as still domiciled in England? There is no authority, so far as I am aware, that is directly in point. The question is exhaustively discussed in CHESHIRE ON PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, 3rd ed., p. 464, but no opinion is expressed as to what the correct answer may be. Indeed, the learned author leaves the question with the remark:

"It is impossible to foresee what course the English court will adopt when confronted with a problem of this nature."

The nearest case which I have been able to find is Ogden v. Ogden (6). In that case a woman domiciled in England had married a domiciled Frenchman in circumstances which rendered the marriage voidable under French law. In due course the French court pronounced a decree of nullity at the suit of the French husband. The woman purported to contract a fresh marriage with another man in this country. In subsequent proceedings instituted by the second "husband" in this country it was held by the Court of Appeal that the French decree of nullity in respect of the first marriage was not binding in this country, with the result that in the eye of the law in this country the woman remained married to her original French husband. The actual decision of this case was clearly at variance with the decision in Salvesen v. Austrian Property Administrator (1), and must be taken to be overruled by the House of Lords in the latter case, for in Ogden's case (6) the marriage, being merely voidable, remained valid until avoided. Consequently the woman by her marriage acquired her first husband's French domicile, and, therefore, in accordance with the principles stated in Salvesen's case (1), the decree of the French court, being the court of the common domicile, ought to have been accepted as binding and conclusive in this country, but, in the course of delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, SIR GORELL BARNES, P., expressed the view ([1908] P. 78) that, if no valid marriage ever took place, the woman could never have acquired a French domicile, and it was, apparently, on that ground that the court (erroneously, as it proved) came to the conclusion that the French decree was not binding. The House of Lords, in Salvesen's case (1), while disapproving the actual decision in Ogden's case (6), were careful to express no dissent from the reasoning of SIR GORELL BARNES, P., but distinguished the case on the ground that in Salvesen's case (1) there was no doubt as to the common domicile of the parties in Germany: see per VISCOUNT HALDANE ([1927] A.C. 660), VISCOUNT DUNEDIN (ibid., p. 662) and LORD PHILLIMORE (ibid., 669, 670). In my judgment, if and so far as the wife's claim to have acquired a Maltese domicile depends on the fact of her marriage, I shall be, not departing from the principle laid down in Salvesen's case (1), but rather following the reasoning of the members of the House of Lords in the passages to which I have referred, if I hold, as I do hold, that this court will not accept as binding a decree of the court in Malta which, by its very terms, destroys the one and only ground on which the claim to exercise jurisdiction over the wife could be based. I do not think that the wife can, at one and the same time, claim a common domicile with her husband in Malta, and yet rely on the decree of the Maltese court which destroys the foundation on which that claim is based.

This, however, does not dispose of the matter for, as already pointed out, the wife claims that, quite apart from the effect of her marriage, she acquired a domicile of choice in Malta by her conduct in taking up residence with the husband in Malta with the intention of remaining there permanently. On the facts stated in the respective affidavits I can have no doubt that she did so acquire a domicile of choice in Malta, but the question remains whether she still retained her domicile of choice at the time when the proceedings in Malta were commenced. If she did, then notwithstanding what I have said as to the effect of the marriage, there would quite clearly, for other reasons, be a common domicile in Malta. In that event I should clearly be bound, on the authority of Salvesen's case (1), to hold that the decree of the court in Malta, being a decree of the court of common domicile, was binding and conclusive. I am, however, unable to come to any conclusion on this question, because the facts on which its determination must depend are not yet fully before the court. If the husband is right in his assertion that the wife deserted him and left Malta for good in the autumn of 1941, a fortiori if she did so with the intention of living in adultery with the co-respondent in England, I should have no difficulty in concluding that long before the commencement of the husband's proceedings in Malta she had lost any right to assert a domicile of choice in Malta founded on her residence there. On this basis of facts, if the wife cannot rely on the marriage as conferring on her a Maltese domicile, I do not see how she is any better off by alleging a Maltese domicile based on residence. The wife has not yet pleaded to the husband's petition, and I do not know what her version of the material facts may be. In the circumstances it is impossible for me to reach any final determination of this question on the materials at present before me. Certainly I cannot reach a decision which would have the effect of halting the husband's petition in limine. The question whether the wife still retained her domicile of choice in Malta at the time when the Maltese proceedings were commenced can only be determined on the trial of the suit, when all the material facts have been proved in evidence. In the circumstances I think that this point must be kept open by leaving the wife free, if so advised, to allege in her answer that at the time when the husband commenced his proceedings in Malta she still retained a Maltese domicile by reason of her continued intention to reside in Malta. If she succeeds in establishing such a state of facts, it will still be open to her to contend at the trial that the decree of nullity pronounced by the court in Malta ought to be accepted by this court as binding and conclusive. For the reasons already given, however, in so far as the determination of this issue depends on the wife's acquisition of a Maltese domicile by reason of the marriage, my judgment must be in favour of the husband and against the wife. I cannot say, on the materials at present before me, that the decree of the Civil Court in Malta is conclusive to show that the marriage now sought to be dissolved is non-existent.

Judgment for the husband on the preliminary issue. No order as to costs.

Solicitors: Silverman & Livermore, Liverpool (for the wife); Edwin Berry & Co., Liverpool (for the husband).

[Reported by MISS M. D. CHORLTON, Barrister-at-Law.]

J.R.P. PLASTICS, LTD. v. GORDON ROSSALL PLASTICS, LTD. (HEXA PEN CO., LTD., CLAIMANTS).

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Sellers, JJ.), January 13, 1950.]

Interpleader—Claim—Power of master to bar—Signature to claim by director of company in wrong capacity—Validity of claim—Competence of action by claimants against execution creditors—R.S.C., Ord. 57, r. 10, r. 16 (1).

R.S.C., Ord. 57, r. 10 provides: "If a claimant [in interpleader proceedings], having been duly served with a summons calling on him to appear and maintain, or relinquish, his claim, does not appear in pursuance of the summons, or, having appeared, neglects or refuses to comply with any order made after his appearance, the court or a judge may make an order declaring him, and all persons claiming under him, for ever barred against the applicant, and persons claiming under him, but the order shall not affect the rights of the claimants as between themselves."

A sheriff, who had levied execution on the goods of the defendants, G.R.P., Ltd., on behalf of the plaintiffs, received a letter on notepaper headed: "The H.P. Co., Ltd.," giving the telephone numbers and the address of that company, and stating that the directors were G. and another. The letter read: "Dear Sir, Please take notice that we, the H.P. Co., Ltd., claim as our property the whole of goods and chattels at the above address, [specifying them]. Yours faithfully, For G.R.P., Ltd., G., Director." G. was a director of both the defendants, G.R.P., Ltd., and the claimants, H.P. Co., Ltd. The sheriff interpleaded, and then applied under R.S.C., Ord. 57, r. 10, for an order that the claimants be barred against him (the sheriff). Two affidavits were filed by G., one stating that the claimants had bought all the goods of the defendants, but not setting out any receipt, cheque or banking account, and the other explaining why he signed the notice as a director of the defendants instead of as a director of the claimants. The master made an order that the claimants be barred and that no action be brought against the sheriff.

HELD: (i) the notice of the claim by the H.P. Co., Ltd., did not require a signature and was not rendered invalid by the fact that G. had signed it in his capacity as a director of the defendants, because the signature, which was in any event unnecessary, could not have misled anyone.

(ii) the master's only power of barring a claim arose under Ord. 57, r. 10, and, as the claimants had appeared, had made out a claim, however nebulous it might be, and had not neglected or refused to comply with any order made after their appearance, the master had no jurisdiction to make the order, which would be set aside, and an issue would be directed between the claimants and the plaintiffs.

Per curiam: Even if the conditions of Ord. 57, r. 10, had been fulfilled and the claimants were barred against the sheriff, they were not barred from bringing an action against the plaintiffs if their (the claimants') goods were seized and sold.

Per LYNKEY, J.: If the notice of the claimants' claim had been invalid, the master's only power would have been to refuse the sheriff's application for an interpleader issue.

[AS TO THE CLAIM AND THE ORDER ON AN INTERPLEADER, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edition, Vol. 18, pp. 615, 616, 620-623, paras. 1009, 1010, 1017-1025; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 29, pp. 475, 476, 478, 479, Nos. 247-256, 284-297.]

APPEAL by the claimants against an order of Master Moseley made on an interpleader summons under R.S.C., Ord. 57, r. 10, declaring that the claimants were barred and that no action be brought against the sheriff (the applicant on the interpleader summons). The claimants' claim had been signed by a director of the claimant company who was also a director of the defendant company and who had described himself in signing the claim as acting in his capacity as a director of the defendant company. In affidavits in support of the claim, the said director gave only vague and nebulous particulars thereof. The plaintiffs, the execution creditors, contended that the claim was bad. The claimants argued that the claim was valid and that the order was bad, and that an issue should have been directed between the plaintiffs and the claimants. The Divisional Court allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Boreham for the claimants, Hexa Pen Co., Ltd.

Asher for the plaintiffs, J.R.P. Plastics, Ltd.

Harold Brown for the applicant, the Sheriff of Kent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is an appeal against an order of Master Moseley, made, on a sheriff's interpleader, in these terms:

"Upon hearing the solicitors for the plaintiffs, the defendants and for the sheriff for the county of Kent and upon reading the affidavits of G. St.

Clere-Smithe filed Sept. 9, 1949, it is ordered that the claimants be barred and that no action be brought against the above-named sheriff."

No reason why he barred the claim appears in the body of the order, as is contemplated by Form No. 50 in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, Appendix K. Counsel for the claimants contends that the master had no power to make that order, and that he ought to have directed an issue. In my opinion, though the matter comes before the court in a somewhat curious position, I think that argument is right.

Judgment having been obtained by the plaintiffs, J.R.P. Plastics, Ltd., against the defendants, Gordon Rossall Plastics, Ltd., a letter was written to the sheriff on notepaper headed "The Hexa Pen Co., Ltd.," giving the telephone number and the address of the latter company and stating that the directors were G. St. Clere-Smithe and R. Cloud, saying:

"Dear Sir, Please take notice that we, the Hexa Pen Co., Ltd., claim as our property the whole of goods and chattels at the above address, including furniture and pen parts, motors, ink, etc., with the exception of small quantity of plastic goods to the value of approximately £5 to £10. Yours faithfully, For Gordon Rossall Plastics, Ltd., G. St. Clere-Smithe, Director."

It appears that Mr. St. Clere-Smithe is a director both of the Hexa Pen Co., the claimants, and of the defendants, and the two are so identified in his own mind that he apparently forgot whether he was signing this as a director of the defendants or of the claimants. It is said that that letter is a bad notice, or that the claim therein made is a bad one.

When the matter came before the master, an affidavit was filed by the said Mr. St. Clere-Smith. He states that there were two companies, the defendants and the claimants, and the claimants bought all the goods of the defendants. He does not set out a single receipt or cheque, banking account or anything else. It is the vaguest of claims and no one could blame the master if he thought there was very little in it. He adjourned the summons (there seems to be no agreement why) and the same director made a further affidavit in which he explained, and endeavoured to excuse himself for, his having signed the notice as a director of the defendants instead of as a director of the claimants.

Order 57 (which now contains the whole of the law and practice on interpleader) provides by r. 16:

"(1) Where a claim is made to or in respect of any goods or chattels taken in execution under the process of the court it shall be in writing with the address of the claimant thereon, and such address shall be the address for service of the claimant."

I do not think this signature can have misled anybody because the notice is written on the claimants' paper, it is shown thereon that Mr. St. Clere-Smithe is a director of the claimants, and the document gives the name and address of the claimants because it says "... we, the Hexa Pen Co., Ltd., claim ..." The rule says nothing about signature, and it would be a perfectly good claim, as far as I can see, if the notice was simply: "Take notice that the Hexa Pen Co., Ltd., of" a stated address "claim these goods," whether it was signed or not. The object of the claim is simply to give notice to the sheriff that somebody is disputing his right at the instance of the execution creditor, to seize certain goods because they belong to somebody else.

The sheriff, when given that notice, has two courses open to him. He can ignore the notice, in which case, if he sells the goods and it turns out that they were the property of the person who sent him the notice, he will be answerable in conversion to that person. For the protection of the sheriff the alternative course, the interpleader proceeding, is devised.

The sheriff, when given that notice, has two courses open to him. He can ignore to the plaintiffs, the execution creditors, and to the Hexa Pen Co., Ltd., the claimants. It may well be that the master said: "Let us get this matter clear first; let us clear up this question of how this signature comes on the notepaper," but I am bound to say that I can find no power in the master to direct anybody to serve another claim, and if another claim had been served, it seems to me that the sheriff would have had to begin all over again. The sheriff, having taken out his interpleader summons, cannot be heard to say, and, to do him justice, he does not say, that he did not understand that this was a claim by the Hexa Pen Co. It was because he did understand it was a claim by the Hexa Pen Co. that he took out the interpleader summons. There being an interpleader summons before the court, an affidavit was put in and, though one might come to the conclusion it was somewhat sketchy and strongly suspect that there was no genuine claim, there was a claim. The claim is set out, and it is said that the Hexa Pen Co. bought the goods, and some particulars are given of how they came to buy them.

A second affidavit was filed, and having regard to its terms the explanation which counsel for the sheriff was instructed to give us looked to me to be probably correct; but I do not think it is at all material. The deponent explains how he came to sign in the way he did, and repeats allegations about buying these goods, explaining how it was that in his claim he excepted the sum of £5 or £10 worth of goods. The master barred the claim, and not only that, he barred the claimants from bringing any action.

Let us see what power he had to do that. His only power of barring the claim arises under Ord. 57, r. 10:

"If a claimant, having been duly served with a summons calling on him to appear and maintain, or relinquish, his claim, does not appear in pursuance of the summons, or, having appeared, neglects or refuses to comply with any order made after his appearance, the court or a judge may make an order declaring him, and all persons claiming under him, for ever barred against the applicant, and persons claiming under him, but the order shall not affect the rights of the claimants as between themselves."

That rule, no doubt, would considerably affect many cases in which the person interpleading was not a sheriff but a stakeholder, but it seems to me that under this rule, as the sheriff is the applicant, the only effect of barring the claim is to bar the bringing of an action against the sheriff. It is true that the form of the order in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, Appendix K not only refers to barring the claim but goes on to say that no action shall be brought against the sheriff. What is the reason for saying that no action shall be brought against the sheriff in a sheriff's interpleader I do not know, for, if the claim is barred, the barring of the claim itself prevents an action being brought against the sheriff.

It seems to me that this order provides only that the claimants shall not bring any action against the sheriff, but it has not said what is to happen between the claimants and the plaintiffs, the execution creditor. That is left in the air. The claimants do not appear to me to be barred even under the terms of this order from bringing an action against the plaintiffs if their goods are seized and sold. Under this order they cannot bring an action against the sheriff, but that is all. On the other hand, it is complained here that this purports to dispose of the matter altogether, and that everything is left in the air and there is no direction as to what is to happen now. I think, therefore, that the court ought to set aside the order of the master, and we ought to direct an issue and that in the issue the claimants should be the plaintiffs and the execution creditors should be the defendants. [The claimants and the plaintiffs having agreed that the matter should be dealt with in a summary way, HIS LORDSHIP continued:] The court having clarified the matter to this extent, the parties may go back and ask a master, who should not, I think, in fairness to both parties be the master who made this order which we are reversing, to dispose of the matter in a summary way.

LYNSKEY, J.: I agree and have very little to add, but this is a matter of some importance in interpleader procedure, and I think it is desirable to state my reasons for supporting my Lord's judgment. The position is that under Ord. 57, r. 5, an applicant, whether he be a sheriff or whether he be a stakeholder, when he has received a claim can take out a summons calling on the claimant and the other party interested to appear and state the nature and particulars of the claim. The powers of a master or of a judge in dealing with these matters are defined by the rules of court and depend on the rules of court, and when that summons comes before a master or a judge, r. 7, r. 8 and r. 9 deal with the position if the claimant appears. Rule 7 provides that, if there is an action already in being, then the claimant may be made the defendant to the action, or the judge or the court may direct an issue to be joined between the parties. Rule 8 provides that, if the amount involved is small and only one claimant consents, the matter may be dealt with summarily by the court or the judge before whom the summons is heard. By r. 9:

"Where the question is a question of law, and the facts are not in dispute, the court or a judge may either decide the question without directing the trial of an issue, or order that a Special Case be stated for the opinion of the court . . ."

Those are the three rules which deal with the position when the claimant appears. There are also one or two Acts of Parliament which deal with the matter, such as the County Courts Act, 1934, which, by s. 66 enables the master to transfer the whole issue to the county court.

Rule 10 deals with the position if the claimant is in default, either by not appearing, or by failing to carry out some order of the court or the judge dealing with the matter. It is only under r. 10 that jurisdiction is conferred on a master or a judge, before the issue is directed, to make an order barring the claim and preventing proceedings against the sheriff. Unless, in a particular case, the facts can be brought within the ambit of r. 10, there is no power in the master, or in the judge for that matter, hearing it, to make such an order.

In this case, the claimants did appear. They did state the nature of their claim, however nebulous that claim might appear to be from the point of view of the lack of supporting material, and, in those circumstances, they were not in default in carrying out any order made by the master. No such default has been proved before us. In those circumstances, the master in this case, in my view, had no power under the rules to make the order which he in fact did make. If the contention of the plaintiffs, the execution creditors, is right, that there was no notice, or no proper notice, the only power the master had was to refuse the sheriff's application for an interpleader issue on the ground that there was no basis for the sheriff as applicant, to call on the claimants to come in. That being the position, in my view, this court ought to allow this appeal and the order should be made which my Lord has already indicated.

SELLERS, J.: I agree.

Order of the master set aside. Direction that an issue be stated and tried summarily, the claimants being the plaintiffs and the execution creditor the defendant. Claimants' costs of appeal in any event. The sheriff to pay his own costs.

Solicitors: Temple & Co. (for the appellants); Sanders & Co. (for the respondents); Palmer, Bull & Mant (for the Sheriff of Kent).

[Reported by F. A. AMES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

COPPS v. PAYNE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Sellers, JJ.), January 12, 1950.]

Railway—Level crossing—Gate—Duty to close—Accommodation road converted into public highway—Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (c. 20), s. 47, s. 75.

The respondent, having opened the gates on both sides of a railway crossing and crossed the line, failed to close them. Charged with an offence under the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 75, he contended that, although at the time when the railway line was laid the crossing was an accommodation crossing within s. 75, the road which the railway crossed had since become a public highway, and, therefore, it was the duty of the Railway Executive under s. 47 of the Act to employ persons to operate the gates.

HELD : the time at which the obligations imposed on the railway company and members of the public by the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, had to be ascertained was that when the railway was constructed ; there was nothing in the Act which displaced the obligation under s. 75 to shut gates at an accommodation crossing at any future time in the event of an occupation road becoming a public highway ; and, therefore, the respondent was guilty of the offence charged.

[AS TO LEVEL CROSSINGS OVER RAILWAYS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 27, pp. 86, 87, paras. 172-174 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 38, pp. 317, 318, Nos. 363-366.]

Case referred to :

- (1) A.-G. v. Great Northern Ry. Co., [1916] 2 A.C. 356 ; 85 L.J.Ch. 717 ; 115 L.T. 235 ; 80 J.P. 337 ; 38 Digest 274, 136.

CASE STATED by Essex justices.

On May 3, 1949, a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Castle Hedingham, Essex, discussed an information preferred by the appellant, a constable in the Railway Executive Police, under the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 75, against the respondent alleging that he omitted to shut and fasten gates set up on either side of a railway for the accommodation of the owners or occupiers of the adjoining lands after he and the carriage under his care had passed over the crossing. When the railway was built the road leading to the gates was an occupation road for the use of the owners or occupiers of the adjoining land and the gates on either side of the railway were set up pursuant to the provisions of s. 68 of the Act, the crossing being an accommodation crossing, but since 1930 the road had become repairable by the inhabitants at large and its maintenance had been undertaken by the highway authority. Until 1929 the railway company employed men each weekday from about 5.30 a.m. to 9.30 p.m. to open and close the gates. The justices, being of opinion that, by providing persons to open and close the gates, the predecessors of the Railway Executive had relieved users of the crossing of the duty of closing the gates which divided one highway from another highway, and that the gates were no longer provided for the accommodation of the owners or occupiers of adjoining lands within the meaning of s. 75, dismissed the information. The Divisional Court now allowed the appellant's appeal and remitted the case to the justices with a direction to convict.

T. F. Southall for the appellant.

Hines for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by Essex county justices before whom the respondent was charged with an offence under s. 75 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The question raised is: Is there a duty on the Railway Executive to provide someone to open and shut these gates or must the gates at this level crossing be shut by the persons using them ? In my opinion, it is clear that the latter is the correct interpretation of the section.

The line of railway in question was part of the old Great Eastern Railway, and it was constructed under the Great Eastern Railway Act, 1862, which incorporated the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The Act of 1845 deals with the laying and making of railways, and it lays down certain obligations and duties on the railway company and on other persons. Before s. 46, which is the beginning of a fasciculus of sections dealing with the crossing of roads and the construction of bridges, the Act provides:

“ . . . with respect to the crossing of roads, or other interference therewith, be it enacted as follows:”.

By s. 47:

“ If the railway cross any turnpike road or public carriage road on a level, the company shall erect and at all times maintain good and sufficient gates across such road, on each side of the railway, where the same shall communicate therewith, and shall employ proper persons to open and shut such gates.”

So, if the railway crosses a public road, the obligation is on the railway company to provide gates and also persons to open and shut them. Later sections deal with the accommodation of persons owning lands adjoining the railway. By s. 68:

“ The company shall make and at all times thereafter maintain the following works for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers of lands adjoining the railway . . . ”

Among the works they shall make and thereafter maintain are gates for the accommodation of people living in the neighbourhood of the railway. Section 75 provides:

“ If any person omit to shut and fasten any gate set up at either side of the railway for the accommodation of the owners or occupiers of the adjoining lands as soon as he and the carriage, cattle, or other animals under his care have passed through the same, he shall forfeit for every such offence any sum not exceeding 40s.”

Therefore, there is an obligation on the company to set up gates for the accommodation of adjoining owners and an obligation on the persons using the gates to keep them shut. That seems a very reasonable provision because the gates are put up for the accommodation of people living on either side of the railway, and it seems right that the persons using the gates should shut the gates which the company have to provide for them and not require the company to keep servants at the gates to attend to them.

The facts found in this case are:

“ The said gates are set up on either side of the railway where a road and public footpath cross the railway and each gate carries a notice to the effect that failure to close the gates entails a penalty of 40 shillings. The said road and footpath lead off directly from the public highway. The said road runs to Borley Hall and Mill only and goes no further.”

It is set out that the railway was built by the Great Eastern Railway Company, under the provisions of the Great Eastern Railway Act, 1862, which incorporated the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. It is found:

“ At the time that the railway was built, the said road to Borley Hall and Mill was an occupation road for the use of the owners or occupiers of Borley Hall and Mill and the gates on either side of the railway were set up pursuant to the provisions of s. 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation

Act, 1845, and the crossing was an 'accommodation crossing.' Having regard to the changes in motive power of road and agricultural vehicles the volume of traffic using the crossing has not materially increased nor has it materially changed in character since the railway was built. The road is used only by vehicles owned by or having business with the owners or occupiers of Borley Hall and Mill."

It is next found that until May 31, 1929, the railway company employed men to open and shut the gates between 5.30 a.m. and about 9.30 p.m., and that:

"In the year 1930 and afterwards the repair and maintenance of the road to Borley Hall and Mill was and still is the responsibility of the highway authority."

In other words, it had become a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large though there was no evidence to show how long before 1930 the road had become so repairable. The justices held

"that, by providing persons to open and close the said gates, the predecessors of the Railway Executive had relieved the respondent of the duty of closing the said gates which divided one highway from another highway, and that, in consequence, the said gates were not gates for the accommodation of the owners or occupiers of adjoining lands within the meaning of the said s. 75."

Counsel for the respondent has not argued that the fact that the company did for some time provide men to open and close the gates can make any difference in law. He argued that, as the road has become repairable by the inhabitants at large, and, therefore, was a public road, and as the railway crosses that road, the obligation is on the company to provide servants to open and shut the gates under s. 47, and that the obligation under s. 75 on the persons using the road no longer exists. In my opinion that is not sound. The question turns entirely on these few sections, and it seems to me clear that one has to look at what happened when the gates were erected. If the railway, when it was constructed, crossed a public road, then, as I have already said, the company had not only to erect the gates but also to maintain them and employ persons to open and shut them. If when the line was made gates were erected for the accommodation of persons living in the neighbourhood of the line, the obligation on the company was to set up gates, and the obligation as regards opening and closing them was on the persons using them. I can find nothing in the Act to suggest that an alteration in the character of the road alters the obligations which were imposed at the time when the line was made and the gates were erected. Those obligations remain so long as the gates are there. LYNSEY, J., called attention during the argument to a passage in LORD SUMNER's speech in A.-G. v. Great Northern Ry. Co. (1) ([1916] 2 A.C. 380), a case relating to bridges, in which he points out that the sections take no account, as he puts it, of "dis-turnpiking" the road. In other words, no change in the character of the road made any difference with regard to the respective obligations of the railway company and the public in that case, and so exactly, I think, is the case here. For these reasons I think the justices came to a wrong decision, and the case must go back to them with a direction to convict. In my view, the Railway Executive are not under any obligation to provide persons to open and shut these gates. The obligation of closing them is on the persons who use them.

LYNSEY, J.: I agree. I only desire to add that s. 68 of the Act of 1845 provides:

"The company shall make and at all times thereafter maintain the following works for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers of lands adjoining the railway; (that is to say), such and so many convenient gates, bridges, arches, culverts, and passages, over, under, or by the sides of or leading to or from the railway, as shall be necessary for the purpose of making good any interruptions caused by the railway to the use of the lands through which the railway shall be made; and such works shall be made forthwith after the part of the railway passing over such lands shall have been laid out or formed, or during the formation thereof . . .”

A That is the obligation on the railway company to provide what are now known as accommodation crossings, that is to say, crossings for the accommodation of land over which the company have taken their railway to enable the occupiers of those lands to pass to and fro over the railway. The justices find as a fact that at the time when the railway was built the crossing was an accommodation crossing. There is no suggestion that there was not evidence on
B which they could find that this was a crossing which was set up for the accommodation of the owners or occupiers of the adjoining lands—in other words, a crossing which comes within the exact words of s. 75. The only suggestion made by the respondent is that the result of this road becoming a public highway is to impose on the company the obligation placed on them by s. 47 of the Act. The title of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, shows its objects:

C “An Act for consolidating in one Act certain provisions usually inserted in Acts authorising the making of railways.”

The whole object was to provide clauses which would be incorporated in private Acts passed to enable undertakers to form and erect railways, and, in my view,
D the provisions of s. 47 must be read in the light of that intention. When s. 47 uses the words

“If the railway cross any turnpike road or public carriage road on a level, the company shall erect and at all times maintain good and sufficient gates across such road . . .”

E the time at which the obligation has to be fulfilled by the company is the time of the construction of the railway. There is no obligation imposed on them at any future time in the event of an occupation road becoming a public road. In my view, therefore, this case must go back to the justices with a direction to convict.

F SELLERS, J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed; case remitted with direction to convict.

Solicitors: E. Coleby, Regional Solicitor, Eastern Region Railway Executive (for the appellant); F. G. Perks, agents for Bates, Wells & Braithwaite, Sudbury (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

---

WILLIAMS AND ANOTHER v. CARDIFF CORPORATION.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Jenkins, L.J.J., and Romer, J.), January 11, 12, 1950.]

Negligence—Licensee—Child—Trap—Waste land used for tipping—Child falling down sloping bank and being injured by broken glass.

A
A child, aged four and a half, met with an accident while playing on a piece of waste ground which belonged to the defendants and was used by them for tipping rubbish. The ground, which was not fenced in and on which there was no warning notice, comprised a piece of flat ground with a grass bank which sloped down steeply about eight feet and was littered with pieces of broken glass and tins. The child fell down the slope and cut his nose on a piece of broken glass. Children played on the ground every day and it was conceded by the defendants that the child was a licensee. In an action by the child (through his father) claiming damages for personal injury arising out of the negligence of the defendants,

B
C
HELD: in the case of children the presence of broken glass on the piece of waste ground where the children were constantly allowed to play constituted a trap or concealed danger, and, therefore, the defendants were liable.

[AS TO DEGREE OF CARE REQUIRED TOWARDS CHILDREN, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, pp. 584-586, para. 836; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 69, 70, Nos. 441-453.]

Cases referred to:

- D
E
(1) Liddle v. North Riding of Yorkshire County Council, [1934] 2 K.B. 101; 103 L.J.K.B. 527; 151 L.T. 202; 98 J.P. 319; Digest Supp.
(2) Morley v. Staffordshire County Council, [1939] 4 All E.R. 92; Digest Supp.
(3) Cooke v. Midland Great Western Ry. of Ireland, [1909] A.C. 229; 78 L.J.P.C. 76; 100 L.T. 626; 36 Digest 70, 450.
(4) Glasgow Corpn. v. Taylor, [1922] 1 A.C. 44; 91 L.J.P.C. 49; 126 L.T. 262; 86 J.P. 89; 36 Digest 70, 453.
(5) Addie, R. & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck, [1929] A.C. 358; 98 L.J.P.C. 119; 140 L.T. 650; Digest Supp.

F
G
APPEAL by the defendant corporation from an order of His Honour JUDGE L. C. THOMAS, at Cardiff and Barry County Court, dated Aug. 5, 1949, whereby he gave judgment for the infant plaintiff (who sued through his father) in an action claiming damages for personal injury arising out of the negligence of the corporation. The infant plaintiff was injured by a piece of broken glass when he fell down a sloping bank on a piece of waste land which belonged to the corporation and was used by them for tipping rubbish. The Court of Appeal now held that the piece of land, littered with broken glass, constituted a trap for children, and they dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

F. D. Walters for the corporation.

David Pennant for the plaintiff.

H
SOMERVELL, L.J.: The claim in this case is by an infant, who was aged four and a half years at the time of the accident and sues by his father for damages for personal injury. The injury arose while the child was on a piece of waste land, which was the property of the defendants, the Cardiff Corporation. The evidence given on behalf of the child is shortly summarised in the learned judge's notes and is to this effect. The piece of waste ground, which was near the child's home, had been used by the corporation for tipping rubbish and sweepings for some eight years, but it was not fenced off and there were no notices on it. It comprised a piece of flat ground with a bank which sloped down fairly steeply about eight feet, and was littered with broken bottles, old bedsteads, etc. The learned judge stated in his notes: "Children play there every day." On Feb. 12 the child's father heard him screaming and found blood and mud on his face. A scar was shown to the learned judge. The father stated that the child had had several smackings for going on to the ground, but that there was nothing to stop children getting on the land from the road. In cross-examination, he said: "Explained to child not to go there because of bottles." His evidence was supported by another witness, who said: "Children play there every day." The corporation called no evidence, and counsel for the corporation conceded that the site was used as a tip for rubbish. He also conceded that the child was a licensee, and I think that that would be the inevitable inference from the evidence which had been given as to the frequency with which children played there. It is not contested that the child rolled down the bank and so came into contact with the broken glass. The learned judge decided that the corporation were liable. In his notes he summarised his findings as follows:

"The tip in question was adjacent to the house where the child resided and, in so far as it may be a question of fact, I find further (i) that the defendants knew or ought to have known that children played there; (ii) that the tip with its bottles and cans constituted an 'allurement'; (iii) that the child did not know or could not be taken to have knowledge that there was any danger in playing on the tip. I held, therefore, that the particulars of negligence set out in the particulars of claim had been proved and that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment for the amount claimed."

I will deal first with an argument which counsel for the corporation pressed on us and which he also pressed on the learned judge. He submitted that the accident was the falling down the bank; that the bank, being obvious, could not be a trap or an allurement in the sense in which those words are used in this class of case; and, therefore, that the accident was caused by something which did not give rise to liability. If—and he disputed that this inference was one which could be drawn—the child's injuries were due to glass, that was not the cause of the accident, but the cause of the injury. There are thus two points in the argument, and I will express my view about both of them. With regard to the second point, it seems to me, on the evidence set out in the learned judge's notes and having regard to the medical report showing the nature of the injury to the child's nose, to be plain that it was the kind of injury or cut which might well be caused by a piece of broken glass. I think that in those circumstances, having regard to the evidence that there was broken glass lying about on this piece of waste land where children were allowed to play, the learned judge was entitled to draw the inference, which, I think, it is plain he must have drawn, that the injury was caused by the broken glass. On the first point, I cannot accept the distinction which counsel for the corporation sought to draw, viz., that the injury from the broken glass was not the accident, but that the accident was the rolling down the bank and that the injury could be separated from it. The accident seems to me to be the single occurrence of rolling down the bank at the base of which there was a piece of broken glass on to which the child fell and cut his nose. On that view of the facts it seems to me impossible to say that the learned judge went wrong in law.

I do not propose to review all the authorities cited to us, but I will refer to one or two passages on which counsel for the corporation particularly relied. In Liddle v. North Riding of Yorkshire County Council (1) SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1934] 2 K.B. 112):

"In my opinion, to make the landowner liable for injury to a child on his land, it must be proved that he expressly or impliedly invited children on to his land, and either did an act which caused damage with knowledge that it might injure the children, or knowingly permitted the existence on his land of a hidden danger or trap. The invitation might be implied from knowledge that children frequented the land without interference. For obvious dangers, such as unguarded water, natural or artificial, he will not be liable."

That statement was quoted and applied in Morley v. Staffordshire County Council (2). It seems to me that there was clearly evidence in the case now before us on which the learned county court judge could find that the existence of broken glass on a piece of land on which children were constantly allowed to play, and to which there was a sloping bank, constituted a trap within the principles which have been laid down with regard to liability in the case of occupiers of land on which children are allowed by those occupiers to go and play. The only criticism I would make on the learned judge's notes (which, as he said, were made some two months after the hearing) is that I think that the danger constituted a trap rather than an allurement. I think that the word "allurement," as used in these cases, has been generally applied to something like the turntable in Cooke v. Midland Great Western Ry. of Ireland (3), i.e., something which would be attractive to children to play with, or the attractive-looking berries which the child ate in Glasgow Corp'n. v. Taylor (4), rather than to circumstances such as the present where the corporation allowed children to play on the piece of land, which contained, as the corporation knew or ought to have known, bits of glass and possibly other objects such as tins which might be extremely dangerous if children fell down—as they are bound to do. For these reasons, I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. It seems to me that the evidence was such that it could reasonably be inferred from it that the injury sustained by the infant plaintiff when he fell down the bank was due to his cutting himself on a piece of broken glass, an old tin, or some such sharp object, with which, according to the evidence, this piece of waste ground was littered. It seems to me that, once that inference is drawn, there could be only one result to the case. In my judgment, a piece of waste land on which children are known to be in the habit of playing cannot be otherwise described than as, at any rate, hazardous in the nature of traps or concealed dangers if it is littered with such objects as pieces of broken glass. From the point of view of an infant, I have no doubt that such objects scattered about the ground are traps or concealed dangers, whatever might be said of them from the point of view of an adult. On that matter I only wish to refer to the concluding passage in the speech of LORD SUMNER in Glasgow Corp'n. v. Taylor (4). The learned lord said ([1922] 1 A.C. 67):

"Where a question as to the care to be used arises between persons using as of right the place, where they respectively act, infancy as such is no more a status conferring right, or a root of title imposing obligations on others to respect it, than infirmity or imbecility; but a measure of care appropriate to the inability or disability of those who are immature or feeble in mind or body is due from others, who know of or ought to anticipate the presence of such persons within the scope and hazard of their own operations."

Applying that observation to this case, the corporation knew of, or ought to have anticipated, the presence of young children on this piece of waste ground, and the standard of care due to such persons demanded that, unless and until the corporation took measures to prevent their presence on this ground, it was the duty of the corporation to keep the ground free from traps or concealed dangers of the type of such things as broken glass, the danger to be apprehended from which would clearly not be apparent to persons of tender years. I agree that the appeal fails.

ROMER, J.: I also agree. We are told that at the date of the accident the child in question was four and a half years old and that he was a licensee on the land of the corporation. With regard to the fact that the claim is on behalf of a child of that age, who is admitted to be a licensee, in Liddle's case (1), to which SOMERVELL, L.J., has referred, GREER, L.J., citing a passage from the speech of VISCOUNT DUNEDIN ([1929] A.C. 371) in R. Addie & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck (5) (to which we have not been referred), said ([1934] 2 K.B. 122):

A “It is well established law that licensees ‘must take the premises as they find them apart from concealed sources of danger; where dangers are obvious they must run the risk of them.’”

B VISCOUNT DUNEDIN was relating those observations to a claim which was made on behalf of a boy of four years of age, and, therefore, they have considerable relevance to the claim in the present case. It is perfectly obvious, I think, that the mere presence of a grassy slope could not amount to a concealed danger, because it could be seen. I think, however, that it is equally clear on the evidence in the present case that the existence of the slope, coupled with the presence of tins and broken glass and other material on it, did amount, and the learned county court judge was right in saying that it amounted, to a concealed danger which would result in the corporation being liable for the damage sustained by the infant plaintiff. I agree, accordingly, that the appeal should be dismissed.

C Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Theodore Goddard & Co., agents for S. Tapper Jones, town clerk, Cardiff (for the corporation); Stikeman & Co., agents for Phillips & Buck, Cardiff (for the plaintiff).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

D

E AMALGAMATED RELAYS, LTD. v. BURNLEY RATING AUTHORITY AND ANOTHER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Sellers, JJ.), January 12, 1950.]

Rates—Assessment—Wireless relay service—Valuation on profits basis.

F The ratepayers carried on the business of a wireless relay service for which they occupied a receiving station to which, by private telegraph wire rented from the Postmaster-General, programmes of the British Broadcasting Corporation were transmitted. These programmes were then amplified and re-transmitted to sub-amplifying stations whence they were relayed by wires, the property of the ratepayers, to individual subscribers. The wires were carried overhead by means of poles and brackets attached to walls and buildings. This system of wires had previously been rated at £924 and the rating authority proposed increasing the rateable value to £6,000. On appeal to quarter sessions it was agreed that, if the assessment was based on the profits earned by the ratepayers, £6,000 was a correct rateable value, but it was contended by the ratepayers that the correct method of assessment was the “contractor's theory,” in which case the figure would be £2,000. The learned recorder adopted a profits basis. On appeal by the ratepayers,

H

HELD: where, as in the present case, there were two possible methods of arriving at the rent which a hypothetical tenant would pay for an exceptional hereditament (i.e., one not susceptible to comparison with hereditaments of the same class let at a rent), which method was more likely to result in the ascertainment of the true rent was a question of fact, and the recorder could not be said to have been wrong in the method which he had adopted.

[AS TO VALUATION OF SPECIAL CLASSES OF PROPERTY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 27, pp. 396-434, paras. 829-870; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 38, pp. 534-567, Nos. 796-1055 and Digest Supp.]

Cases referred to:

(1) Surrey County Valuation Committee v. Chessington Zoo, Ltd., [1950] 1 All E.R. 154.

(2) Kingston Union v. Metropolitan Water Board, [1926] A.C. 331; 95 L.J.K.B. 605; 134 L.T. 483; 90 J.P. 69; 38 Digest 547, 901. A CASE STATED by the Recorder of Burnley.

The ratepayers, Amalgamated Relays, Ltd., carried on the business of a wireless relay service within the county borough of Burnley, to provide which they held a licence from the Postmaster-General. By an agreement, dated May 20, 1937, between Burnley Corporation and the ratepayers, the corporation consented, under s. 25 of the Public Health Act, 1925, to the ratepayers fixing wires across the streets within the borough subject to the terms and conditions contained in the agreement. The service was wholly within the borough and was at all material times the only wireless relay service therein, and it consisted of a receiving station to which, by private telegraph wire rented from the Postmaster-General, programmes of the British Broadcasting Corporation were transmitted, and were there amplified and re-transmitted to sub-amplifying stations. From the sub-amplifying stations the programmes were relayed by wires, the property of the ratepayers, to individual subscribers in each sub-amplifying area. These relay wires were carried overhead by means of poles, or, more usually, by brackets attached to walls and chimney stacks of buildings. Some subscribers paid 1s. 3d. a week and others 1s. a week, for different services. On Jan. 1, 1948, the ratepayers had 10,085 subscribers paying 1s. 3d. a week and 2,447 paying 1s. a week. On Mar. 24, 1948, the rating authority made a proposal that the rateable value of the wires from the sub-amplifying stations to the subscribers should be increased from £924 to £6,000. On May 11, 1948, Burnley Assessment Committee accepted the contention of the rating authority that the "profits basis" was the correct method of assessment and fixed the rateable value at £6,000. On appeal to quarter sessions it was contended by the ratepayers that the "contractor's basis" was the correct basis of assessment and that on that basis the rateable value would be £2,000. The recorder held that the proper basis of assessment was the "profits basis." The Divisional Court now dismissed the ratepayers' appeal against that decision. B
C
D
E
F

H. B. Williams, K.C., and James Booth for the ratepayers.

Rowe, K.C., and Glidewell for the rating authority.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case stated by the learned recorder of Burnley before whom the ratepayers appealed against an assessment made on them by the rating authority for the county borough of Burnley in respect of a system of wires which are admittedly a rateable hereditament and extend from various buildings owned by the ratepayers across the public streets in Burnley with the object of giving what is called a re-diffusion service of wireless programmes to people who pay a subscription to the ratepayers. This system had been assessed at £924 and the rating authority made a proposal to increase that rateable value to £6,000. The parties agreed that, if the assessment was to be based on profits which were earned by the ratepayers, the figure of £6,000 would stand because the amount of profits was not disputed. If, however, the "contractor's theory" was to be adopted, the figure would be £2,000. This court is not, therefore, concerned with any question of figures, nor is it suggested that any other basis is to be taken than the "profits basis" or the "contractor's basis." G
H

I think a certain confusion has crept into this case in the same way as it did in Surrey County Valuation Committee v. Chessington Zoo, Ltd. (1) by using the expression "the" profits basis. As I pointed out in the Chessington case (1), where exceptional hereditaments are being dealt with—that is to say, hereditaments not of the ordinary class of houses, factories, shops or warehouses which can always be compared with others—rating surveyors have to find some formula by which a rent can be calculated for a hereditament which is not, in fact, let at a rent and probably never would be let at a rent. Among the formulae that have been devised from time to time is one applicable to public utility undertakings—it is an elaborate formula into which I shall not go in detail—which is based to a great extent on profits. That formula has come to be known as the profits basis, but it is not a formula which takes into account only profits. It has always been the law that in any case relating to a hereditament which is not of an ordinary class, the court can take profits into consideration. In the Chessington case (1), the rating authority took the view that profits formed the only basis on which they could fix a rent, and so it was said that the assessment was ascertained on "the" profits basis. If they had said "a" profits basis, it would have been better, and it is clear in the present case that the sort of formula that was approved in Kingston Union v. Metropolitan Water Board (2) had not been adopted.

The learned recorder has said: "Here is a profit-earning system. What is it likely that a tenant would pay if this system was let to him at a rent?" In considering what a tenant would pay one has also to consider what a landlord would take, because in fixing the rent one has to have regard to what is often called "the higgling of the market," and that depends on the landlord's willingness to accept a certain sum as well as on the tenant's willingness to pay it. It may be that, technically or legally, this elaborate system of wires which is being used for the diffusion of wireless programmes all over Burnley, is not a monopoly. As a matter of history, there were various companies supplying this service in different parts of Burnley and they have now amalgamated. Now, however, there is one system, and the learned recorder could take into account the fact that it would be unlikely, though not impossible, that, so long as this company was operating in Burnley and supplying this service, the corporation would allow still further wires to be put up by any other company. At any rate, the position at the present moment is that the company could say to any intending tenant, if they were minded to let at a rent: "Here we have a system which is working. Nobody else has such a system, and there is no competitor in the market." There is no guide from rents being obtained from comparable hereditaments to what a tenant would be likely to pay. The landlord would be in a position to say: "If I let this to you, I am putting you into a position in which you can make substantial profits. I am going to have a share of those profits." What share he would demand and what share the tenant would be willing to pay must be a question of fact which the tribunal of fact must assess in the best way it can.

Counsel for the ratepayers contended that that is a method which is not allowed by law, and he has said that the contractor's theory ought to be applied. It has been held in many cases, which were cited in the Chessington case (1), that it is legitimate to take into account the profits in considering what rent would be paid. It is also, no doubt, legitimate to adopt the contractor's theory, which is to take the cost of the building of the hereditament, the value of the land on which it is built, and a percentage as the return which a contractor would accept on his outlay. If it is legitimate to look at the profits and also at the building cost and the return which a builder would require, it seems to me that it remains a question of fact for the court as to which of the two methods is the one more likely to yield the true rent. It may be, as it worked out in this case, unfortunate for the ratepayers that the method which the court has taken as the one most likely to yield a true rent is against them because it requires them to pay a higher rate than they would have paid if the contractor's method had been adopted. On the other hand, it might well be that, if the contractor's method were adopted in another case where the ratepayer was making a very small profit, the contractor's method might work out very much against him. In the present case, in my view, it was legitimate to take the ratepayers' profits into account and the recorder cannot be said to have gone wrong in so doing. If he found that that was the only, or the best, method to enable him to ascertain what the rent ought to be, I cannot say that he ought to have adopted some other. There are many reasons, some of which he sets out in his judgment, why he thinks the contractor's method is not the better. That seems to me entirely a question of fact, and I can see no ground for saying he has gone wrong in law. It follows that this appeal fails.

LYNSKEY, J.: I agree. I was reluctant to be convinced that the learned recorder was right in his decision, because it seemed to me that we were dealing entirely with fictitious circumstances, and if, by adopting one of two recognised methods of assessing the annual value, in the one case one got an annual value of £2,000, and in the other one of £6,000, that, in the interests of the ratepayers, it would have been preferable to adopt the method which would have given the lower valuation. It seems to me that the learned recorder posed himself the right question. He said (113 J.P. 234):

"I have to ask myself what rent would the 'hypothetical tenant' of the hereditament in question in this case as a tenant from year to year be reasonably willing to pay therefor. I am entitled to take into account all possible tenants, including the actual occupiers, the appellants herein. I am entitled... to take into account '... all that could reasonably affect the mind of the intending tenant...'"

In my view, that is undoubtedly the correct question and answer. In dealing with that question, he considered two methods which were put before him. One was what is known as the contractor's theory and the other was what he calls the profits basis but which, with my Lord, I prefer to call a profits basis. Having considered both these methods of arriving at the annual value of these hereditaments, he took the view that the contractor's method would not give him a true picture of the annual value, first, because this system was already in existence and it would be necessary to get licences and permits to introduce a competing system, and, secondly, that, even with a competing system, the competitor could only supply exactly the same article in exactly the same way as the ratepayers were supplying it. As I have pointed out, he said that one must take into account, among the hypothetical tenants, the existing occupier, the ratepayers. Therefore, one must visualise a hypothetical tenant, who would have to be in the same position as the ratepayers—who had his stations and sub-stations for re-diffusion, and the opportunity to let these wires. When one sees the number of people who are using this system and that there is a turnover of £39,000 odd a year, it seems to me that one cannot say that the learned recorder has come to a wrong determination in fact in reaching the conclusion that the contractor's method was not the correct one to apply. In those circumstances I do not think it is open to this court to say that, in adopting a profits basis, the learned recorder has gone wrong in law, and, accordingly, although with some reluctance, I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

SELLERS, J.: I agree. The learned recorder came to this conclusion (113 J.P. 234):

"I have come to the conclusion that wires hung and utilised, as in this case, are, whilst a species of the genus hereditament, in a very special category of their own, and must be treated with a somewhat different approach from the methods one would apply in the case of what I have termed 'the normal type of hereditament'."

That was accepted by the parties before him. Only two alternatives were advanced—what is described as the profits basis, and the contractor's basis. The learned recorder applied his mind to both and came to the conclusion that the contractor's basis was not appropriate in ascertaining what would be a fair rent for a hypothetical tenant to pay for the premises. He said (ibid., 235):

A "It, therefore, seems to me in the highest degree improbable that in the haggling to secure a rental from a potential hypothetical tenant the threat to go away and use £40,000 or any sum to erect a competing apparatus would be regarded on either hand as a threat susceptible of procuring a reduction of the rent asked."

B For the reasons given by my Lord and LYNKEY, J., I cannot see how it can be said that the recorder was wrong in law in applying the profits basis. Indeed, on the whole it seems to me that in the circumstances of this particular case that basis enabled him to arrive at a truer assessment than would the other basis. There were many difficulties in the way of applying the contractor's basis. All the restrictions and obstacles in the way of any competing business result in the ratepayers having, if not a monopoly, at any rate a business with monopolistic tendencies. I think that essential ingredient justified the learned recorder in applying the basis he did, and I agree that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Bentleys, Stokes & Lowless, agents for H. G. W. Cooper, Burnley (for the ratepayers); Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for C. V. Thornley, town clerk, Burnley (for the rating authority).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

E

COUGHTREY v. PORTER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Sellers, JJ.), January 16, 1950.]

F Gaming—Common gaming house—Special warrant of arrest and search—Person not found on premises—Subsequent arrest elsewhere—Destruction of gaming instruments—Validity of order—Gaming Act, 1845 (c. 109), s. 3, s. 8.

G On June 21, 1949, a complaint was made by the respondent that the appellant was the occupier and keeper of an amusement arcade where there were in use automatic gaming machines. The justices issued a special warrant under s. 3 of the Gaming Act, 1845, and on June 25 police officers entered the premises and seized the machines. The appellant was not on the premises at the time, but later he visited the police station where an officer purported to arrest him under the warrant and then to grant him bail under s. 21 of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914. On June 27 an information was laid against the appellant under s. 1 of the Betting Act, 1853, charging him with using the premises in connection with gaming. At the hearing of the informations he pleaded Guilty to the offence under the Betting Act, 1853, but he refused to plead to the charge under the Gaming Act, 1845. The justices found him Guilty under the Betting Act, 1853, and ordered the destruction of the gaming machines. On appeal,

H

HELD: a special warrant under s. 3 of the Gaming Act, 1845, gave power only to arrest persons found on the premises when the warrant was executed; as the appellant was not found on the premises when the warrant was executed he was not arrested under the warrant; and, therefore, he was not before the justices by virtue of a warrant issued under s. 3 and there was no power in the justices to order the destruction of the instruments of gaming under s. 8 of the Act of 1845.

[FOR GAMING AND GAMING HOUSES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 15, pp. 494-504, paras. 896-909; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 25, pp. 425-427, Nos. 269-278, and Digest Supp.]

Case referred to:

- (1) Eyre v. Brumfield, [1936] 2 All E.R. 1; 100 J.P. 209; 154 L.T. 696; Digest Supp.

CASE STATED by Nottingham justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Nottingham on June 21, 1949, a complaint was made by the respondent, a superintendent of police, that the appellant was the occupier and keeper of an amusement arcade where there were in use nine automatic gaming machines. The justices issued a special warrant under s. 3 of the Gaming Act, 1845. On June 25, 1949, three police officers entered the premises and seized and took away the nine machines. The appellant was not on the premises at the time. Later, he visited the police station where an officer purported to arrest him under the warrant, but discharged him on his entering into a recognisance of £5. On June 27, 1949, an information was laid against the appellant by the respondent under s. 1 of the Betting Act, 1853, and was served on the appellant on the same day. On July 11, 1949, the appellant pleaded Guilty to the charge under s. 1 of the Betting Act, 1853, but he refused to plead to a charge that he had used the amusement arcade as a common gaming house contrary to the Gaming Act, 1845, on the grounds (a) that the warrant had not been properly executed, and, that he was not before the court by virtue thereof, and (b) that there was no information or summons in respect of any offence under the Gaming Act, 1845. The justices dealt with the plea of guilty under the Betting Act, 1853, and found that the appellant having been arrested under the warrant under s. 3 of the Gaming Act, 1845, and released on entering into a recognisance had lawfully been brought before the court under the warrant, fined him £15 in respect of the offence under the Betting Act, 1853, and ordered the destruction of the nine gaming machines. The Divisional Court now allowed an appeal, holding that the justices had no power to order the destruction of the machines.

John Hobson for the appellant.

Vernon Gattie for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by Nottingham city justices who made an order directing that certain instruments of gaming should be destroyed, and the question before the court is whether or not that order can be upheld.

There are no merits in the appellant's case, but that does not matter because an order cannot be made for the destruction of a person's property, even if it is gaming property used for the purpose of playing unlawful games, unless the statute justifies it. We, therefore, have to see what was the history of the case and what are the various sections which deal with the matter. The police laid an information against the appellant for unlawfully using certain premises for the purpose of money being received in respect of a contingency relating to a game, by means of three "fruit" machines, five clock machines and a "numbers" machine, contrary to s. 1 of the Betting Act, 1853. It should be noticed that that is a summons, not for using the premises for the purpose of betting, but for receiving money in relation to gaming. Six days earlier the police had laid an information stating that it was reasonable to suspect "that the pleasure park situate at Trent Lane in the city of Nottingham"—which the appellant occupies—is kept and used as a common gaming house within the meaning of the Gaming Act, 1845." That information having been laid, a justice issued his warrant in the statutory form provided in the Act in these terms:

A

"This is therefore . . . to require you, with such assistants as you may find necessary, to enter into the said . . . place . . . and there diligently to search for all instruments of unlawful gaming which may be therein, and to arrest, search and bring before me or some other of the justices . . . as well the keepers of the same as also the persons there haunting, resorting and playing, to be dealt with according to law; and for so doing this shall be your warrant."

B

The police entered the place specified and seized instruments of gaming, but they did not find the appellant on the premises at the time. He went to the police station later in the day, and an officer then purported to execute the warrant by formally arresting him. He was granted bail. Subsequently he was served with the summons under the Betting Act, 1853, and, finally, he appeared before the justices.

C

The first point counsel for the appellant took was that the appellant was never lawfully before the justices under the Act of 1845. It was contended that the appellant could not lawfully be arrested at the police station under that warrant, and, therefore, he was not before the justices by "virtue of that warrant." Under s. 3 of the Act of 1845 there is power to justices in any case in which they themselves might enter premises where unlawful games are suspected to be played to issue a warrant allowing constables and others to enter and search and to bring before a justice "all such persons found therein as might have been arrested therein by such justice of the peace had he been personally present." To find out what persons the justice himself might have arrested, it is necessary to go back to the Unlawful Games Act, 1541, an Act of Henry VIII which is still on the statute book. That Act, by s. 9, enables justices, mayors, sheriffs, and so on, to enter premises

D

E

"... and as well the keepers of the same as also the persons there haunting resorting and playing to take arrest and imprison, and them so taken and arrested to keep in prison, unto such time as the keepers and maintainers of the said plays and games have found sureties to the King's use ..."

F

It seems clear, therefore, that under the Act of 1541, before the justices can arrest, they have to find the people on the premises, and that s. 3 of the Act of 1845 must also only be dealing with the persons the constables find on the premises when they execute their warrant. They did not find the appellant on the premises when they executed the warrant. They arrested him afterwards. In fact—this was in the interest of the appellant—they did not take him immediately before the justices. I dare say there were no justices sitting. The police officer bailed the appellant purporting to act under the provisions of s. 21 of the Criminal Justice Administration Act, 1914. Section 21 provides :

G

H

"(1) A justice on issuing a warrant for the arrest of any person may, if he thinks fit, by endorsement on the warrant, direct that the person named in the warrant be on arrest released on his entering into such a recognisance. (2) Where such an endorsement is made, the officer in charge of any police station to which on arrest the person named in the warrant is brought shall discharge him upon his entering into a recognisance, with or without sureties approved by that officer ..."

It has never been argued that the mere fact that the justice has made an endorsement authorising the police officer to take a recognisance is equivalent to the justice himself granting bail. At any rate, it appears doubtful, and I think we must resolve the question in favour of the appellant. Once the appellant was released under that warrant by the police officer, he was not only released on bail but he was actually released, because I do not think the police officer had power to bail him, he not being the person named in the warrant. The justice can only direct by endorsement that the person named in the warrant be bailed and the police officer has only power to bail the person named in the warrant, and as nobody was named in the warrant, it follows that that section did not apply. Counsel for the appellant argued, I think rightly, that when the appellant was before the justices he was not before them by virtue of the warrant. He was there by virtue of the summons which had been issued under the Betting Act, 1853. In the first place, in my opinion, he had not been arrested under the warrant issued under the Act of 1845, and, secondly, by his being released, the effect of the warrant had expired. A

We have also to see what powers the justices have to order articles of gaming to be destroyed. Under the Act of 1853 they have power to have the articles found brought before them, but for some reason, probably an oversight, when Parliament was passing the Act of 1853, they did not provide that those articles might be destroyed. In s. 8 of the Gaming Act, 1845, it is provided: B

“... and it shall be lawful for the police magistrate or justices before whom any person shall be taken by virtue of the warrant or order to direct all such tables and instruments of gaming to be forthwith destroyed.” C

It has been decided in Eyre v. Brumfield (1) that that is the only section which enables justices to make an order for destruction. It follows that, if the appellant was not before the court by virtue of the warrant issued under the Act of 1845, there was no power to order the destruction of these articles of gaming. Another objection which was taken also seems to me to be good. When before the justices the appellant was asked to plead to the summons under the Act of 1845. He refused to plead one way or the other, because, he contended, he was not properly before the court. The justices thereupon did not say: “If you will not plead, we shall exercise our powers and enter a plea of Not Guilty and proceed with the case.” They accepted the position and allowed the matter to go without any plea at all, and they did not adjudicate thereupon. No evidence was given before them to show that these were articles of gaming. For all these reasons it seems to me that it is impossible to uphold the order in this case, and, although the appellant was properly convicted and fined under the Betting Act, 1853, the order for the destruction of these articles must be quashed. D E

LYNSKEY, J.: I agree. F

SELLERS, J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed with costs. Order for destruction of gaming machines quashed.

Solicitors: Sidney C. Elphick, agent for H. B. Clayton, Sons & Ellis, Nottingham (for the appellant); Sharpe, Pritchard & Co. (for the respondent). G

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

---

KEEBLE v. MILLER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., and Lynskey, J.), January 20, 1950.]

Street Traffic—Light locomotive—Car converted to carry generating plant—Relevant date—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 2 (1) (b).

A By s. 18 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, it is provided : “ (1) The number of trailers, if any, which may be drawn by a motor vehicle on a highway shall not exceed—(a) in the case of a . . . light locomotive, three . . . (c) in the case of a . . . heavy motor car, one . . . (3) If any person causes or permits a trailer to be drawn in contravention of this section, he shall be guilty of an offence.” Light locomotives are defined by s. 2 (1) (b) as
B “ mechanically propelled vehicles which are not constructed themselves to carry any load (other than [water, fuel, accumulators and other equipment used for the purpose of propulsion, loose tools and loose equipment]), and the weight of which unladen does not exceed eleven tons and a half, but does exceed seven tons and a quarter.” By s. 2 (4) it is provided: “ For the C purposes of this Part of this Act— . . . (b) in the case of a motor vehicle fitted with a crane, dynamo, welding plant or other special appliance or apparatus which is a permanent or essentially permanent fixture, the appliance or apparatus shall not be deemed to constitute a load, but shall be deemed to form part of the vehicle . . . ”

D The appellant, a fair proprietor, fitted a Diesel plant in a former army lorry and used the vehicle to provide power for a dynamo lighting set and for drawing three trailers. The unladen weight of the vehicle was seven tons and a half. Diesel oil for the plant, and planks and poles for use when loading the oil drums on to the vehicle, were carried in the vehicle. On a charge under s. 18 (1) and (3) the appellant was convicted of causing a heavy motor car to draw trailers in excess of the number prescribed. On appeal,

E HELD: in construing the word “ constructed ” in s. 2 (1) (b), regard should be had, not to the original condition of the vehicle, but to its condition at the time of the alleged offence; the fact that originally the lorry had been constructed as a heavy motor car did not prevent it becoming a light locomotive if, thereafter, a reconstruction took place which resulted in the vehicle coming within s. 2 (b); and the case should be remitted for further hearing.

F [FOR THE ROAD TRAFFIC ACT, 1930, s. 2 (1) (b), (d), (4) and s. 18 (1), (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 23, pp. 608-610, 624.]

CASE STATED by a metropolitan magistrate.

At a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Thames Police Court, an information was preferred by the respondent, a police constable, against the appellant, that he, on Apr. 27, 1949, did cause a motor vehicle, viz., a heavy
G motor car, to be on a highway, such motor vehicle drawing two trailers in excess of the number prescribed to be drawn by that class of vehicle, contrary to s. 18 (1) and (3) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. On July 26, 1949, the magistrate, being of the opinion (i) that the word “ constructed ” in the definition of a light locomotive in s. 2 (1) (b) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, meant “ originally constructed,” (ii) that the adaptation of the vehicle to carry a dynamo lighting
H set was not such as to preclude the carrying of other loads, and (iii) that poles, planks and Diesel oil which were carried were not permanent or essentially permanent parts of the vehicle within s. 2 (4) (b) of the Act, held that the vehicle was not a light locomotive within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (b), but fell within the definition of a heavy motor car in s. 2 (1) (d), and he convicted the appellant and ordered him to pay a fine of 50s. and 50s. costs. The Divisional Court now directed that the case be remitted for further hearing. The facts appear in the judgment of LYNSKEY, J.

Raeburn, K.C., and Harris Walker for the appellant.
Vernon Gattie for the respondent.

LYNSKEY, J.: This is an appeal by way of Case stated by Robert Arthur Keeble against whom an information was preferred before the magistrate sitting at the Thames Police Court

"... for that he on Apr. 27, 1949, at the East India Dock Road, Poplar, E.14... did cause a motor vehicle, viz., a heavy motor car, Index No. C A N 971, to be on a highway, such motor vehicle drawing two trailers in excess of the number prescribed to be drawn by that class of vehicle, contrary to s. 18 (1) and (3) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930."

The learned magistrate held that the offence was proved and fined the appellant 50s. and ordered him to pay 50s. costs.

The point is whether this vehicle which was pulling the three trailers was a light locomotive within the classification of motor vehicles contained in s. 2 (1) (b) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, or whether it was a heavy motor car under para. (d) of the sub-section. Light locomotives are defined by s. 2 (1) (b) as "... mechanically propelled vehicles which are not constructed themselves to carry any load (other than [any of the articles mentioned in s. 2 (1) (a), viz., water, fuel, accumulators and other equipment used for the purpose of propulsion, loose tools and loose equipment]), and the weight of which unladen does not exceed eleven tons and a half, but does exceed seven tons and a quarter."

So far as weight is concerned, there is a finding of fact that the vehicle in question weighs seven tons and a half, which brings it within the weight classification. By s. 2 (1) (d) heavy motor cars are defined as "... mechanically propelled vehicles (not being vehicles classified under this section as motor cars) which are constructed themselves to carry a load or passengers, and the weight of which unladen exceeds two tons and a half."

The learned magistrate has held that this vehicle was a heavy motor car. The appellant contends that it was a light locomotive. The circumstances of the case as found are that this motor vehicle was a converted army lorry and that at some time before the date of the alleged offence there had been fitted in it a Diesel plant secured to the vehicle itself and that from that time onwards the vehicle was used, not for the immediate purpose of carrying loads, but to carry the Diesel plant, which was used by the appellant in his business of a fair proprietor to provide power for a dynamo lighting set.

By s. 2 (4) of the Act of 1930 it is provided :

"For the purposes of this Part of this Act... (b) in the case of a motor vehicle fitted with a crane, dynamo, welding plant or other special appliance or apparatus which is a permanent or essentially permanent fixture, the appliance or apparatus shall not be deemed to constitute a load, but shall be deemed to form part of the vehicle."

The result was that when this vehicle was fitted with the Diesel engine and plant, they became part of the vehicle and not part of the load which it had to carry. The learned magistrate has found that

"the said motor vehicle had no load other than a Diesel plant and loose equipment for the said motor vehicle. The said Diesel plant was an apparatus secured to the motor vehicle... There was evidence that Diesel oil to drive the dynamo, and planks and poles to run the Diesel oil up to the back of the lorry, were carried."

Each of those articles would come within the class of articles set out in s. 2 (1) (a) of the Act, that is to say, "water, fuel, accumulators and other equipment used for the purpose of propulsion, loose tools and loose equipment." The learned magistrate goes on to find that there was evidence that there was room for other loads when the vehicle was fitted with this Diesel engine. He does not find, in fact, that it was constructed to carry other such loads.

The learned magistrate says that he was of the opinion :

“that the word ‘constructed’ in the definition of a light locomotive in s. 2 (1) (b) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, meant ‘originally constructed’”.

A In my view, “constructed” in that paragraph means constructed at the material time. The fact that originally a vehicle was constructed as a heavy motor car will not operate to prevent it being a light locomotive if, thereafter, a re-construction takes place. If, as a result of that re-construction, it is fitted with an appliance like a Diesel engine or a crane, it ceases to be a vehicle constructed for the purpose of carrying loads but becomes, by virtue of the provisions of s. 2 (4) (b), a vehicle for the purpose of carrying a special appliance. When the B magistrate read the word “constructed” in s. 2 (1) (b) as meaning “originally constructed,” that meant that he was considering this case from the point of view of the vehicle having been originally constructed as an army motor lorry. In my view, in construing the word “constructed,” he ought to have applied C his mind to decide whether, at the time the offence was committed, this vehicle was constructed for the purpose of carrying loads, in which event it would be a heavy motor car, or whether, having regard to the appliance which was fixed to it, it was not constructed for carrying loads, in which event it would be a light locomotive and, therefore, entitled as a light locomotive to draw three trailers behind it.

The magistrate goes on to say

D “that the adaptation of the vehicle to carry the dynamo lighting set was not such as to preclude the carrying of other loads.”

That, again, in my view, is not the true test to apply. What the learned magistrate ought to have done, as the satisfactory way of dealing with the case, was to see the vehicle and have its dimensions put before him, and having done so ask himself the question: Is that vehicle in that condition “constructed . . . E to carry a load or passengers,” apart from the driver and his mate? If, on his view of the vehicle and its dimensions, he were of opinion that, notwithstanding, the fact that a Diesel engine had been fitted to the vehicle, it was still a vehicle constructed to carry loads in addition to the Diesel engine which was part of the vehicle, then the conviction would have been right, but, if he could not come to that conclusion he ought to have dismissed this information. The only F other matter he dealt with was

“that poles, planks and Diesel oil which were carried were not permanent or essentially permanent parts of the vehicle.”

Nobody suggests that they were, and it is not necessary in determining this case to decide whether they were or were not. If they were not permanent parts of this vehicle, the poles, planks and Diesel oil were at least, one would have G thought—again a matter for the magistrate—either water, fuel, accumulators, or other equipment used for the purpose of propulsion, loose tools and loose equipment, and, if that were so, they would not rank as a load. In my view, the learned magistrate has not asked himself the correct questions and has not directed his mind correctly to the construction of this Act. This case ought H to go back to him so that he can deal with the matter on the basis of the construction which I have mentioned and come to a conclusion whether this vehicle in its condition at the material time was a vehicle constructed to carry loads.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed with costs; case remitted for re-hearing.

Solicitors: Woodman, Matthews & Co. (for the appellant); Solicitor for the Metropolitan Police (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister at-Law.]

R. v. SOMERSET JJ., Ex parte ERNEST J. COLE AND PARTNERS, LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Sellers, JJ.),
January 17, 1950.]

Quarter Sessions—Refusal to state Case—Mandamus—Power of High Court to issue—Criminal Justice Act, 1925 (c. 86), s. 20.

Appellants to quarter sessions against an order of petty sessions under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944 (which did not involve a conviction) failed to ask for a Case to be stated at the close of the hearing of their appeal, and when their application for a Case was made three weeks later quarter sessions refused it on the ground of the delay.

HELD: the High Court had no power to issue mandamus to quarter sessions at common law; the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, s. 20, provided for mandamus to be issued ordering quarter sessions to state a Case only in case of an appeal to quarter sessions against a conviction by a court of summary jurisdiction; and, therefore, in the present case mandamus could not issue directing quarter sessions to state a Case.

[FOR MANDAMUS TO QUARTER SESSIONS, see HALSBURY, Vol. 21, pp. 738, 739, para. 1279 and pp. 740, 741, para. 1281; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 33, pp. 449, 450, Nos. 1596-1611.]

Cases referred to :—

- (1) R. v. Walsall Overseers, (1878), 3 Q.B.D. 457; 47 L.J.Q.B. 711; 38 L.T. 665; 42 J.P. 644; on appeal, sub nom., Walsall Poor Overseers v. London & North Western Ry. Co., (1878), 4 App. Cas. 30; 33 Digest 449, 1600.
- (2) R. v. Pembrokeshire JJ., (1832), 2 B. & Ad. 391; 1 L.J.M.C. 92; 33 Digest 449, 1598.
- (3) R. v. Effingham (Earl), (1871), 2 B. & Ad. 391 n.
- (4) Ex p. Jarvin (Inhabitants), (1840), 9 Dowl. 120; Woll. 67; 33 Digest 437, 1465.
- (5) Peat's Case, (1704), 6 Mod. Rep. 228.

MOTION for mandamus.

The applicants appealed to quarter sessions against a decision of petty sessions in respect of a matter arising out of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944. On the dismissal of their appeal they did not apply to quarter sessions to state a Case for the opinion of the High Court and when they made the application three weeks later quarter sessions refused to state a Case. The Divisional Court now held that they had no power by mandamus to compel quarter sessions to state the Case.

Neligan for the applicants.

Squibb for the respondents.

J. F. E. Stephenson for the justices.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: In this case counsel for the applicants has moved for an order of mandamus directed to justices of Somerset compelling them to state a Case with regard to their decision in an appeal which came before them arising out of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944. The appeal to quarter sessions was against an order of justices at petty sessions, and, on June 7, 1949, quarter sessions dismissed the appeal. According to the affidavit of the chairman, no application was then made to the quarter sessions to state a Case. Whether quarter sessions would have stated a Case if an application had been made, I do not know, but when an application was made to them some three weeks later, they refused to state a Case because of the delay which had taken place. Now we are asked to grant a mandamus directing quarter sessions to state a Case. Before the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, there was no power in the court to grant a mandamus to quarter sessions compelling them to state a Case. It was often thought that that raised difficulties and might cause some injustice, and the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, s. 20, provided that either party to an appeal to quarter sessions from a court of summary jurisdiction could apply for a Case to be stated, and, if it were refused, could apply to this court for an order of mandamus compelling quarter sessions to state a Case. That section, however, is confined to cases where the matter before quarter sessions is an appeal against a conviction by a court of summary jurisdiction and this is not a matter involving such a conviction. That is the only matter with which the section deals.

When the history of the matter is looked at it is clear that this court has always disclaimed that they have the power to grant a mandamus to quarter sessions. The history of the power of quarter sessions to state a Case is very fully dealt with in the speech of LORD CAIRNS in Walsall Poor Overseers v. London and North Western Ry. Co. (1). He pointed out that, on going back to the ancient history of quarter sessions, it will be found that they were told not to proceed with a case of difficulty until the justices of assize came into the county, which, of course, was equivalent to telling them that they ought to consult the justices of assize before deciding a case of difficulty. Then it became the practice to consult the Court of King's Bench instead of the judge of assize, and whether they consulted the Court of King's Bench or not was always a matter entirely for the discretion of the quarter sessions.

In R. v. Pembrokeshire JJ. (2) (2 B. & Ad. 391), the marginal note is:

"When the sessions on determining an appeal have granted a Case, but none has been stated, the court will, under some circumstances, direct a mandamus to the justices who heard the appeal, to state a Case."

Attached to the report of that case is a report of R. v. Effingham (Earl) (3) in which an application was made to the court for a mandamus directed to the justices for the West Riding of Yorkshire (2 B. & Ad. 393)

"commanding them to state a Special Case on an appeal between the inhabitants of Northowram and the inhabitants of Hipperholme, determined by them at sessions, 13th of July last; on affidavit that, the order being affirmed, the appellants desired a Special Case to be stated, which the sessions unanimously consented to; and Mr. Heywood, counsel for the appellants, drew the Case; and in the afternoon both counsel tendered the Case to the sessions for their approbation. Mr. Wickham and Mr. Horton, who joined in making the original order, and Sir Watts Horton, who had an estate in each parish, and therefore declined giving any opinion in the morning, were the only justices remaining; when Sir W. H. refused to permit the Case to be stated; and he being joined by Mr. Horton, no Case was stated."

In other words, quarter sessions in the morning had agreed to state a Case, and later, when the case was tendered to the justices for signature, certain justices, who obviously had an interest in the matter, said that they were not going to state it. The report says (ibid., 394):

"LORD MANSFIELD doubted whether a mandamus could go to compel justices to state a Case; but Mr. J. Buller saying, that in this instance the court of quarter sessions had actually agreed to state one, but Sir Watts Horton prevented it [he being a justice with an interest in the matter] a rule nisi was granted" against the justices to state the Case, they having agreed to do so.

In Ex p. Jarvin (Inhabitants) (4) (9 Dowl. 120), the marginal note is:

"The court will not issue a mandamus to a court of quarter sessions, commanding them to grant a case, although under special circumstances it may issue such a mandamus commanding the sessions to state a Case."

PATTESON, J., who was a judge of great authority in these matters, said:

"It seems to me that the first case cited, R. v. Pembrokeshire JJ. (2), is no authority for granting the rule. The case of R. v. Effingham (Earl) (3), is only an authority to shew that the court will, under special circumstances, grant a mandamus for the purpose of compelling the sessions to state a Case, but not to grant it, that being a matter which is purely for their discretion."

I note that the learned authors of ARCHBOLD'S QUARTER SESSIONS, a work of considerable authority, say (2nd ed., at p. 50):

"But it is perfectly optional with the sessions whether they will thus state a Special Case or not; neither the parties nor even the Queen's Bench itself can compel them to do so."

For that the authority is the case to which I have just referred, Ex p. Jarvin (Inhabitants) (4), and also Peat's Case (5). In those circumstances, I am of opinion that we have no power to grant mandamus in this case, and, therefore, this application fails.

LYNSKEY, J.: I agree.

SELLERS, J.: I agree.

Application dismissed with costs. Costs to justices of filing an affidavit only.

Solicitors: Arbeid & Co. (for the applicants); Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for Harold King, Taunton (for the respondents); Collyer-Bristow & Co., agents for P. A. Selborne Stringer, Trowbridge (for the justices).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

BELL AND ANOTHER v. GOSDEN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Jenkins, L.J.J.), January 16, 17, 1950.]

Emergency Legislation—Evacuation area—Recovery of rent—Limitation of action—When time begins to run—Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1941 (c. 24), s. 3 (1) (2)—Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1944 (c. 40), s. 2 (2)—Defence (Evacuated Areas) Regulations, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 1209) (as amended by S.R. & O., 1945, No. 1453), reg. 4 (1), reg. 4A (1)—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 17.

County Court—Appeal—Raising in Court of Appeal of point of law not argued in court below.

The Defence (Evacuated Areas) Regulations, 1940, as amended by S.R. & O., 1945, No. 1453, provide: "4 (1) Subject to the following provisions of this regulation—(a) no rent ... payable in respect of any premises in an evacuation area which are unoccupied at the date when the area is declared an evacuation area, or subsequently become unoccupied, ... shall be recoverable during the evacuation period ... Provided that this paragraph shall not apply ... (ii) to any such rent ... as aforesaid which accrued due and payable before the commencement of the evacuation period ... 4A (1) Where an order has been made appointing a day on which the evacuation period is to come to an end in relation to any evacuation area all debts owing on that day to which para. (1) of reg. 4 ... has applied in relation to that area ... shall only be recoverable and enforceable by means of an application to the court under s. 2 of the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1944, and no other proceedings or remedies shall be taken or exercised in respect of such debts . . . ”

Premises, which were within an evacuation area within the meaning of reg. 4 (1), were let to G. who failed to pay rent falling due on Sept. 29, 1940. G. was at that date occupying the premises, and continued so to occupy them until Feb. 26, 1942. On Nov. 4, 1948, the landlord commenced proceedings for the unpaid rent. Before the county court judge, G. submitted that (i) the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 17, barred the landlord's claim, and (ii) the regulations of 1940 (as amended) applied to the claim. The judge rejected the first submission, but accepted the second, and stood the case over so that proceedings might be brought under the Act of 1944. On the second proceedings the county court judge ordered the defendant to pay the sum in question. On appeal, the defendant sought to argue that the regulations had no application, that the second proceedings were started under a misapprehension, and that the claim was barred by s. 17 of the Limitation Act, 1939.

HELD: (i) the argument that the regulations had no application was not raised before the county court judge, and, being a matter of law, was not now open to the defendant.

Dictum of LORD HALSBURY, L.C., in Smith v. Baker & Sons ([1891] A.C. 333), applied.

(ii) so long as the rent was irrecoverable by the terms of reg. 4, the running of time under s. 17 of the Act of 1939 was suspended; that suspension was not terminated by the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1941; and, therefore, although there was stronger ground for saying that time began to run as from the date of the coming into force of the Act of 1944, whether it did or not, the landlord's claim was not barred.

[FOR THE LIABILITIES (WAR-TIME ADJUSTMENT) ACT, 1941, s. 3 and s. 21, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 34, pp. 26-29, 47; and FOR THE LIABILITIES (WAR-TIME ADJUSTMENT) ACT, 1944, s. 2, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 37, pp. 14-18.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Smith v. Baker & Sons, [1891] A.C. 325; 60 L.J.Q.B. 683; 65 L.T. 467; 55 J.P. 660; 13 Digest 527, 789.
- (2) Rhodes v. Liverpool Commercial Investment Co., (1879), 4 C.P.D. 425; 13 Digest 538, 901.
- (3) Seymour v. Coulson, (1880), 5 Q.B.D. 359; 49 L.J.Q.B. 604; 13 Digest 538, 902.
- (4) Clarkson v. Musgrave, (1882), 9 Q.B.D. 386; 51 L.J.Q.B. 525; 13 Digest 527, 788.

APPEAL by the defendant from orders of His Honour JUDGE ARCHER, K.C., sitting at Eastbourne County Court, dated Sept. 28, 1949, directing the defendant to pay to the executors of the landlord the sum of £74 in respect of rent which had accrued due on Sept. 29, 1940, and to pay the costs both of an application under the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Acts, 1941 to 1944, on which the order to pay the rent was made, and also of abortive proceedings which had been adjourned. The Court of Appeal heard the appeals in both proceedings together, and affirmed the decision of the county court judge except in regard to the costs of the adjourned proceedings. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.

S. Terrell for the defendant.

R. G. Dow for the plaintiffs, the executors of the landlord.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This judgment is on two appeals which have been called on and heard together. It will be convenient if I state first the nature of the two actions. The first in date, in which the summons was issued on Nov. 4, 1948, is a proceeding by two persons suing as the executors of a deceased landlord for a sum of £74 rent which accrued due on Sept. 29, 1940. The second proceeding is entitled: "In the matter of the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Acts, 1941 to 1944," the parties to it being the same as in the earlier proceedings, and the claim being under the Acts for relief in respect of the same sum of rent. The particulars of claim in the second proceedings are dated July 8, 1949. The reason why there are before us these two proceedings is that when the first case came to be heard before the learned county court judge two points were taken on behalf of the defendant. First it was said that the claim was barred by virtue of the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 17, and, secondly and alternatively, that rent claimed was covered by the terms of an order made pursuant to the Emergency Powers (Defence) Acts, 1939 and 1940, namely, an order known as the Defence (Evacuated Areas) Regulations, 1940 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 1209), and a further and later regulation (S.R. & O., 1945, No. 1453), the effect of which regulations, it was alleged, was that this sum of rent could be claimed only in proceedings under the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Acts, 1941 and 1944. The learned county court judge rejected the defence based on the Limitation Act, 1939, but he was of opinion that the sum claimed was covered by the regulations with the result that the first plaintiff was incompetent. After some hearing, therefore, he stood over the first case giving liberty to the plaintiffs to start proceedings under the Acts of 1941 and 1944. When the matter came again before him, he made an order, as it is conceded he had power to do, under the Act of 1944, directing the defendant to pay the sum in question, and he also ordered that the defendant should pay the plaintiffs' costs not only of the proceedings under the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Acts, but also of the other proceedings which had been adjourned.

The first point which counsel for the defendant sought to take before us was that the whole basis on which the first case had been adjourned and the second proceeding started was a misapprehension, and that, on the true construction of the regulations, they had not and never had had any application to the sum claimed. To make the matter a little more clear I will refer, first, to the regulations of 1940. Regulation 4, so far as is relevant, provides:

"(1) Subject to the following provisions of this regulation,—(a) no rent . . . payable in respect of any premises in an evacuation area which are unoccupied at the date when the area is declared an evacuation area, or subsequently become unoccupied . . . shall be recoverable during the evacuation period."

These premises, beyond doubt, were in what is there defined as being an evacuation area. They were, however, at the time when this rent became due, namely, Sept. 29, 1940, still occupied by the defendant. He ceased to occupy them on Feb. 26, 1942. It is conceded that as from that date this regulation would have applied, since the premises were in an evacuation area, but the regulation contains the following proviso:

"Provided that this paragraph shall not apply . . . (ii) to any such rent . . . as aforesaid which accrued due and payable before the commencement of the evacuation period."

I have indicated that the evacuation period would not properly begin to run until the premises became unoccupied, and, since they were not unoccupied on Sept. 29, 1940, on that date, when the rent became due, the regulation had no application to the sum in question.

At this stage I can conveniently complete the matter by reference to the later order of 1945. That order amended the regulations of 1940 and inserted therein a new regulation, reg. 4A, of which the relevant words are:

"(1) Where an order has been made appointing a day on which the evacuation period is to come to an end in relation to any evacuation area all debts owing on that day to which para. (1) of reg. 4 . . . has applied in relation to that area . . . shall only be recoverable and enforceable by means of an application to the court under s. 2 of the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1944, and no other proceedings or remedies shall be taken or exercised in respect of such debts . . . ”

An order was made terminating the relevant evacuation period on Mar. 31, 1947.

- A On the footing that this sum which was claimed as rent was a debt to which reg. 4 of the regulations of 1940 applied, then it follows by virtue of reg. 4A that the first action was incompetent and was an infringement of the terms of that regulation. On the hypothesis that the debt was covered by the regulations of 1940 there is no doubt whatever that the action was improperly constituted and it became necessary—or was, at any rate, proper—to do as the learned judge did—to adjourn the action and give liberty to the plaintiffs to bring proceedings under the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1944. Counsel for the defendant, therefore, sought to say: “ I should have observed that by the terms of proviso (ii) to reg. 4 (1) the evacuation period had not begun at the relevant date, and, therefore, the regulations of 1940 and 1945 never had any application to the case. That enables me to say that the statute of limitation which began to run on Sept. 29, 1940, had run its course long before the action was brought, and on that ground I should succeed.” In my judgment, it is plain that that point is not open to the defendant in this court. To sustain the argument it is necessary, according to the rules which apply to county court appeals, for the defendant to show that the point that the regulations had no application was raised in the court below. The fact that the regulations were referred to clearly does not provide an answer to the objection to counsel’s point, for the regulations were relied on, not to show that in the circumstances they had no application, but was for the contrary purpose of showing that they did apply and rendered incompetent the first action.

- E It is as well to emphasise afresh the importance of this rule for the proper administration of justice in the county court and also in this court and in order that there may be an end of litigation and that proceedings may be prevented from becoming protracted and expensive. In Smith v. Baker & Sons (1), LORD HALSBURY, L.C., put the matter plainly ([1891] A.C. 333):

“ A matter of law can be made the subject of appeal, but then only when the point has been raised at the trial before the learned judge. That question was decided in Rhodes v. Liverpool Commercial Investment Co. (2). In Seymour v. Coulson (3) the principle was affirmed that the point of law must be taken; and finally in Clarkson v. Musgrave (4), where all the cases were reviewed, it was established (and I think has been accepted ever since) that the raising of the point of law at the trial is a condition precedent to any appeal from the decision of the county court.”

- G It seems to me to be plain that the point sought to be taken, namely, the non-applicability of these regulations, was never taken by the defendant in the county court, and is not, therefore, open to him now. The result is that we have to treat these cases on what is a somewhat unreal hypothesis, namely, on the assumption that the debt claimed was a debt to which the regulations of 1940 did apply. Nevertheless, counsel for the defendant has argued that the effect of the application of the regulation is not to stop the running of the statute of limitation. Alternatively, he says, even if it did arrest the running of the period until the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1941, was passed, from that date at least time did run against the plaintiffs.

I have already read the relevant parts of reg. 4 of the regulations of 1940. Section 17 of the Limitation Act, 1939, provides:

“ No action shall be brought . . . to recover arrears of rent . . . after the expiration of six years from the date on which the arrears became due.”

There is nothing in the regulations of 1940 which refers in terms to the Limitation Act, 1939. Regulation 4 (1) provides that the rent shall not be recoverable during the evacuation period. That plainly means that no action shall be brought during that period for the recovery of the rent, but it is said that the fact that it cannot be recovered by action is not sufficient. The rent was due in 1940, it is argued, and it remained due although during the period of the so-called moratorium it could not be recovered by action as the result of the regulation, and s. 17 states in unequivocal terms that after the expiration of six years no action can be brought. In my judgment, the necessary effect of the regulation, which has, of course, the effect of an act of Parliament, when set beside the Limitation Act, is that, so long as it applied and the rent was irrecoverable by its terms the running of time under s. 17 must be treated as suspended. The matter may be tested in this way. Supposing this evacuation period was some fixed period, as, for example, seven years. The regulation would then provide, in effect, "during the seven years period of the evacuation no action shall be brought to recover rent." As a necessary implication from that language, when that period was over, the ban on the bringing of an action would cease, and that in turn necessarily involves that the running of the limitation period under the statute must be regarded as having been suspended for that period. That is, I think, clear from the language of s. 17 itself—"No action shall be brought . . ." The basis of the section is that, if, during the period a person can bring an action but he does not do so, but delays for six years, then thereafter he shall be barred. So far as that aspect of the matter is concerned, I do not propose to elaborate it.

Some reference was made during the argument to such a case as that of a claim against an enemy alien where the rights of action are suspended as a result of a war. It has, I think, never been suggested that, if the war goes on long enough, the alien's claim is forever destroyed. It revives when the conditions cease to exist which have prevented the exercise of the remedy. That, I think, is a fair analogy, and it reinforces the argument on which my conclusion is based, namely, that the period of limitation set by s. 17 is regarded as a period during which the ordinary remedy exists, and, if the right to bring an action and recover is for any reason removed, then the basis on which the running of the time under the statute operates goes with it.

The matter is less easy when one comes to the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1941, for by that Act in certain circumstances a right was given both to a debtor and to a creditor in respect of a claim which was caught by the regulations of 1940 to apply to the court and obtain what is referred to in the Act as a protection order, or, in some cases, a liabilities adjustment order. That right is bestowed by s. 3 of the Act which provides:

"(1) An application may be made to the court for the adjustment and settlement under this Part of this Act of the affairs of any person, on the ground that, owing to war circumstances . . ."

Then there are two paragraphs, (a) and (b), the substance of which is that the ground is that the person concerned is financially embarrassed owing to war circumstances. The sub-section goes on:

" . . . and any such application may be made—(i) by the debtor; (ii) by any creditor who is prevented, by reason of the provisions of reg. 4 or para. (2) of reg. 6 of the Defence (Evacuated Areas) Regulations, 1940, from commencing or prosecuting any proceedings or exercising any remedy in respect of a debt which would be a provable debt."

Section 3 (2) provides that, if the court thinks a prima facie case has been made out that the debtor is within para. (a) or para. (b) of sub-s. (1), i.e., that, as a result of the war, he is in financial difficulties, the court may make a protection order. The effect of a protection order is, so to speak, to place in cold storage the debtor's assets vis-a-vis all his creditors. No creditor can sue. The assets are held in suspense and protected for the benefit of all the creditors and of the debtor himself. Sub-section 6 provides that in addition in certain circumstances the court may make a liabilities adjustment order following a protection order. The court may also dismiss the application. What it appears that the court can in no circumstances do on an application under s. 3 (1) apart from a general liabilities adjustment order is to order the debtor to pay the claim of the creditor

- A who is prevented by the regulations of 1940 from bringing ordinary proceedings to recover his rent. It will be seen, therefore, pausing at this stage, that s. 3 in certain circumstances gives a limited right to go to the court, not only to the debtor but also to the creditor, who is, as one must assume this creditor was here, prevented from suing by the regulations of 1940, but the right is limited by the circumstance that the court cannot make an ordinary order for the debtor to pay the creditor the amount claimed. There is the further limitation that it is only if the court is of opinion that the debtor's financial difficulties prevent him from paying his debts and that they are due to the war that the court can make a protection order and an adjustment order. An example was given of a man who had to leave his premises because they were in an evacuation area, but was in no way financially embarrassed as a result of the war or otherwise.
- C In such a case as that it is plain, from what I have stated, that the landlord claiming the rent could not invoke the provisions of this Act to obtain a protection order or a liabilities adjustment order. It is to be observed, therefore, that such remedy as this section gives to the creditor is of a very limited nature. Its existence depends on the state of the debtor's financial circumstances, and it cannot, in my judgment, fairly be described as a right to recover the debt in question by any form of proceeding or action.

D Counsel for the defendant relied also on another matter, not without significance, to be found in s. 21 (2) of the Act which is to the effect that when a protection order is in due course revoked under the later part of the Act, then

- E "... for the purposes of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, Part V of the Companies Act, 1929, any enactment relating to the limitation of actions and any other enactment whereby any liability of the debtor may be affected by the passage of time ... " the period of the protection order is disregarded. Counsel says that since in terms the Act thus provides that a protection order, while it lasts, shall have the effect of suspending the running of time under the Limitation Act, it should follow, according to well recognised principles, that other results which flow from the operation of the Act do not have the effect of stopping the running of time, but I think the answer is that, if a protection order is made, it operates not only as regards the debt claimed by the creditor who makes the application, but as regards all debts owing by the debtor to all his creditors, whether or not those creditors were persons who would be prevented by the regulations of 1940 or

G by any other regulations from suing in the ordinary way for their debts. Since all the creditors are affected, it is understandable that it was thought necessary to provide by express language in the Act that during the operation of the protection order the running of time should be suspended so that on its revocation the debtor could not rely on that passage of time in setting up a defence based on the statute.

- H One other point I should refer to under s. 3 (1), to which I now return, and that is the language which I have read at the end of the provision relating to the creditor, and which I will repeat:

"An application may be made ... by any creditor who is prevented, by reason of ... reg. 4 or reg. 6 (2) of the Defence (Evacuated Areas) Regulations, 1940, from commencing or prosecuting any proceedings or exercising any remedy in respect of a debt which would be a provable debt ... "

There are other references in this Act to provable debts, and it is beyond doubt that for bankruptcy purposes a debt which is barred by a statute is not a provable debt, but what in this context is the significance of the phrase "a debt which would be a provable debt"? I cannot doubt that it means, and can only mean, a debt which, but for the regulation, and for the regulation alone, would be a provable debt. That, I venture to think, somewhat reinforces the view that the effect of reg. 4 of the regulations of 1940 was to suspend all remedies, and by so doing to suspend also the running of time under the Limitation Act. A

In my judgment, therefore, the operation of the Act of 1941 did not put an end to the suspension caused by reg. 4 of the regulations of 1940. It did not cause the running of time, so to speak, to re-start. If that is so, then, as I follow the arguments in this case, nothing else really matters. The debt became due originally on Sept. 29, 1940. The evacuation period began when the defendant left the premises, which was on Feb. 26, 1942. Then, and then only, the regulations of 1940 applied. Between the two dates I have mentioned a period of one year and five months (approximately) had elapsed. The Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1944, which amended the Act of 1941, came into operation on Oct. 26, 1944. For reasons which I will state presently, there may well be a stronger argument for saying that that Act did put an end to the suspension of the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 17. Suppose it did. In the first proceeding the claim was issued on Nov. 4, 1948, which is slightly more than four years after the coming into operation of the Act of 1944. So that, if to that period of four years and a week is added the one year and five months which had elapsed between Sept. 29, 1940, and Feb. 26, 1942, the period during which time was running against the plaintiff is still less than six years at the time when the present proceedings were started. In those circumstances, it would appear that time never ran so as to bar the claim of the plaintiffs in the action. B C D

It would, therefore, perhaps seem unnecessary to pursue the matter further, but it is right to say a few words in deference to the argument that the Act of 1944, which amended the earlier Act in important respects, differed from it in two vital characteristics. Whereas under the Act of 1941 the right of the creditor to invoke the court's jurisdiction was limited to cases in which the debtor was financially embarrassed as a result of the war, that characteristic is absent from the Act of 1944. Section 2 (1) of the Act of 1944 provides that "Any person who owes any such debt"—and that for the present purposes includes a debt such as we are concerned with here rendered irrecoverable by the regulation of 1940—"or the person to whom he is so indebted . . . may apply to the court," that is to say, the right to invoke the jurisdiction of the court is irrespective of the financial circumstances of the debtor. Further, the court in the exercise of its discretion may do what the learned county court judge here did, namely, simply order the defendant to pay the debt. So that there is, by virtue of the powers given by s. 2 of the Act of 1944, a right vested in the creditor to claim and to bring proceedings to recover the debt without regard to any other debts owing by the debtor. The matter may, I think, be carried one stage further by reference again to reg. 4A of the regulations of 1940 which was added by the Order of 1945. It provides that where an order has been made putting an end quoad any particular premises to an evacuation period, then any debts owing on the date when that order comes into operation which were the subject of suspension under the earlier regulation shall only be recoverable and enforced by virtue of proceedings under s. 2 of the Act of 1944, and no other proceedings shall be taken in respect of them. Always on the hypothesis that this sum of rent was covered by the regulations of 1940, it follows that, when the evacuation period in reference to this house ended, as it did, on Mar. 31, 1947, no longer could it be said that the old rights of action survived. The ordinary rights for suing in the courts in the ordinary way were taken away for ever and instead. E F G H of them the only remedy was under s. 2. I find it difficult to suppose that no statute of limitation would apply to this remedy left to the creditor so that he could wait ten, twenty, or a hundred years before he made his application under s. 2. If that is so, then it seems to follow that the remedy given by s. 2 of the Act of 1944 may well have been regarded, at least from the end of the evacuation period, as a right to recover equivalent to an action which, unless brought within the requisite period, would be barred in the ordinary course by the statute of limitation. It is, I think, unnecessary to express a concluded opinion on the matter, but, at least, it is plain from what I have said that there is a much stronger case for saying that from the time the Act of 1944 began to operate, or, at any rate, from the end of the evacuation period, the suspension of the running of time under the Limitation Act, 1939, came to an end, but, for reasons which I have already indicated, as it turns out, that does not matter, the plaintiffs having started their proceedings in due time when all the periods during which the statute ran against them are added together. For these reasons, therefore, I think the learned judge was right in concluding, as he did, that the statute of limitations was not a bar to the claim under the Act of 1944, and it has not been suggested, that being so, that there is any ground for quarrelling with the learned judge's conclusion that this was a debt which the defendant should be ordered to pay.

There is one final point, and that is in regard to the costs of the first action before application under the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Acts, 1941 and 1944, was made. As I stated, in the order which the learned judge made, it was provided that the respondent pay to the applicants their costs not only of that application (the application under the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Acts) but also of the first action. On the hypothesis on which the whole of this argument has proceeded, this was a debt covered by the regulations of 1940 and so was a debt in respect of which, by the express language of reg. 4A added by the Order of 1945, no proceedings would be taken other than by way of application under the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Acts. On the matter of costs it is plain and needs no emphasis that this court is exceedingly slow to interfere with the discretion of the learned judge below, but it seems to me in face of that regulation that an order that the defendant should pay the costs of proceedings which the judge had held to be incompetent was not a proper exercise of his discretion in regard to costs. I, therefore, would vary the learned judge's order accordingly. In other respects, for the reasons which I have given, I think the order made was correct, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree that this appeal fails. I agree with what has been said by the Master of the Rolls with regard to the regulations of 1940, namely, that in respect of the debts which are made irrecoverable by reg. 4 (1) the statute of limitation did not run. That regulation effected what has been called a moratorium. At that time no one could forecast what provisions would ultimately be made by regulation or by statute. One can imagine a case in which, debts of a certain kind having been made irrecoverable, it is possible that they never should be recoverable but are ultimately wiped out altogether and the creditors are unable to get any relief in respect of them. In another case one can imagine at the end of the period the full common law right of issuing a writ or any other common law or statutory right which normally exists being restored, so that the position as from that date is precisely as if no regulation had ever been made. In considering, therefore, over what period the statute of limitation was made inoperative by reg. 4 of the regulations of 1940, it is necessary to consider the right which it is now being sought to exercise and, indeed, to consider—as we can in the present circumstances where everything has come to an end and the final provision has been made—the last chapter as well as the intermediate chapters of the story.

In the course of the argument, I gave an illustration which, perhaps, makes clear the sort of point I have in mind. One can imagine theoretically, though it is not very probable, a case in which debts were made irrecoverable as from Jan. 1 in the year 1. The statute of limitation, therefore, ceased to run. At the end of two years, on Jan. 1 in the year 3, fifty per cent. of those debts were made recoverable by ordinary process, and a creditor who was owed £100 claimed £50. On Jan. 1 in the year 5 the remaining fifty per cent. was made recoverable. It seems to me that in respect of that last fifty per cent. the statute of limitation would only run as from Jan. 1 in year 5, whereas in respect of the fifty per cent. made recoverable on Jan 1 in year 3 it would run as from that date. In the present case, when the matter was finally dealt with, as it was, by the order of 1945, there was not restored to the creditors their pre-existing right of issuing a writ at common law, but it was provided that, when the evacuation period was brought to an end by an order, which, as has been said, happened in 1947, creditors in respect of debts owing on that day had the right to use the procedure which had been in existence since October, 1944, under the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1944, s. 2. In those circumstances, it seems to me that quoad any rights which were restored in respect of rent or other debts covered by the regulations of 1940, the statute of limitation began to run at the time when those rights could have been exercised, which was when the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1944, came into force. Therefore, though I arrive at the same conclusion as the Master of the Rolls, I arrive at it, perhaps, on slightly different grounds.

Counsel for the defendant sought to say that the statute of limitations began to run in 1941, when, at any rate, some right was conferred on creditors whose debts had become subject to this regulation. I will assume (without deciding) in counsel's favour, as he so argued, that under an adjustment order made under the Act of 1941 the county court judge could have made an order for the payment of rent made irrecoverable under reg. 4 of the regulations of 1940. I think he would be very unlikely to have done so because, as has been pointed out by the Master of the Rolls, so far as one can see in the case of a man who was not in financial embarrassment, the creditor had no legal means of enforcing payment, but I will assume for the purposes of this decision that the county court judge under s. 3 of the Act of 1941 could have made an order for the payment of the sum made irrecoverable by the regulation. That, in the view I take, would not assist counsel in his argument, because, whatever the powers of the county court judge may have been under that Act, it is plain that the position of the creditor and his rights were less than those under s. 2 of the Act of 1944. Broadly speaking, under s. 3 of the Act of 1941 he is given a locus standi. He is put in a position in which he may be taken into account in the liability adjustment order, or he may not. It is discretionary, but under s. 2 of the Act of 1944 he may make an application, and on that application the court has to determine how the debt is to be paid. It is in respect of those rights, the rights under s. 2, which are plainly different from and greater than the rights under s. 3 of the Act of 1941, that we have to consider when the statute of limitation began to run. For the reasons which I have given, it seems to me it cannot have begun to run until the time when these rights themselves were able to be exercised, namely, in October, 1944. I do not wish to add anything with regard to what happens as a result of that because that has been fully stated by the Master of the Rolls. For these reasons, I think this appeal fails.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. It seems to me that reg. 4 (1) (a) of the Defence (Evacuated Areas) Regulations, 1940, involves, by necessary implication, the result that, during the period for which the rent is made irrecoverable, the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 17, has no operation. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the necessity for that implication is best brought out by reading the section as if a specific period exceeding six years had been prescribed as the evacuation period. For example, one might do that by taking in the present

A case the fullest extent of the evacuation period, namely, the period from Sept. 12, 1940, the date of the declaration, to Mar. 31, 1947, the date when the area ceased to be an evacuation area. Starting with a suspension during the evacuation period of the operation of s. 17 of the Act of 1939, I pass to consider whether there is anything in the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Acts to remove that suspension. So far as the Act of 1941 is concerned, I entirely agree with the Master of the Rolls that there is nothing in it which would justify the conclusion that it had the effect of removing the suspension. Nothing in the remotest degree equivalent to the ordinary right of action is given to a creditor in the position of the landlord here.

B I do not think that the defendant can derive any substantial assistance from references to "provable debts." I do not think the reference in s. 3 (1) (ii) of the Act of 1941 to a debt which would be a provable debt carries the matter any further, for the use that is sought to be made of it by the defendant really begs the question. It is clear that the debt is to be considered a provable debt notwithstanding the Defence (Evacuated Areas) Regulations, 1940, but the question whether, being by the express terms of the Act of 1941 a provable debt notwithstanding the moratorium imposed by those regulations, it is taken out of the category of provable debts for the purposes of the Act of 1941, brings one back to the original question: Did the Defence (Evacuated Areas) Regulations have the effect of suspending the operation of the Limitation Act, 1939? Again, the reference in s. 21 (2) of the Act of 1941 to any enactment relating to the limitation of actions in relation to the effect of revoking a protection order cannot, I think, be regarded as indicating that time would otherwise continue to run as regards debts of the kind with which this case is concerned. It must be remembered that the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1941, related to debts of all kinds and not merely to debts affected by the Defence (Evacuated Areas) Regulations. If, on the true construction of the Defence (Evacuated Areas) Regulations, the operation of the Limitation Act, 1939, was thereby suspended, it is plain that the reference to any enactment relating to the limitation of actions in s. 21 (2) of the Act of 1941 would be irrelevant so far as those debts were concerned.

E To the Liabilities (War-Time Adjustment) Act, 1944, somewhat different considerations apply. As the Master of the Rolls has pointed out, a creditor under that Act is given a different and much more effective remedy. I agree with him that there is considerable ground for holding that the introduction of the new remedy by s. 2 of the Act of 1944 may have made time under the Limitation Act, 1939, begin to run again, but I also prefer with him to express no concluded opinion on that matter, and to content myself with holding that, having regard to the suspension brought about by the Defence (Evacuated Areas) Regulations, 1940, of the running of time under the Limitation Act, 1939, and to the absence of anything in the Act of 1941 to affect such suspension, it is clear that time can at earliest only have begun to run again as from the date of the commencement of the Act of 1944. It being unnecessary for the decision of this case to express any concluded opinion on the question whether the suspension of the running of time did end on that date or continued until the cesser of the evacuation period on Mar. 31, 1947, I refrain from doing so. I agree that the appeal fails.

H Appeal dismissed with costs save that the order of the county court judge that the defendant should pay the costs of the first action was struck out.

Solicitors: Kenneth Brown, Baker, Baker (for the defendant); A. J. Wright, agent for Lawson, Lewis & Bairstow, Eastbourne (for the plaintiffs).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

GOLDSACK v. SHORE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Jenkins, L.JJ.),
January 18, 19, 1950.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Agreement to let land for interest less than tenancy from year to year—Whether agreement capable of taking effect as tenancy from year to year—Need for agreement to be enforceable at law—Jurisdiction of county court—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 2 (1) (2). A

The appellant applied to the county court for an order for possession of land owned by him and occupied by the respondent for grazing. It was alleged that "during the winter of 1948-49" the appellant "without valuable consideration orally granted to the respondent a tenancy at will or licence" to graze sheep, and that, such tenancy at will or licence having been duly terminated, the respondent had remained in occupation as a trespasser. The county court judge ruled that he had no jurisdiction to hear the matter because of the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 2, which, by sub-s. (1), makes certain provisions regarding the letting, under an "agreement" made on or after Mar. 1, 1948, of agricultural land for less than from year to year, and, by sub-s. (2), provides that any dispute as to the operation of sub-s. (1) in relation to any agreement shall be determined by arbitration under the Act. B

HELD: an "agreement" within the meaning of s. 2 (1) meant a contract enforceable at law, i.e., a contract supported by valuable consideration flowing from the grantee to the grantor and capable of being enlarged into a tenancy from year to year; the county court had jurisdiction to determine whether or not a transaction was within s. 2 (1); and the case would be remitted to the county court for further proceeding. C

[FOR THE AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACT, 1948, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., 1948 STATUTES, p. 23.] D

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour JUDGE ERNEST EVANS, K.C., sitting at Holywell County Court, dated Oct. 13, 1949, holding that, in consequence of the provisions of s. 2 (2) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, the county court had no jurisdiction to hear an action arising out of an agreement for letting agricultural land for less than year to year. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and remitted the case for hearing and determination. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. E

*Sutton, K.C., W. Russell Lawrence and H. Emlyn Jones for the plaintiff.
J. Edward Jones for the defendant.* F

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This appeal raises a question of jurisdiction under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 2. The action was started in the Mold County Court by the plaintiff, Mr. Goldsack, who claimed possession of certain land called Black Mountain or Castell Mountain. According to the particulars of claim the plaintiff (admittedly the owner of the land) alleged that "during the winter of 1948-49" he "without valuable consideration orally granted to the defendant a tenancy at will or licence to occupy the said land by having sheep thereon." It is pleaded that the tenancy at will or licence was duly determined and that thereafter the defendant became a trespasser and still is. The defendant denied that the arrangement was of the character pleaded in the particulars of claim and set up that there was a contract of tenancy as understood by the law, or, alternatively, that there was an agreement of a nature which is now converted into a contract of tenancy from year to year by virtue of s. 2. The case was opened, and the plaintiff gave evidence. The point then arose whether the question of the applicability of the section to the transaction, whatever it was, was one which it was competent for the court G to decide, or whether that question was one exclusively referred to arbitration by s. 2 (2) of the Act. The county court judge thought that the latter was the correct course, and he, therefore, stopped the case, regarding himself as bereft of jurisdiction to decide the preliminary question: Aye or no, was the transaction between the two parties within or without the ambit of s. 2 (1) ?

A It is against that decision that counsel for the plaintiff has appealed to this court. He has pointed out that it is not open to us—indeed, he does not ask us—to express any view as to what in truth the transaction was and what were its real characteristics, but it is plain from the pleading, that, if the plaintiff's evidence is accepted, the transaction was one granting some privilege to the defendant without any valuable consideration and was, in other words, a transaction incapable of being enforced in the courts by the defendant. It is plain from the discussion that another possible view may emerge, namely, that the privilege B was one (whether for consideration or not) limited to the period of the year known as "the winter." The county court judge in a brief judgment expressed his conclusion thus:

C "The word 'agreement' [in s. 2 (1)] bears its ordinary meaning. From what I have heard it would appear that the plaintiff at least agreed to grant defendant a licence."

That is one of the situations mentioned in s. 2 (1) and, therefore, he said he had no jurisdiction to try the issue.

Section 2 of the Act provides:

D "(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, where under an agreement made on or after Mar. 1, 1948, any land is let to a person for use as agricultural land for an interest less than a tenancy from year to year, or a person is granted a licence to occupy land for use as agricultural land, and the circumstances are such that if his interest were a tenancy from year to year he would in respect of that land be the tenant of an agricultural holding, then, unless the letting or grant was approved by the Minister before the agreement E was entered into, the agreement shall take effect, with the necessary modifications, as if it were an agreement for the letting of the land for a tenancy from year to year: Provided that this subsection shall not have effect in relation to an agreement for the letting of land, or the granting of a licence to occupy land, made (whether or not the agreement expressly so provides) in contemplation of the use of the land only for grazing or mowing during some F specified period of the year, or to an agreement for the letting of land, or the granting of a licence to occupy land, by a person whose interest in the land is less than a tenancy from year to year and has not by virtue of this section taken effect as such a tenancy. (2) Any dispute arising as to the operation of the foregoing subsection in relation to any agreement shall be determined by arbitration under this Act."

G It is plain from what I have read that the county court judge thought that the word "agreement" was used in the loose, popular sense as meaning the assent of two minds to a certain transaction taking effect and was not an agreement in the sense of a contract as understood by and known to the law. In my judgment, the judge was in error in that respect. I accept the submission of counsel for the plaintiff that the jurisdiction of the King's courts must not H be taken to be excluded unless there is clear language in the statute which is alleged to have that effect. Illustrations were given during the course of the argument of results that might arise if the courts were wholly debarred from adjudicating in respect of a transaction of this character. In such a case the party whose land was affected might be left wholly without any remedy. In any event, on the terms of the proviso the sub-section is not to have effect in the case of the letting of land or the granting of a licence of land for some specified period of time. If the section does not affect a transaction, then it must, in my judgment, follow that the provision for reference to arbitration as to the operation of the section thereon can have no effect. The arbitrator would have no jurisdiction. It is plain that, if the transaction is one which by its terms is excluded from the Act, the courts have jurisdiction to deal with any consequences arising out of the transaction which call for the invocation of the powers of the court. Equally, to my mind, the court must have jurisdiction to decide, aye or no, whether a transaction is or is not within the proviso—that is, is, or is not, excluded from the section. A

If the nature of the transaction is proved to be merely an arrangement (I will use for the moment a colourless word) limited to “the winter of 1948-49,” and if the county court judge is satisfied that in using that formula the parties intended and meant some season of the year which is capable of reasonably clear ascertainment, it seems to me the transaction would be taken out of the section in any case as being for a “specified period of the year,” namely, the winter, which was the period specified in this case. That may not, of course, be the conclusion on the facts, and it is not in those terms that the plaintiff has pleaded the case. On his pleading he has put forward his case as being a transaction entered into during the winter, but being without valuable consideration—that is to say, a transaction granting to the defendant a privilege which imposed no obligations and was not a transaction that was enforceable at the suit of the defendant. B C

The main question which has been debated is whether such a transaction is within the terms of s. 2 (1). I have come to the conclusion that it is not. It is true that the early part of the sub-section uses the word “agreement,” and, secondly, refers to the grant to a person of a “licence to occupy land.” If the matter had depended on that alone it might be said that it covered the giving of a purely voluntary licence—something without any consideration whatever and prima facie revocable at will. It is to be observed that the sub-section goes on to say that the transaction which has been previously described must be such that, if the interest given were capable of being translated into a tenancy from year to year, then it shall take effect as such with the necessary modifications. It follows, therefore, that, if the sub-section applies to it, it must be capable of being so modified (and that must mean modified consistently with its own terms) as to become enlarged into a tenancy from year to year. Further, it follows, I think, from the sentence “unless the letting or grant was approved by the Minister before the agreement was entered into,” that the word “agreement” is being used in the more precise sense of a contract, that is, an enforceable contract, and it makes it plain that the grant of a licence is a grant comprehended in an “agreement” as later mentioned. D E F

Some corroboration for my view may be derived from the fact that the cross-heading (which it is at least legitimate for us to look at) immediately preceding the section is in these terms: “Provisions as to Contracts of Tenancy.” When all these matters are taken into account, and, particularly, when regard is had to the very remarkable results that might arise if this section is to be treated as applicable to a purely voluntary arrangement without any consideration, I conclude that “the agreement,” which it is postulated must, in every case to which the sub-section applies, exist, means a contract enforceable at law, that is to say, a contract supported by valuable consideration flowing to the grantor from the grantee. If that be right, then, if the judge, on further pursuing this matter, comes to the conclusion that, whatever was the arrangement, it was voluntary in the sense that no consideration flowed from the defendant to the plaintiff, the transaction will be outside the section, and no question can arise for the arbitrator to determine as to the operation of the section on it or the modification of the terms of the arrangement in order to enlarge it into a tenancy from year to year. Of course, all kinds of conclusions may emerge from a full hearing of the facts. The judge might reach the G H conclusion that there was some consideration, though it was not a consideration in money or by way of rent. I think it would be impossible for this court to imagine every result that could be arrived at on the hearing of the facts of this case and endeavour to state in the form of some exegetical code what would be the effect of the section, or whether it would have any effect, on any possible view. Counsel for the plaintiff argued that this was a transaction entered into without consideration on the part of the defendant, that on that view the section does not apply, and that in any case it is competent for the courts to determine whether the transaction, being of the nature alleged, was or was not within the section.

The first contention of counsel for the plaintiff was that the privilege granted to the defendant was that of a mere non-exclusive licence—that is to say, that he was entitled to graze his sheep on the mountain, but not so as to have the exclusive right at any time so to do. If that be the right view and there was no consideration for it, a fortiori the matter would be outside the section. In reference to that I should mention the point taken by counsel for the defendant, namely, that the real test is whether the privilege or right, whatever it may be, gave to the person to whom it was granted a right to occupy—by which he means, I think, exclusively to occupy. In a sense that may beg the question, for, if the nature of the privilege given is a mere licence unsupported by consideration, it cannot strictly be stated that any “right” to occupy had been conferred. No doubt, until it was revoked the licensee could not be said to be a trespasser, but he could not claim and enforce in the courts any right to continue in occupation, still less in exclusive occupation, of the property. It might be that there could be a tenancy at will without consideration. In so far as there was a tenancy, that would appear to involve an exclusive right of occupation. The point of counsel for the defendant was that, assuming, against him, that the problem of determining whether the transaction was within or without s. 1 (1) is, by s. 1 (2), a matter not for the arbitrator but for the court (which I have already dealt with), then the test whether the transaction is within the sub-section depends on whether an exclusive right of occupation is given and not on the presence or absence of consideration. He supports that by the reference in the sub-section to the word “occupy” in the sentence “granted a licence to occupy land for use as agricultural land.” Reference has also been made to the obligations imposed on occupiers of agricultural land by s. 11 of the Agriculture Act, 1947. I think the right test for present purposes is whether there was or was not valuable consideration—in other words, whether the transaction was a contract as understood and known to the law, whether or not an exclusive right of occupation was given or purported to be given thereby.

If that view is right, then the judge was wrong in treating himself as barred from determining the question of the applicability of the Act as distinct from its operation and he should not have stopped the case when he did. He should have continued to hear the matter out, and then, according to his decision on the facts, he should have determined whether on the view I have stated the case is one to which sub-s. (1) applies. If it is, the results are not for him to adjudicate on. The problem is referred to arbitration. If, however, the transaction is not covered by the sub-section, the matter is one which he can decide and determine according to the ordinary law. I am not attempting to lay down for the guidance of the judge what the answer would be in every possible circumstance. I have confined myself to the two most probable solutions emerging either from the application of the proviso or the presence or absence of consideration, and I prefer to leave the matter there. It may be that other problems may arise. It is the judge who must decide, and it is within his jurisdiction to decide, whether the case is within the Act or not. If he comes to a conclusion to which one of the parties objects, it would be open to that party to come to this court again. For the reasons that I have stated, I think the judge should not have stopped the case, and that it should be referred back again that he may pursue the inquiry.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree.

JENKINS, L.J.: I also agree.

Case referred back to county court. Appellant to have costs of appeal. Costs of first hearing to be in discretion of county court judge at second hearing.

Solicitors: Pritchard, Englefield & Co., agents for Mason & Moore Dutton, Chester (for the plaintiff); Lovell, Son & Pitfield, agents for Walker Smith & Way, Mold (for the defendant).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

J. LYONS & CO., LTD. v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR HOME AFFAIRS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Sellers, JJ.), January 18, 23, 1950.]

Requisition—Compensation—Damage to land—Work done on land—Air-raid shelter erected during possession by Crown—Shelter removed after possession yielded up—Period between return of possession and restoration to original condition—Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939 (c. 75), s. 3 (2)—Requisitioned Land and War Works Act, 1948 (c. 17), s. 11 (2).

By s. 11 (2) of the Requisitioned Land and War Works Act, 1948: "Nothing in s. 3 of the [Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939] (which provides for compensation in respect of the doing of work on land) shall apply, or be deemed ever to have applied, to damage to land occurring while possession of the land is retained."

On Dec. 14, 1942, the Crown took possession of certain basement premises, the property of the claimants, and converted them into an air-raid shelter. On July 26, 1945, the Crown returned possession of the premises to the claimants. The restoration of the basement to its original condition was then carried out by the local authority on behalf of the Crown, this work being completed on May 28, 1946. The claimants claimed compensation under s. 3 (2) of the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939, for the period from July 26, 1945, to May 28, 1946.

HELD: the words "damage to land" in s. 11 (2) of the Act of 1948 included physical damage ascribable to the doing of work on the land, and, as that damage occurred in the present case during a period while possession was retained by the Crown, no compensation was payable even although the effects of the damage persisted after possession had been yielded up.

[FOR THE COMPENSATION (DEFENCE) ACT, 1939, s. 3 (2), and THE REQUISITIONED LAND AND WAR WORKS ACT, 1948, s. 11 (2), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 3, pp. 993, 1117.]

CASE STATED by the General Claims Tribunal under s. 7 of the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939, for the opinion of the High Court whether the claimants, who were the owners of premises on which works were carried out during requisitioning by the Crown, were entitled to compensation under s. 3 (2) of that Act for the period from the date when possession of the premises was returned to the claimants to the date when the premises had been restored to their previous condition by the Crown. The Divisional Court held that no compensation was payable during this period. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LYNSEY, J.

Salmon, K.C., and J. P. Ashworth for the claimants.

H. L. Parker for the Crown.

A

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 23. LYNSEY, J., read the following judgment of the court. This is a Special Case for the opinion of the court stated by the General Claims Tribunal under s. 7 of the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939. The claimants for compensation under the Act are J. Lyons & Co., Ltd., who at all material times were the owners of a basement known as 538/540 Oxford Street, London. On Dec. 14, 1942, possession of these premises was taken on behalf of His Majesty under the powers conferred by reg. 51 (1) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939. About the end of 1942 or the beginning of 1943, while possession was still retained on behalf of His Majesty, brick walls were constructed and other works were done on behalf of His Majesty in the said basement in order to adapt the same for use as an air-raid shelter. Possession was yielded up to the claimants on July 26, 1945, with the brick walls and other works in the said basement still in being. On Jan. 3, 1946, the St. Marylebone Borough Council on behalf of His Majesty and by agreement with the claimants entered on the said basement in order to remove as far as practicable the walls and works and to restore the basement to the condition in which it was before possession was taken in 1942. The removal of these walls and works was completed by May 28, 1946.

D

The question submitted for the opinion of the court is whether, on the facts stated, the claimants are entitled to compensation under s. 3 (2) of the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939, during the period from the date when possession of the premises was yielded up to the claimants to the date when the premises were restored so far as practicable to the condition in which they would be but for the doing of the work, that is to say, for the period from July 26, 1945, to May 28, 1946. The answer to this question depends on what is the proper construction to be given to ss. 1, 2 and s. 3 of the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939, as amended by s. 11 (2) of the Requisitioned Land and War Works Act, 1948.

E

Section 1 of the Act of 1939 provides:

F

“(1) Where, in the exercise of emergency powers during the period [of the emergency] (a) possession of any land has been taken on behalf of His Majesty, or (b) any property other than land has been requisitioned or acquired on behalf of His Majesty, or (c) any work has been done on any land on behalf of His Majesty . . . then, subject to the following provisions of this Act, compensation assessed in accordance with those provisions shall be paid, out of moneys provided by Parliament, in respect of the taking possession of the land, the requisition or acquisition of the property, or the doing of the work, as the case may be.”

G

This section not only gives the subject a right to compensation for interference by the Crown with his proprietary rights, but also fixes that compensation and limits the right to compensation which he might have had at common law. However great the hardship a subject may suffer as a result of the exercise by the Crown of these emergency powers, the subject has no redress apart from the compensation given to him by the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939. Section 2 (1) of the Act of 1939 purports to fix the compensation payable under the Act in respect of the taking possession of any land. Section 3 (1) of the Act purports to fix the compensation payable in respect of “the doing of any work on any land” and ss. 4, 5 and 6 purport to fix the compensation to be paid in respect of any property other than land which has been requisitioned or acquired on behalf of His Majesty. Section 2 (1) reads:

H

"The compensation payable under this Act in respect of the taking possession of any land shall be the aggregate of the following sums . . ."

Then follow four heads, the first of which (a) provides for a payment of a sum equal to a reasonable rent payable under a lease on the terms set out. The second head, (b), provides for a sum equal to the cost of making good any damage to the land which may have occurred during the period for which possession is retained, unless made good during that period, fair wear and tear and damage caused by war operations excepted. The third head, (c), deals with agricultural land, which does not arise in this case, and the fourth head, (d), a sum equal to the amount of any expenses reasonably incurred for compliance with directions given on behalf of His Majesty in connection with the taking of possession of the land. If this section were read alone it would seem clear that by its terms it fixed the total of the compensation payable in respect of the taking possession of any land. Section 3 provides for payment of compensation in respect of the doing of any work on any land and fixes that compensation as being a sum calculated by reference to the diminution of the annual value of the land ascribable to the doing of the work. It is to be paid in instalments quarterly in arrear to the person for the time being entitled to occupy the land. This compensation must be paid until either the land is restored, so far as practicable, to the condition in which it would be but for the doing of the work or until a notice is served on the person for the time being entitled to occupy the land of an intention to discharge the liability by payment not earlier than a specified date of a lump sum equal to the amount of the depreciation in the value of any estate or interest which any person has in the land caused by the doing of the work. This is the effect of sub-ss. (2), (3) and (4) of s. 3. It will be noticed that the compensation is to be paid to "the person who for the time being is entitled to occupy the land" and notice is to be given to "the person for the time being entitled to occupy the land." If possession of the land had been taken by or on behalf of the Crown, there would be no person other than the Crown or its representatives who would be "for the time being entitled to occupy the land" and this fact suggests that s. 3 is dealing with the doing of work on land of which possession has not been taken by the Crown.

The real difficulty in construing s. 3 arises from the provisions of sub-s. (8) of that section. This sub-section provides:

"No compensation under this section shall, in relation to any land, be payable in respect of any period for which possession of that land is taken on behalf of His Majesty in the exercise of emergency powers."

It is said that the sub-section leads to the inference that where works have been done on any land, compensation under s. 3 is payable during any period during which possession of the land is not retained by or on behalf of the Crown even although the works have been done while the land was in the possession of the Crown. On the other hand, it is said that this sub-section is only intended to apply when work has been done on land which was not in the possession of the Crown, but possession of which had subsequently been taken on behalf of the Crown, and that the real object of sub-s. 8 was to prevent double compensation being payable during the period of possession. It seemed to us that the sub-section was ambiguous and open to either interpretation as it stood in the Act of 1939. The question was, however, re-considered by the legislature in 1948. The Requisitioned Land and War Works Act, 1948, s. 11 (2), provides:

"Nothing in s. 3 of the Act of 1939 (which provides for compensation in respect of the doing of work on land) shall apply, or be deemed ever to have applied, to damage to land occurring while possession of the land is retained."

Unless it can be said that the "doing of work on land" is something different from "damage to land" this sub-section would seem to make it quite clear that no compensation is payable under s. 3 for works done during the period when possession was retained by or on behalf of the Crown. Having regard to the wide description of "doing work" in s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1939 and the fact that s. 3 only gives compensation where the annual value is diminished by the doing of the work, we are satisfied that "damage to the land" in s. 11 (2) of the Act of 1948 includes damage ascribable to the doing of work on the land. Further, in our view, "damage to land" means physical damage to the land or houses or buildings thereon, and, if such damage occurs during a period while possession is retained, s. 3 of the Act of 1939 gives no compensation for such damage even although its effects may persist after possession has been yielded up.

Our answer, therefore, to the question submitted to us is that the claimants are not entitled to compensation under s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1939 in respect of the diminution of the annual value of any part of their premises ascribable to the doing of work during the period from the date when possession of the basement was yielded up to the date when the premises were restored as far as practicable to the condition in which they would be but for the doing of the work.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Bartlett & Gluckstein (for the claimants); Treasury Solicitor (for the Crown).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re HENDERSON. HENDERSON v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR HOME AFFAIRS AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), July 28, November 7, 1949.]

Extradition—Discharge of fugitive—Power of court to make order—Circumstances influencing exercise of power—"Unjust or oppressive or too severe a punishment to return the fugitive"—Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881 (c. 69), s. 10.

By the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, s. 10: "Where it is made to appear to a superior court that by reason of the trivial nature of the case, or by reason of the application for the return of a fugitive not being made in good faith in the interests of justice or otherwise, it would, having regard to the distance, to the facilities for communication, and to all the circumstances of the case, be unjust or oppressive or too severe a punishment to return the fugitive either at all or until the expiration of a certain period, such court may discharge the fugitive, either absolutely or on bail, or order that he shall not be returned until after the expiration of the period named in the order, or may make such other order in the premises as to the court seems just."

In 1944, while serving with the Indian Army, the applicant was charged with cheating and dishonestly inducing delivery of property, contrary to the Indian Penal Code, 1860, s. 420, the allegation being that he was involved in a conspiracy which had defrauded the government of large sums of money. The investigations were still proceeding when the applicant was repatriated to England for demobilisation in February, 1948. On his failure to return to India for the trial, a warrant was issued in India for his arrest and was indorsed, under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, s. 3, by the metropolitan magistrate at Bow Street, and on June 22, 1949, the applicant was committed to prison, under s. 5 of the Act, to await his return to India. On an application to the Court of Appeal for relief under s. 10 of the Act, the applicant contended inter alia (a) that it would not be possible for him to defend himself properly in India owing to the difficulties caused by the delay, and (b) that a fair trial in India was no longer possible as the constitution of the special tribunal which had been set up to try the case had entirely changed since it was first set up and the present members would not see and hear the witnesses for the prosecution themselves, but would merely read their evidence. He submitted that, in these circumstances, it would be too severe a punishment, within the meaning of s. 10, to return him, and that the court had a discretion to discharge him from custody.

HELD: (i) assuming that the correct interpretation of s. 10 of the Act of 1881 was that the court had a discretion to make an order under the section in any case where "having regard to the distance, the facilities for communication, and to all the circumstances of the case, it appears to the court that it would be oppressive, or too severe a punishment, to return the fugitive ..." (as was submitted by the Attorney-General in R. v. Brixton Prison (Governor), Ex parte Waite (1921) (THE TIMES, Feb. 22) and accepted by the Divisional Court for the purpose of that case), the court would make an order for the release of a fugitive only (a) where it appeared that the contemplated proceedings, although, perhaps, lawful by the law of the country concerned, would be conducted in a way contrary to natural justice, or (b) if it appeared that the charges were trivial and that the punishment entailed in being returned was out of all proportion to the gravity of the alleged offence.

(ii) the difficulties which the applicant would experience in presenting his defence as a result of the length of time that had elapsed since the proceedings started were matters for the consideration of the tribunal dealing with the case and were factors which would be considered by the tribunal of any civilised country when dealing with a criminal matter.

(iii) the facts that the constitution of the tribunal had changed since the trial started and that the rules of procedure were different from those in England were not a ground for assuming that the applicant would not obtain justice.

(iv) the charges against the applicant were serious ones, and it was impossible to say that he would be unduly punished by having to return to India for the trial or that the action of the government of India in seeking his extradition was, in the circumstances, oppressive, and, therefore, he had failed to make out a case for the intervention of the court under s. 10 of the Act of 1881.

[AS TO RETURN OF FUGITIVES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 14, pp. 544-551, paras. 1046-1062; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 24, pp. 890-893, Nos. 150-161.]

Case referred to:

(1) R. v. Brixton Prison (Governor), Ex parte Waite, (1921), THE TIMES, Feb. 22.

ORIGINAL MOTION for relief under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, s. 10.

The applicant, who had resided in India since he was three years old, obtained a commission in the Indian Army, as an officer of the Royal Indian Engineers, in 1941 and saw service in Burma. Early in 1944 he was arrested in connection with a series of serious frauds which were alleged to have been committed by contractors and others in connection with repair and constructional work during the retreat from Burma, but he was later released on bail. The alleged frauds and conspiracies were on such an extensive scale that it became necessary for a special tribunal to be constituted under Indian Ordinances to deal with them. The evidence and matters that had to be considered were extremely complex, hundreds of witnesses had to be examined, and the examination of the witnesses for the prosecution and some of the witnesses for the defendants continued from June, 1945, to May, 1947, the applicant, together with a number of other defendants, being charged with cheating and dishonestly inducing delivery of property, contrary to the Indian Penal Code, 1860, (Act 45 of 1860), s. 420. In the summer of 1947 the applicant and some of the other defendants entered into negotiations with the government of Burma with a view to compounding the proceedings, which would have been permissible under Indian law if the tribunal and the government of India consented. A tentative agreement was reached whereby the proceedings would be discontinued and the defendants would allow the prosecution to take their assets, which, as the alleged proceeds of the frauds, had been attached pending the proceedings. The compounding negotiations broke down, however, apparently owing to the fact that it was not practicable to secure the release of the attached moneys unless and until the defendants had either been prosecuted to conviction or acquitted. As a result of the division of India into the dominions of India and Pakistan and the communal riots which followed, and also owing to the death of one of the members of the tribunal and other changes in the constitution of the tribunal (which were provided for by the Ordinances under which the tribunal was set up), the progress of the inquiry was delayed. In the meanwhile the applicant was serving with the army in Lahore (which became part of Pakistan on the partition of India on Aug. 15, 1947), and in November, 1947, he was transferred to Karachi. Owing to some oversight by the British military authorities in Pakistan, who were aware of the fact that the applicant should not be released until the charges had been disposed of, he was returned to England for demobilisation in February, 1948, and had remained in England since then, having obtained civilian employment here. On Apr. 1, 1948, he was required to attend again before the tribunal in Simla and after his non-appearance his brother in India, who had gone surety for him, made some financial arrangements to enable him to return to India so as to appear before the tribunal, but the applicant did not avail himself of these arrangements. On Sept. 23, 1948, the special tribunal issued a warrant for his arrest and the warrant was indorsed under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, s. 3, by the metropolitan magistrate, sitting at Bow Street, on Mar. 28, 1949. On June 22, 1949, after considering the material before him, the magistrate at Bow Street decided that a prima facie case had been made out against the applicant and committed him to prison, under s. 5 of the Act of 1881, to await his return to India. On July 26 (three days before the applicant was to be returned to India) an application on his behalf was made to the Court of Appeal for leave to serve short notice of a motion for relief under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, s. 10. The application for leave to serve the motion was made ex parte, but notice of the intention to make it was given to the Home Secretary and the High Commissioner for India (the proposed respondents to the motion). The application was granted and the motion, asking that the applicant should be discharged from custody and not returned to India, was part heard by the Court of Appeal on July 28, 1949, but was adjourned over the Long Vacation to enable the parties to produce further information which the court desired to have. The Court of Appeal now held that the applicant had failed to make out a case under s. 10 of the Act of 1881, and dismissed the application.

Edward Steel and Wallis-Jones for the applicant.

H. L. Parker for the Home Secretary.

MacKenna and D. A. McI. Kemp for the High Commissioner for India.

TUCKER, L.J.: This is an application which is made to us under the original jurisdiction which we have in this matter under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, s. 10; which provides:

"Where it is made to appear to a superior court that by reason of the trivial nature of the case, or by reason of the application for the return of a fugitive not being made in good faith in the interests of justice or otherwise, it would, having regard to the distance, to the facilities for communication, and to all the circumstances of the case, be unjust or oppressive or too severe a punishment to return the fugitive either at all or until the expiration of a certain period, such court may discharge the fugitive, either absolutely or on bail, or order that he shall not be returned until after the expiration of the period named in the order, or may make such other order in the premises as to the court seems just."

The Act was passed to deal with the return of "fugitives," and s. 2 provides:

"Where a person accused of having committed an offence (to which this Part of this Act applies) in one part of Her Majesty's dominions has left that part, such person (in this Act referred to as a fugitive from that part) if found in another part of Her Majesty's dominions, shall be liable to be apprehended and returned in manner provided by this Act to the part from which he is a fugitive. A fugitive may be so apprehended under an indorsed warrant or a provisional warrant."

Thus, although the word "fugitive" is used, it applies, not merely to a person who has left one part of His Majesty's dominions for the express purpose of avoiding trial, but to any person who is accused of having committed an offence in one part and is found in another part of His Majesty's dominions. We have been referred to the Indian Independence Act, 1947, s. 1, s. 5 and s. 18, which make it clear that India is at the present time a part of His Majesty's dominions within the meaning of the Act of 1881.

The applicant, Mr. Henderson, was at one time serving in the army in India and is now in this country, having been demobilised from the army. In dealing with the application, counsel for the High Commissioner of India, who is one of the respondents, has taken the same attitude with regard to the proper interpretation of s. 10 of the Act of 1881 as was taken by the Attorney-General in R. v. Governor of Brixton Prison, Ex parte Waite (1), which was heard by the Divisional Court on Feb. 21, 1921. In that case the Attorney-General, dealing with the punctuation of s. 10, and the difficulties which might arise in regard to interpretation, having regard to the use of the words "or otherwise" in the section said:

"... upon reflection, one cannot help thinking that the words 'or otherwise' in the fourth line leave it to the discretion of the court to make the order in any case upon any ground where, having regard to the distance, and the facilities for communication, and to all the circumstances of the case, it appears to the court that it would be oppressive, or too severe a punishment, to return the fugitive immediately."

Counsel for the High Commissioner is quite content that the case should be dealt with on that basis, and that we should make an order for the release of the applicant if we were satisfied that in all the circumstances, having regard to the matters referred to, it would be oppressive or too severe a punishment to return him. In the opinion at which I have arrived, and accepting that as the basis for our decision in this case, it does not become necessary for me to express a final view as to whether or not that is the correct interpretation of the section, but, assuming that it is, and applying that test, I pass to the facts relating to this particular application.

[HIS LORDSHIP set out the facts, and continued:] It is clear from the facts that, whoever is to blame in regard to the applicant having been returned to England, it is not the government of India who are asking for his extradition. They have done nothing other than that which was inevitable owing to the nature of the proceedings and the course of events in India, which has, in my view, unduly prolonged these proceedings. It is contended on behalf of the applicant that, by reason of the length of the proceedings, we ought to make the order. I think that the proceedings were of necessity lengthy, and I see nothing to indicate that any delay that has occurred could have been reasonably avoided by the government of India. The delay has, of course, been very much increased by the return of the applicant to this country. It is said by counsel for the applicant (and this, I think, is the part of the application which needs careful consideration) that, whoever is to blame for the delay, or assuming that no one is to blame for it, after the length of time that has elapsed the applicant cannot deal with the matters raised against him or adduce the witnesses to deal with it. We do not know nearly enough about the facts of the case to form any opinion as to the nature of the applicant's defence or the extent to which he will be prejudiced in the presentation of it by the delay which has taken place. These are all matters which can—and, no doubt, will—be considered by the tribunal of any civilised country which is dealing with a criminal matter. The length of time that has elapsed will, no doubt, be a relevant consideration for this tribunal to consider in weighing the evidence, but there is nothing in the material evidence which would, in my view, show that it is impossible for the applicant to obtain justice.

Counsel for the applicant then based his claim for relief on the fact that the constitution of the tribunal had entirely changed since it was first set up. In fact, the tribunal now has a different name and is called the East Punjab Special Tribunal. It has been constituted by special further legislation since August, 1947. It is said that all the original members are either dead or retired and some, or all, of the present members will have to deal with most or all of the evidence for the prosecution on paper, without having seen the witnesses, and that that is a very unsatisfactory state of affairs. I agree that it does seem that that is a matter which presents very serious difficulties, but the tribunal was set up under legislation by Act or Ordinance, which expressly provides that new members can be appointed to the tribunal in case of a vacancy during the progress of the case. It was, I suppose, thought to be inevitable that the delay might be such, or the circumstances might be such, that that would be necessary. Although a provision of that kind may appear strange to us, I do not think we could possibly say that, by reason of that special provision of the Act, it is impossible for a defendant to obtain justice before the tribunal. I certainly do not take that view.

I think that the kind of matters with regard to which this court would act would be where it appears that the contemplated proceedings, although, perhaps, lawful by the law of the country concerned, are really going to be conducted in a way contrary to natural justice or contrary to our ideas of it. A case of that kind has, in my view, certainly not been made out on the material laid before us. It is not sufficient to say: "That would not be the procedure in this court. That would appear to entail hardship." It is, of course, necessary for us to weigh up the nature of the charges when we are considering whether a man should be returned. After all this delay, with this long distance, if it appeared to us that the charges were trivial and that the punishment entailed in being returned was in the circumstances out of all proportion to the gravity of the offence (of which, for this purpose, it must be assumed that the applicant is guilty), this court would, no doubt, intervene. The charges against him, however, are very serious. They are numerous, they involve large sums of money, and I think it is quite impossible to say that the applicant would be unduly punished by having to go back to take his trial, nor do I think that it has been made out that the action of the government of India in seeking his extradition is, in all the circumstances, oppressive. This is an unusual case, unusual chiefly on the ground of the inevitable delay that has taken place, and it is one which, I think, requires our careful investigation and consideration, but, having considered all the matters which have been laid before us, I have come to the conclusion that the applicant has not made out his case under s. 10 of the Act of 1881, and this application shall fail.

SINGLETON, L.J., in concurring, said: I recognise that it is not pleasant for an officer to be extradited or to be sent back to India as a fugitive offender, but, unless the conditions specified in the early part of s. 10 of the Act of 1881 are complied with, this court has no right to interfere. If we were satisfied that those conditions were fulfilled, we could, of course, make an order. It is, however, impossible to say that the charges against the applicant are trivial or that there are, on the evidence, circumstances which ought to cause us to say that it would be "unjust or oppressive or too severe a punishment" to return him to India. I have listened anxiously to see if there was any ground on which this court could properly make an order under s. 10. I am satisfied that there is not, and it is for that reason that I agree that the application must be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J., in concurring, said: As regards the argument that the applicant will not get a fair trial, it seems to me that for the present purpose this court must assume that the trial will be properly conducted by the tribunal which was set up in India for the purposes of this inquiry in a fair and regular manner in accordance with its rules of procedure. It does not seem to me that it is material for the purpose of this application to see whether those rules of procedure are in all respects, according to our ideas, as satisfactory as our own. I agree that a case for the intervention of this court under s. 10 of the Act of 1881 is not made out, and, accordingly, I agree that the application should be dismissed.

Application dismissed.

Solicitors: Mewburn, Walker & Cato (for the applicant); Treasury Solicitor (for the Home Secretary); Assistant Solicitor to the High Commissioner for India.

[Reported by E. P. WALLIS-JONES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

BUTSER TURF AND TIMBER CO., LTD. v. PETERSFIELD RATING AUTHORITY AND OTHERS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Morris, JJ.), January 23, 24, 1950.]

Rates—Agricultural land—"Nursery grounds"—Turf cutting—Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928 (c. 8), s. 2 (2)—Local Government Act, 1929 (c. 17), s. 67 (1).

By s. 67 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1929: "No person shall . . . be liable to pay rates in respect of any agricultural land . . ." By s. 2 (2) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928 "agricultural land" is expressed as including, inter alia, "nursery grounds."

By an agreement in writing dated Sept. 2, 1946, between the owners of a farm and the ratepayers, the ratepayers were entitled to remove for sale turf from certain areas of the farm. Before it was cut the turf was rolled, mown and treated with weed killer and artificial manures.

HELD: the areas used for turf cutting were not "nursery grounds" within the meaning of s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1928, and, therefore, the ratepayers were not exempt from liability to pay rates under s. 67 (1) of the Act of 1929.

[FOR THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT, 1929, s. 67 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 10, p. 927; and FOR THE RATING AND VALUATION (APPORTIONMENT) ACT, 1928, s. 2 (2), see ibid., Vol. 14, p. 714.]

A Case referred to:

(1) James & Daniel Provan, Ltd. v. Croydon Corpn., (1938), 29 R. & I.T. 277.

CASE STATED by the Rating Appeals Committee of Southampton Quarter Sessions.

Quarter sessions dismissed an appeal by the ratepayers, Butser Turf and Timber Co., Ltd., from a decision of the second respondents, the Petersfield Assessment Committee, by which, on a proposal by the first respondents, Petersfield Rating Authority, the committee determined to amend the valuation list in respect of a hereditament described as "land used for turf cutting at Basing Home Farm," of which the ratepayers were occupiers. The farm was owned by the third respondents, G. & G. Curtis, Ltd., and, by an agreement in writing dated Sept. 2, 1946, between the ratepayers and the third respondents, it was agreed that the ratepayers should be entitled to enter on the farm and remove from parts thereof the turf therein. The ratepayers rolled and fertilised the ground to produce turf fit for cutting, and on their behalf it was contended that the hereditament was at all times agricultural land or that their operations made the hereditament "nursery grounds" within the meaning of s. 2 (2) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, and, therefore, exempt from rates by virtue of s. 67 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1929. The Divisional Court now held that the ratepayers' operations on the hereditament did not make it "nursery grounds" within the meaning of s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1928, but remitted the case to quarter sessions for them to define more exactly the hereditament in respect of which they held the ratepayers to be rateable.

E Harold Williams, K.C., and Squibb for the ratepayers.

Rowe, K.C., and Ramsay Willis for the rating authority and assessment committee.

J. T. Molony and A. C. M. Kerr for G. & G. Curtis, Ltd.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by the Southampton Quarter Sessions which raises a question with regard to the rateability of certain land on which turf cutting operations have been in progress.

By an agreement between the ratepayers, the Butser Turf & Timber Co., Ltd., and the third respondents G. & G. Curtis, Ltd., who are farmers, the ratepayers have the right, for a period of six years from the date of the agreement, to cut turf for sale from land in the occupation of the third respondents to the extent of one hundred acres providing that the turf so cut is within an area coloured pink and blue on a plan attached to the agreement. Under the agreement the ratepayers have to cut a minimum of ten acres a year, and, therefore, it might be possible that during the six years of the agreement they would cut only sixty acres instead of the one hundred acres which they have a right to cut. From time to time the ratepayers put fencing round the land on which they were cutting, but at present the court is completely in the dark as to what is the hereditament the assessment of which quarter sessions have confirmed. Therefore, the Case must go back to be properly stated.

The point which has been raised is whether this land can be regarded as "nursery grounds" within the meaning of s. 2 (2) of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, so that it is exempt from rating as agricultural land by virtue of s. 67 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1929. It appears that it is a pasture field which is rolled and fertilised with artificial fertilisers, and that the weeds are removed. When that operation has been carried on for a certain length of time (which depends on whether the turf is to be sold as first class turf or as second class turf) the turf is cut and sold for golf links, lawns, and so forth. In our opinion, we cannot hold that this field is a nursery ground. It is old turf being put into good condition by fertilising and weeding, but it is in no sense a rearing or tending of young plants for the purpose of transplanting. In construing such a section as s. 2 (2), the court must consider what the ordinary person reading it would think was contained in the words "nursery grounds." In my view, nobody would consider that turf in a field which was being prepared so that its quality would be higher than it would be if it was cut without such preparation could be described as being turf in a nursery ground. The case which was to some extent relied on by the ratepayers, James & Daniel Provan, Ltd. v. Croydon Corpn. (1) is, in my opinion, quite different. There the ratepayers had prepared special beds of hard core, sand, ashes and clinkers, for taking low quality, immature, turf from Cumberland, and, by bedding it on to these foundations and tending it, they turned from rough, immature grass into good quality turf. On those facts the court held that quarter sessions were justified in holding that there was some evidence that the hereditament was a nursery ground. We do not find the same evidence here. In any case we think the question is largely a question of fact, and the court is satisfied that quarter sessions were justified in finding that this was not a nursery ground.

BYRNE, J.: I agree.

MORRIS, J.: I agree.

Case remitted.

Solicitors: Gibson & Weldon, agents for Burley & Geach, Petersfield (for the ratepayers); Shield & Son, agents for Mackarness & Lunt, Petersfield (for the rating authority and assessment committee); Brash Wheeler & Co., agents for Glanvilles, Portsmouth (for the second respondents).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

ZEIDMAN v. OWEN.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., and Lynskey, J.), January 19, 1950.]

Gaming—Pool betting—Football pools—Collector appointed by promoters—House used to receive coupons and stake money—Offence against statute—Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934 (c. 58), s. 3 (2).

The promoters of a football pool appointed a collector to whose house persons took coupons and stakes relating to football pools.

HELD: football pool competitions were "pool betting transactions" within the meaning of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, s. 3 (2), and, accordingly, the collector was guilty of using "premises . . . as a place where persons resorting thereto may effect . . . pool betting transactions" within the meaning of that sub-section.

Dictum of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Elderton v. United Kingdom Totalisator Co., Ltd. ([1945] 2 All E.R. 626), dissented from.

[As to BETTING HOUSES generally, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 15, pp. 510-519, paras. 917-923; and for THE BETTING AND LOTTERIES ACT, 1934, s. 3 (2), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 10, p. 785.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Elderton v. United Kingdom Totalisator Co., Ltd., [1945] 2 All E.R. 624; [1946] Ch. 57; 115 L.J.Ch. 81; 173 L.T. 384; 2nd Digest Supp.

- (2) Stovell v. Jameson, [1939] 4 All E.R. 76; [1940] 1 K.B. 92; 109 L.J.K.B. 259; 161 L.T. 355; 103 J.P. 369; Digest Supp.
- (3) Thomson v. Clanmorris (Lord), [1900] 1 Ch. 718; 69 L.J.Ch. 337; 82 L.T. 277; 9 Digest 132, 703.
- (4) Bretherton v. United Kingdom Totalisator Co., Ltd., [1945] 2 All E.R. 202; [1945] K.B. 555; 114 L.J.K.B. 517; 173 L.T. 126; 110 J.P. 45; 2nd Digest Supp.
- A (5) A.-G. v. Luncheon & Sports Club, Ltd., [1929] A.C. 400; 98 L.J.K.B. 359; 141 L.T. 153; Digest Supp.

CASE STATED by London Quarter Sessions.

At a court of quarter sessions for the county of London on June 28, 1949, the appellant appealed against his conviction on May 31, 1949, by a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Old Street magistrates' court on an information laid by the respondent, a police officer, charging the appellant with having, between Mar. 11 and Apr. 1, 1949, used premises at 4, Hobson's Cottages, Woodseer Street, London, E.1, as a place where persons resorting thereto might effect pool betting transactions, contrary to s. 3 (2) of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934. The appellant contended that, having regard to the words used by LORD GREENE, M.R., in Elderton v. United Kingdom Totalisator Co., Ltd. (1) football pool competitions were not pool betting transactions within the meaning of s. 3 (2) of the Act. The respondent argued that the words in question of LORD GREENE, M.R., were obiter and not necessary for the decision, and that the law was as laid down in Stovell v. Jameson (2). Quarter sessions dismissed the appellant's appeal with costs, and the Divisional Court now dismissed his appeal against that decision.

Curtis-Bennett, K.C., and G. Hardy for the appellant.

Melford Stevenson, K.C., and Vernon Gattie for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by the appeals committee of London Sessions which raises a question of some importance with regard to the construction of s. 3 of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934. The appellant had been appointed a collector by the promoters of certain football pools. People took to him the coupons which they had filled in and the stakes which they were "investing," if that be the right word, in these pools. As they physically resorted to the house where the appellant lived, paid the money to him there, and did not conduct the business by post, it is said that he committed an offence against s. 3 (2) of the Act which provides:

"Save as is permitted by the preceding sub-section, no person shall use any premises whether situate on a track or not, or cause or knowingly permit any such premises to be used, as a place where persons resorting there-to may effect pari-mutuel or pool betting transactions."

G In Stovell v. Jameson (2) this court decided, on facts which are indistinguishable from those in the present case, that an offence had been committed, but it is submitted that in Elderton v. United Kingdom Totalisator Co., Ltd. (1), which was decided after Stovell v. Jameson (2), LORD GREENE, M.R., clearly indicated that, in his opinion, football pools were not pool betting transactions within the meaning of the Act. The Court of Appeal in that case was considering s. 26 of the Act, and not s. 3, so LORD GREENE's observations were obiter and it is not suggested that they are binding on this court, though, naturally, we should pay great attention to what the learned Master of the Rolls said and, if we thought that the dicta, though obiter, expressed the true construction of the Act, we should feel we ought to follow them. Where I venture to differ from LORD GREENE is that he has construed the section as though the words "pari-mutuel or pool betting transactions" referred to one and the same thing. He was construing the words "pool betting transaction" as a translation of the words "pari-mutuel." I prefer to read the section in this way: "... as a place where persons resorting thereto may effect pari-mutuel transactions or as a place where persons resorting thereto may effect pool betting transactions." We have then to consider whether football pools are pool betting transactions within the meaning of that section.

When the Act of 1934 was passed, football pools had become well established. They were the only form of pool betting transaction then known, except in so far as the totalisator was being used on racecourses, and there are separate provisions in the Act dealing with them. In construing an Act of this sort, I bear in mind the words of LINDLEY, M.R., in Thomson v. Clanmorris (Lord) (3). That case arose under the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, and this is what he said ([1900] 1 Ch. 725):

"In construing s. 3 of the Act of 1833, as indeed in construing any other statutory enactment, regard must be had not only to the words used, but to the history of the Act, and the reasons which led to its being passed. You must look at the mischief which had to be cured as well as at the cure provided."

Bearing those words in mind, I cannot resist the conclusion that Parliament, in using the expression "pool betting transactions," had in mind this form of transaction, which at that time was just becoming widespread.

It is true that other sections in the Act deal expressly with what are called prize competitions. It is also true that in Bretherton v. United Kingdom Totalisator Co., Ltd. (4) this court held that football pools were prize competitions within the meaning of s. 26 (1) of the Act, but it does not seem to me that because they are prize competitions so as to be caught by the words of s. 26, they may not also be betting transactions. Section 26 (1) of the Act prohibits the conduct of

"... in or through any newspaper, or in connection with any trade or business or the sale of any article to the public—(a) any competition in which prizes are offered for forecasts of the result either of a future event, or of a past event the result of which is not yet ascertained or not yet generally known... Provided that nothing in this sub-section with respect to the conducting of competitions in connection with a trade or business shall apply in relation to pari-mutuel or pool betting operations carried on by a person whose only trade or business is that of a bookmaker as defined in Part I of this Act."

That seems to recognise that a thing may be a pool betting transaction although at the same time it is a competition, otherwise it would be very difficult to see that the proviso had any meaning.

The operation of football pools is well known and I do not think I need describe them in any detail. I think the true view of them is that the entrants to the competition are betting one against the other. They are, no doubt, competing for the pool, but they are also staking a sum of money, not actually on the result of a particular football match or matches, but on the chance that their forecast will be more accurate than the forecasts of the other entrants to the pool.

In A.-G. v. Luncheon and Sports Club (5) where the question was whether a company which owned and carried on a club and there maintained and operated a totalisator machine was a bookmaker with whom the members of the club made bets, the House of Lords held that the club was not a bookmaker. LORD BUCKMASTER and LORD SUMNER in their speeches both indicated that, in their opinion, in totalisator betting there was betting by the members one with another. So, in these football pool competitions, I think, there is a betting by the entrants one with another. They are not betting with the promoter. He merely organises things and enables the persons to bet one with another, but the fact that that is a competition does not, in my opinion, prevent its also being a pool betting transaction,

LYNSKEY, J., calls my attention to the definition of bookmaker in s. 20 of the Act of 1934:

A "... 'bookmaker' means any person who, whether on his own account or as servant or agent to any other person, carries on, whether occasionally or regularly, the business of receiving or negotiating bets or conducting pari-mutuel or pool betting operations, or who in any manner holds himself out, or permits himself to be held out in any manner, as a person who receives or negotiates bets or conducts such operations, and 'bookmaking' shall be construed accordingly; so, however, that a person shall not be deemed to be a bookmaker by reason only of the fact that he operates, or is employed in operating a totalisator, and the operating of a totalisator shall be deemed not to be bookmaking."

B That again, I think, shows that pool betting and totalisator betting are different things. For these reasons I think the appeals committee came to a right conclusion, and this appeal fails.

C LYNSKEY, J.: I agree with the judgment just delivered by my Lord. I only desire, in view of the fact that LORD GREENE, M.R., took a different view of the construction of this Act, to add that, in my view, ss. 3 and 26, when they use the phrase "pari-mutuel" or "pool betting transaction" are referring to two different types of transaction. The pari-mutuel transaction is a well known transaction, and for the purposes of this Act, apparently, includes the use of a totalisator. By s. 20 the totalisator means

D "... the contrivance for betting known as the totalisator or pari-mutuel, or any other machine or instrument of betting of a like nature whether mechanically operated or not."

E By 1934 pool betting transactions were well known. I asked counsel for the appellant in the course of the argument if he could suggest anything else to which those words referred if they did not refer to football pool betting or similar types of betting, and he could not suggest any other type of transaction of a general nature to which the Act was likely to be referable. In those circumstances, I am of opinion that in 1934 Parliament was referring to such transactions as are generally made through the medium of football pools and their promoters. That seems to me to be confirmed by the definition of a bookmaker to which my Lord has already made reference.

F LORD GREENE, M.R., took the view that "pool betting transaction" was simply an explanation in English of the French phrase "pari-mutuel." With every respect to LORD GREENE, I am afraid I am unable to accept that. My view of this matter is borne out to some degree by the terms of the Act itself and by Parliament's use of the same phrase in later legislation. By the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1947, s. 6 (1), a duty was imposed on pool betting. The sub-section provides:

G "There shall be charged on all bets made by way of pool betting, other than bets made by means of a totalisator set up on an approved horse racecourse by or under the authority of the Racecourse Betting Control Board, a duty of excise, to be known as the pool betting duty, equal to ten per cent. of the amount of the stake money paid."

H By s. 6 (5) it is provided:

"Bets shall be deemed for the purposes of this section and ... sched. V [to the Act] to be made by way of pool betting whenever a number of persons make bets on terms that the winnings of such of those persons as are winners shall be, or be a share of, or be determined by reference to, the stake money paid or agreed to be paid by those persons, whether the bets are made by means of a totalisator, or by filling up and returning coupons or other printed or written forms, or otherwise howsoever."

That definition would obviously include the transactions which were carried on by the promoters of the football pools with which we are concerned in this case. The matter was also dealt with in the Finance Act, 1948, s. 14, where the tax on pool betting was increased from ten per cent. to twenty per cent. It was provided by sub-s. (2):

"Subject to the provisions of this section, bets shall be deemed for the purposes of [s. 6 of and sched. V of the Act of 1947] to be made by way of pool betting whenever a number of persons make bets on terms that the winnings of such of those persons as are winners shall be, or shall include, an amount (not determined by reference to the stake-money paid or agreed to be paid by those persons) which is divisible in any proportions among such of those persons as are winners. Nothing in this sub-section shall be construed as restricting the definition of pool betting contained in sub-s. (5) of the said s. 6 as originally enacted."

It may be true to say that those Acts were both passed after the opinion expressed by LORD GREENE, M.R., in Elderton v. United Kingdom Totalisator Co., Ltd. (1), and it may be that that is why they were passed. In my view, if those words were put in for that reason, they were put in to make clear what the term which Parliament had already used in 1934 meant. That confirms me in the view that "pool betting" as used in the Act of 1934 was intended by the legislature to refer to transactions of the same nature as that of those which we are considering in this case. I agree with my Lord that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Wilkinson, Howlett & Moorhouse (for the appellant); Solicitor for the Metropolitan Police (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

BRYAN v. FORROW.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Morris, JJ.), January 24, 1950.]

Street Traffic—Driving uninsured motor vehicle—Insurance covering the "proposer or his paid driver"—Car driven by paid driver not in general employment of proposer—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (1).

The respondent, the owner of a motor lorry, was insured in relation to the user thereof by a cover note which specified "the above named proposer or his paid driver" under the heading: "Person or persons allowed to drive." On the day in question the respondent, being unable to drive the lorry owing to ill health, agreed with one of his customers, for whom he was carrying certain goods, that the lorry should be driven by a driver employed and paid by the customer and that the driver's wage for the time so occupied should be reimbursed by the respondent to the customer. On a charge against the respondent under s. 35 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, of permitting the lorry to be on the road without there being in force in relation to the user of the vehicle a policy of insurance in respect of third-party risks,

HELD: on the true construction of the cover note "his paid driver" meant a driver who was driving for the proposer and who was paid as a driver, although not necessarily paid by, or in the general employment of, the proposer, and, therefore, the respondent was covered against third-party risks and was not guilty of the offence charged.

[FOR THE ROAD TRAFFIC ACT, 1930, s. 35 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 23, p. 636.]

CASE STATED by Essex Quarter Sessions.

A At a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Witham, the respondent was convicted on an information preferred by the appellant that he did permit a certain motor vehicle to be on the road without there being in force in relation to the user of the said motor vehicle such a policy of insurance in respect of third-party risks as complied with the requirements of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. Quarter sessions allowed an appeal by the respondent, and the appellant appealed to the High Court.

B At the hearing before quarter sessions it was proved or admitted that the respondent was the owner of a motor lorry and was carrying on business as a haulage contractor; that he contracted to transport certain goods for one Platt; that the respondent, being unwell and unable to drive his lorry, agreed with Platt that his (the respondent's) lorry should be driven by one Norton (who was in the regular employment of Platt as a lorry driver); and that, on the final statement of account between the parties, the wages of Norton and the price of petrol purchased by Norton should be credited to Platt by the respondent. The only policy of insurance in operation was comprised in a cover note covering the respondent in relation to the user of the lorry while it was driven by the respondent or "his paid driver." The Divisional Court now dismissed the appeal.

T. F. Southall for the appellant.

D Alwyn Bolton for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by the appeals committee of Essex Quarter Sessions, who heard an appeal by William Alfred Bryan, the respondent to the present appeal, against a conviction by justices of Witham who found him guilty of using a certain motor vehicle when there was not in force in relation to the user of the vehicle a policy of insurance in respect of third-party risks.

E The respondent had undertaken to transport certain goods, the property of a Mr. Platt. As a rule the respondent drove his lorry himself, but he was unable to drive on the day in question owing to ill-health. Accordingly, he arranged with Mr. Platt that one Norton, a driver in the employment of Mr. Platt, should drive, and that he (the respondent) would reimburse to Mr. Platt the wage which he (Platt) would pay to the driver for the time so occupied. While Norton was driving, the lorry was stopped and the police took proceedings. The persons allowed to drive under the policy of insurance held by the respondent were "the above-named proposer" (i.e., the respondent), "or his paid driver," and it was said that, as Norton remained the general servant of Platt, he was not the respondent's paid driver. At first I thought that was a good submission because the appellant did not pay Norton. The person who paid Norton, to whom alone Norton could look for his wages, was Platt, but when one comes to look at the policy I do not think that the construction advanced by the appellant is the true construction so far as the liability of the insurance company is concerned, and, if the insurance company would be liable under the policy, then no offence has been committed. The policy provides that the persons who are allowed to drive may be one of three classes :

H " (a) the above-named proposer only ; (b) the above-named proposer or his paid driver ; (c) the above-named proposer or his paid employee or any friend or relative of the proposer driving with his unremunerated permission provided such person holds a licence to drive such motor vehicle or has held and is not disqualified by order of a court of law for holding or obtaining such licence."

Apparently, if a friend were remunerated he would become a paid driver. When one considers the whole of that portion of the cover note, one sees that the contrast is between the professional driver and the non-professional driver—the paid driver and the paid employee. The paid employee must not drive the vehicle. It must be a paid driver, and the words “paid driver” are capable of two constructions. They can either mean “the above-named proposer and the driver paid by him,” or they can mean “the above-named proposer and a driver driving for him who is a paid driver.” In my view, quarter sessions were justified in holding that the latter construction was right, and on this document, I think, the insurance company would have been liable if there had been an accident while Norton was driving, because he was a paid driver and was driving for the proposer on that day. Therefore, I think the respondent was covered by the policy and quarter sessions came to a correct decision in point of law, and this appeal must be dismissed.

BYRNE, J.: I agree.

MORRIS, J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for Arthur Morgan, Prosecuting Solicitor, Chelmsford (for the appellant); Lewis Lloyd & Co. (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

JONAS v. ROSENBERG.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Jenkins, L.JJ., and Romer, J.), January 12, 26, 1950.]

Rent Restriction—Application of Rent Control Act—Retrospective effect—Proceedings for possession commenced by landlord and case heard before coming into operation of Act—Judgment reserved—No order made until after Act in operation—“Anything done”—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 10.

Statute—Retrospective effect—Statute coming into force after hearing of action, but before judgment—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 10.

The Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 9, provides, inter alia, that where the tenant of any premises, being a house or part of a house, has sublet a part of the premises, then as against his landlord no part of the premises shall be treated as not being a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, apply by reason only that the terms on which any person claiming under the tenant holds any part of the premises include the use of accommodation in common with other persons. Section 10 provides: “The three last foregoing sections shall apply whether the letting in question began before or after the commencement of this Act, but not so as to affect rent in respect of any period before the commencement thereof or anything done or omitted during any such period.”

On Feb. 21, 1949, the landlord issued a plaint claiming possession of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied. By an amendment made on May 6, 1949, the landlord alleged that the house was no longer a separate dwelling-house because the tenant shared the kitchen with sub-tenants to whom part of the premises were let. On May 31, 1949, the hearing was concluded and judgment was reserved. On June 2, 1949, the Act of 1949, came into operation. On July 7, 1949, following a letter written by counsel for the tenant to the registrar referring to the possible application of the Act of 1949, the parties appeared before the county court judge, when counsel for the landlord successfully resisted the suggestion that there should be further argument. On Aug. 4, 1949, the county court judge gave judgment for the landlord on the ground that the tenant shared the kitchen and so was not protected. On appeal by the tenant,

A HELD: the hearing on May 31 when judgment was reserved was not "anything done" within s. 10; there was not "anything done" within the section until the order was made; and, therefore, s. 9 applied, and the order of the county court judge should be set aside.

Hutchinson v. Jauncey (ante, p. 165), applied.

[AS TO THE RETROSPECTIVE EFFECT OF STATUTES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 31, pp. 513-517, paras. 670-672; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 42, pp. 701-707, Nos. 1169-1249.]

B AS TO SEPARATE DWELLINGS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 312-316, paras. 368-373; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 31, p. 557, Nos. 7044-7048.]

Cases referred to:

(1) Turner v. Baker, [1949] 1 All E.R. 560; [1949] 1 K.B. 605.

C (2) Hutchinson v. Jauncey, ante, p. 165.

D APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE NEAL, made at Willesden County Court on Aug. 4, 1949, granting possession of a dwelling-house to the landlord on the ground that the tenant was not protected by the Rent Acts because he shared the kitchen with sub-tenants. The Court of Appeal now reversed JUDGE NEAL's decision on the ground that, although the hearing was concluded before the operation of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, judgment was not delivered until after that date, and that, therefore, s. 9 of that Act applied. The facts appear in the judgment of the court.

L. Moules for the tenant.

F. Hallis for the landlord.

Cur. adv. vult.

E Jan. 26. SOMERVELL, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal by the defendant against an order for possession made against him by His Honour JUDGE NEAL. The first ground to be considered is set out in para. 3 of the notice of appeal:

F "That the learned judge was wrong in law and misdirected himself in holding that the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 9 and s. 10, were not applicable to the facts before him."

It will be convenient to read these sections and say a word or two about them before recounting the facts. Section 9 provides:

G "Where the tenant of any premises, being a house or part of a house, has sublet a part, but not the whole, of the premises, then as against his landlord or any superior landlord (but without prejudice to the rights against and liabilities to each other of the tenant and any person claiming under him, or of any two such persons) no part of the premises shall be treated as not being a dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply by reason only—(a) that the terms on which any person claiming under the tenant holds any part of the premises include the use of accommodation in common with other persons, or (b) that part of the premises is let to any such person at such a rent as is mentioned in proviso (i) to sub-s. (2) of s. 12 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (which relates to furnished lettings)."

H Section 10 provides:

"The three last foregoing sections shall apply whether the letting in question began before or after the commencement of this Act, but not so as to affect rent in respect of any period before the commencement thereof or anything done or omitted during any such period."

We are not concerned with s. 9 (b). The principal Acts mean the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939. It had been held that under those Acts such a sharing of accommodation as is referred to in s. 9 (a) took the house out of the protection of the Acts on the ground that it was not "let as a separate dwelling" within the meaning of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 16 (1): see Turner v. Baker (1). The Act of 1949 came into force on June 2, 1949, at a time when the present proceedings before the county court judge had reached a certain stage, but no order had been made.

The house in question was let by the landlord to the tenant in October, 1942, for a term of three years from Nov. 9, 1942, with an option to renew for twelve months, which was exercised. The tenant remained in possession after Nov. 9, 1946, as a statutory tenant, the house being one to which the Rent Acts applied unless circumstances arose which took it outside the protection of those Acts. In the particulars of claim as delivered and first amended, certain matters were relied on as entitling the landlord to possession with which we are not concerned. The learned judge did not think it reasonable to make an order on any of those grounds, and there is no appeal by the landlord from that decision. The plaint was issued on Feb. 21, 1949. There was a first hearing on Apr. 4. The amendment which raises the issue with which we are concerned was made on May 6. It alleged that the house was no longer let as a separate dwelling. There was a further hearing on May 31. The evidence as accepted by the learned judge was that the kitchen was being shared with certain sub-tenants to whom the tenant had let part of the house. This, therefore, prima facie brought it within the principle of Turner v. Baker (1). Counsel for the tenant sought to distinguish the case from Turner v. Baker (1) on the ground that the sub-tenants had been brought in as a result of the registration of the premises under the statutory scheme contained in the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 68CB, headed "Provisions to facilitate lettings of parts of dwellings" which had been added by S.R. & O., 1945, No. 1452. The tenant relied on the words of the regulation.

At the conclusion of the hearing on May 31, the learned judge reserved judgment. On June 2, as stated above, the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, came into operation. On June 23, 1949, counsel for the tenant wrote the following letter to the registrar:

"Dear Mr. Registrar, Jonas v. Rosenberg, Plaint No. E.483. As counsel for the tenant in the above case, in which His Honour JUDGE NEAL has reserved judgment, I am writing to you to point out something which ought to be drawn to His Honour's attention. My opponent, Lloyd-Davies, knows that I am writing to you on this subject and I am sending him a copy of this letter, but in deference to his suggestion I am not writing direct to the judge. On May 31 last, when judgment was reserved, the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, had not come into force and His Honour was given to understand that the Act would have no bearing on the case he was trying. There is, however, more than a possibility that Lloyd-Davies and I have unintentionally misled the judge on this very important point, because s. 9 and s. 10 of the Act, which came into force on June 2, appear to be retrospective in effect and to deal with the very question which we were arguing. In these circumstances, it occurs to me that His Honour might like this case to be argued further before he delivers judgment. Certainly he should not be left under a misapprehension caused by the late publication of the statute. Copies were not on sale at H.M. Stationery Office until after it came into force."

On July 7 the parties appeared before the learned judge. Judgment was delivered on Aug. 4. The learned judge decided that the attempt to distinguish the case from Turner v. Baker (1) by reason of the terms of the statutory scheme failed. With regard to the point raised on the Act of 1949 and the hearing on July 7 he said :

A "This brings me to another point. This case was heard on Apr. 4 and May 31. On the latter day I reserved judgment. Before this was delivered my registrar received a letter from the tenant's counsel suggesting that I might have been misled owing to his not having taken the point that the B Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, altered the position. I had several cases in which this point arose. Accordingly, I had this case and several others in my list for July 7 as I thought that the point as to the effect of the new Act might be argued. On this day, however, in my view quite properly, the landlord's counsel chose to resist any further argument.
C And though, no doubt, I could have requested that it should take place I did not think it right to do so and so deprive the landlord of what might be an important argument in the higher court. In fact, I carefully considered the argument in similar cases with reference to the new Act and gave very full reasons, which I do not propose to repeat now, for holding that it was not retrospective so as to affect a case such as this, where the landlord's right had become complete as a result of a notice to quit ending the contractual rights of the tenant before June 2 of this year when the Act came into force."

D We are not sure that we follow the penultimate paragraph. If in the events which had happened the law to be applied was the law as amended by s. 9, the fact that the landlord's counsel resisted further argument would, we think, be irrelevant. These Acts affect the jurisdiction to make an order. If, on the other hand, the learned judge was right in the conclusion set out in the last paragraph, then clearly the Act of 1949 had no application.

E Since the date of this judgment, there has been a decision of this court on the construction of s. 9 and s. 10—Hutchinson v. Jauncey (2). In that case it was conceded that there was a sharing of accommodation which would, apart from the Act of 1949, have deprived the tenant of the protection of the Acts. A valid notice to quit had been served expiring on Apr. 25, 1949. Proceedings for possession were started on May 25. The hearing was subsequent to June 2 and the issue as to the effect of s. 9 and s. 10 was argued before the learned county
F court judge who held that the landlord had acquired rights prior to June 2 which were not affected by the two sections. That decision was reversed by this court. The first argument was based on the principle that when the law is altered during the pendency of an action the rights of parties are decided according to the law as it existed when the action was begun. It is unnecessary to re-capitulate the reasoning on which the court based their conclusion that that G principle did not apply to the legislation being considered. It was further argued that the concluding words of s. 10 themselves precluded the application of the sections. It was said that the issue of the plaint was within the words "anything done" and that it would be affected if the sections were applied. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHEE, M.R., held that the words "anything done" could not refer to the issue of a summons or the service of a notice to quit. ASQUITH, L.J., did not H disagree with this, but in a short judgment said that, assuming the issue of the plaint was something done, it was not affected by the application of s. 9.
COHEN, L.J., said that the issue of the plaint was no doubt an act done, but did not prevent the application of s. 9, presumably for the reason stated by ASQUITH, L.J. Whichever way it is put, the court decided that the initiation of proceedings did not in itself preclude the tenant from relying on these sections.
The present case is sought to be distinguished on the ground that the hearing had taken place on May 31, and there would in the ordinary course have been no further evidence or argument. If it can be distinguished, it must be on the ground that the hearing on May 31 was within the words "anything done" and would be affected by the application of s. 9.

On the view expressed by the Master of the Rolls that the words "anything done" could not refer to the service of a notice to quit or the issue of a summons, it seems to us quite plain they could not refer to the stage reached on May 31. The issue of a notice to quit does prospectively affect the rights of the parties. The issue of a summons is for certain purposes a relevant date for determining those rights, but a hearing when judgment is reserved, when either party is free to apply to be allowed to produce further argument or evidence, when the court can itself ask for further argument, is, in our opinion, a fortiori outside the words. Assuming, however, that the issue of a summons or plaint is not within the words, then, in our opinion, there is not, so far as the proceedings are concerned, "anything done" within the section until an order is made. We think COHEN, L.J., was expressing this view when he said (ante, p. 170): "The issue of a plaint is, no doubt, an act done within s. 10, but it is not equivalent to judgment". It is, therefore, unnecessary to consider whether, if it had been within the words, it could be said that it was not affected by the application of the sections. We have not overlooked a passage ibid. in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in which he emphasises the fact that, in Hutchinson v. Jauncey (2), the hearing in that case was "a thing not done when the Act was passed". The Master of the Rolls was not addressing his mind to the present problem, and when he referred to the "hearing" he had in mind, no doubt, the ordinary case when the order is made at the conclusion of the hearing.

The appeal, therefore, succeeds. The rights of the parties fall to be determined in accordance with the provisions of s. 9 and s. 10, and, applying those provisions, the ground on which the order was made is not available to the landlord. It is unnecessary to consider whether if the tenant had failed on this point he could have succeeded in distinguishing Turner v. Baker (1). The appeal will be allowed with costs.

Appeal allowed with costs. Order in the court below for "No Costs" to stand.

Solicitors: Lieberman, Leigh & Co. (for the tenant); Alfred Kerstein & Co. (for the landlord).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

JOHNSON v. YODEN AND OTHERS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Lynskey, JJ.), January 19, 1950.]

Housing—Purchase price—Limitation—House constructed under building licence—Sale of house at price in excess of permitted price—Knowledge of vendor's solicitors—Aiding and abetting—Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945 (c. 20), s. 7 (1), s. 7 (5).

On the sale of a house which was built under a licence from the local authority that contained a condition limiting the price for which it could be sold, the builder, contrary to the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, s. 7 (1), induced the intending purchaser to agree to pay £250 more than the permitted price, but concealed this fact from the three respondents, the partners in the firm of solicitors whom he had instructed to act for him on the sale. On receiving a letter from the purchaser's solicitor saying: "I have felt compelled to report to the town clerk what I consider to be a breach by your client of the provisions of s. 7" of the Act, the third

A respondent, the partner who was dealing with the matter, asked the builder for an explanation and was told that the extra £250 was received by the builder and placed by him in a separate deposit account to be used in payment of work to be done on the house in the future. The third respondent accepted this explanation and called on the purchaser to complete. The first and second respondents knew nothing of the matter. The builder was convicted of an offence against the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, s. 7 (1), and the three respondents were charged, under s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1945 and s. 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, with aiding and abetting the commission of the offence.

B HELD: (i) as the first and second respondents did not know of the essential matters which constituted the offence, they were not guilty of aiding and abetting its commission.

(ii) the arrangement alleged by the builder, even if true, was a transaction with which the sale was associated, within the meaning of s. 7 (5) of the Act of 1945, and was plainly a colourable evasion of s. 7 (1), and, therefore, the third respondent was guilty of aiding and abetting the builder in the commission of the offence.

C [FOR THE BUILDING MATERIALS AND HOUSING ACT, 1945, s. 7, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 11, pp. 642-644.]

CASE STATED by Dover justices.

D At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Dover informations were preferred by the appellant, the town clerk of Dover, acting for Dover Corporation, (i) under the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, s. 7 (1), against Frederick E George Dolbear, charging him with having unlawfully offered to sell for £1,275 a dwelling-house, 5, Mount Road, Dover, constructed under a licence subject to a condition limiting the price for which it might be sold to £1,025, and (ii) under the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, s. 7 (1), and the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 5, against the three respondents charging them with having, while carrying on practice as solicitors in partnership, aided, abetted, E counselled and procured Dolbear unlawfully to commit the said offence. The informations were heard on July 5, 1949, when the court convicted Dolbear. The justices found that the first two respondents did not know that the extra £250 was being paid and that the third respondent knew of it at a late stage and then acted on an explanation given to him by Dolbear. It was contended by F the appellant (a) that mens rea was not a constituent of the offence with which the respondents were charged, (b) that, if it were, the absence of such words as "knowingly" or "wilfully" in the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, s. 7 (1), placed the onus on the respondents to show the absence of mens rea and they had failed to discharge the onus, and (c) that the fact that the three respondents were partners in a firm prima facie made the act of one of them the act of them all. The justices dismissed the information against the respondents. G The Divisional Court now dismissed the appellant's appeal from their order in respect of the first two respondents, but sent the case back to the justices with an intimation that an offence had been committed by the third respondent and a direction to convict him.

Paget, K.C., and E. L. Bradley for the appellant.

H Bassett for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the borough of Dover before whom the three respondents were charged with aiding, abetting, counselling and procuring a builder, named Dolbear, to commit an offence against the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, s. 7 (1). By that subsection, when a person obtains from a local authority a licence to build a house, the authority can attach to the licence a condition limiting the price for which the house may be sold, if it is sold within a stated time. Section 7 contains elaborate provisions for preventing colourable devices to evade the Act, e.g., if the maximum price which may be charged is fixed by the licence, the vendor cannot obtain an increased price by making separate bargains which are associated with the purchase. In this case the builder had a licence which entitled him to sell the house for £1,025. He induced a railway porter to agree to buy the house for £1,275, i.e., £250 more than the controlled price, and he instructed a firm of solicitors, in which the three respondents are partners, to act as his solicitors for the sale. The builder was charged with an offence against s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1945 and was convicted, but the three respondents were acquitted on charges of aiding and abetting him. A

In regard to the respondents, the justices found that, until Apr. 6, 1949, none of them knew anything about the extra £250 which the builder was receiving, and that the first two respondents, Mr. Henry Wallace Youden and Mr. George Henry Youden, did not know about it at any time, as the builder deliberately concealed the fact and even refused to give the purchaser a receipt for that £250. The justices, therefore, were right, in our opinion, in dismissing the information against the first two respondents on the ground that they could not be guilty of aiding and abetting the commission of the offence as they did not know of the matter which constituted the offence. If they had known that the builder was receiving the extra £250 and had continued to ask the purchaser to complete, they would have committed an offence by continuing to assist the builder to offer the property for sale, contrary to the provisions of s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1945, and, as ignorance of the law is no defence, they would have been guilty of the offence even if they had not realised that they were committing an offence, but a person cannot be convicted of aiding and abetting the commission of an offence if he does not know of the essential matters which would constitute the offence. B C D

In regard to their partner, Mr. Brydone, the third respondent, the facts are different. Until Apr. 6 or 7, 1949, he was as ignorant as were his partners that the builder had insisted on receiving £250 beyond what he was entitled to charge, but on Apr. 6 he received a letter from the purchaser's solicitor saying: E

"I duly received your letter of Mar. 26 informing me that you are ready to settle at any time and that the amount payable on completion is £925."

The sum was £925, because the controlled price was £1,025, and £100 had been paid as deposit. The letter continued:

"I think I ought to let you know the reason why I have not as yet proceeded to completion. It is that I have felt compelled to report to the town clerk what I consider to be a breach by your client of the provisions of s. 7 of the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945." F

This letter naturally put the third respondent, who was dealing with the matter, on inquiry, and he thereupon read the relevant provisions of the Act of 1945 and also spoke to the builder who told him a story which, even if it were true, was on the face of it obviously a colourable evasion of the Act. The builder's story was that he had placed the extra £250 in a separate deposit account and that it was to be spent on payment for work as and when he (the builder) would be lawfully able to execute it in the future on the house on behalf of the purchaser. G

It seems impossible to imagine that anyone could believe such a story. Who has ever heard of a purchaser, when buying a house from a builder, putting money into the builder's hands because he may want some work done thereafter? I think that the third respondent could not have read s. 7 (5) of the Act as carefully as he should have done, because I cannot believe that any solicitor, or even a layman, would not understand that the bargain which the builder described was just the kind of transaction which the Act prohibits. Section 7 (5) provides; H

“In determining for the purposes of this section the consideration for which a house has been sold or let, the court shall have regard to any transaction with which the sale or letting is associated . . .”

If the third respondent had read and appreciated those words he would have seen at once that the extra £250 which the builder was getting was in regard to a transaction with which the sale was associated, and was, therefore, an unlawful payment. Unfortunately, however, he did not realise it, but either misread the Act or did not read it carefully, and on the following day he called on the purchaser to complete. He was, therefore, clearly aiding and abetting the builder in the offence which the builder was committing. The result is that, so far as the first two respondents are concerned, the appeal fails and must be dismissed, but, so far as the third respondent is concerned, the case must go back to the justices with an intimation that an offence has been committed, and there must be a conviction.

HUMPHREYS, J.: I agree.

LYNSKEY, J.: I also agree.

Appeal dismissed in respect of the first two respondents and allowed in respect of the third respondent. Case remitted to the justices with a direction to convict the third respondent. No order as to costs.

Solicitors: Wilkinson, Howlett & Moorhouse (for the appellant); William Charles Crocker (for the respondents).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re MACADAM (a bankrupt). Ex parte GUILLAUME AND ANOTHER v. THE TRUSTEE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman and Danckwerts, JJ.), January 23, 1950.]

Bankruptcy—Property available for distribution—Settlement within two years of bankruptcy—Valuable consideration—Purchase of house for bankrupt by trustees of settlement—Contribution by bankrupt of part of purchase price—Settlement by bankrupt of his contribution on trusts of original settlement—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 42 (1).

On Mar. 15, 1944, M. settled certain stock exchange securities on himself on protective trusts with remainders over. The trustees of the settlement were given power to lay out the trust fund in the purchase of freehold hereditaments in England for an estate in fee simple to be held on the trusts of the settlement. In July, 1948, M. requested the trustees to purchase a dwelling-house as a residence for himself and his family. In August, 1948, the trustees decided to exercise their power to buy a house, but at a price not exceeding £3,500. M. had meanwhile decided on the house which he wished to have, but its price was £4,250. M., therefore, agreed to pay to the trustees the sum of £750 in cash, plus legal and survey expenses and stamp duty, if the trustees would purchase this property for £4,250. In due course, the trustees took a conveyance of the house, paying therefor £4,250 of which £750 was supplied by M. On Oct. 26, 1948, after the transaction was complete, M. executed a settlement expressed to be made between him and the trustees and to be supplemental to the settlement of 1944. It was thereby recited that the settlor was desirous of making a further addition to the funds settled by the settlement of 1944, and it was witnessed that he had paid £750 to the trustees and that the said money was to be held on the trusts of the settlement of 1944. The surveyor's report procured by the trustees indicated that the house purchased might fetch £4,000, but that it was not worth £4,000 as an investment. On June 24, 1949, a receiving order was made against M. on his own petition, and he was adjudicated bankrupt on the same day. On July 13, 1949, the trustee in bankruptcy was appointed and he claimed to have the supplementary settlement of 1948 set aside under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 42 (1), on the ground that it was made within two years of the bankruptcy and was not made in favour of a purchaser for valuable consideration.

HELD: in expending the £3,500 for the purchase of the house, the trustees of the settlement of 1944 had merely substituted one asset for another, and, therefore, the settlement of 1948 had not been "made in favour of a purchaser . . . for valuable consideration" within s. 42 (1) and could be impeached by the trustee in bankruptcy.

Re Parry, Ex p. Salaman ([1904] 1 K.B. 129), criticised and applied.

[AS TO AVOIDANCE OF SETTLEMENTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 2, pp. 360-367, paras. 486-495; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 5, pp. 837-852, Nos. 7078-7163.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Pope, Ex p. Dicksee, [1908] 2 K.B. 169; 77 L.J.K.B. 767; 98 L.T. 755; 5 Digest 843, 7106.
- (2) Hance v. Harding, (1888), 20 Q.B.D. 732; 57 L.J.Q.B. 403; 59 L.T. 659; 5 Digest 843, 7109.
- (3) Re Parry, Ex p. Salaman, [1904] 1 K.B. 129; 73 L.J.K.B. 83; 89 L.T. 612; 5 Digest 845, 7117.
- (4) Ex p. Hillman, Re Pumfrey, (1879), 10 Ch.D. 622; 48 L.J. Bey. 77; 40 L.T. 177; 5 Digest 842, 7117.

APPEAL by the trustees of a settlement from a decision of His Honour JUDGE ARCHER, K.C., at Brighton and Lewes County Court on Nov. 10, 1949.

The county court judge held that a settlement made by the bankrupt within two years of the bankruptcy was not made in favour of a purchaser for valuable consideration and so was void under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 42 (1). The Divisional Court of the Chancery Division now affirmed the decision of the county court judge. The facts appear in the headnote.

M. J. Albery for the trustees of the settlement.

Stanley Rees for the trustee in bankruptcy.

HARMAN, J.: This is a rather puzzling case in which the trustee in bankruptcy of one William Stevenson Macadam sues the trustees of a certain settlement under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 42 (1), on the ground that it was a settlement made within two years of the bankruptcy and was not made in favour of a purchaser for valuable consideration. The trustees contend that they were purchasers for valuable consideration, and that is the issue in the case.

In 1944 the bankrupt settled certain stock exchange securities for himself with protective interests and remainders over. Under that settlement, there was a power in the trustees to vary investments and to lay out the trust fund in the purchase of any freehold hereditaments in England for an estate in fee simple and so forth, to be held on the trusts of the settlement. In 1948 the bankrupt's affairs were involved. He was occupying, subject to a mortgage, a house which he could not afford to occupy. He could not afford to keep up the instalments on the mortgage and it was necessary for him to contract his liabilities in some way or other. The house was sold for a fair sum of money, but not enough, after paying off the incumbrances to which it was subject, to enable the bankrupt to buy another house. In July, 1948, therefore, through his solicitors he applied to the solicitors for the surviving trustees of the settlement of 1944 requesting them to purchase what he calls a small house as a residence for himself and his family, and there were some negotiations on that footing. It appears that the bankrupt did not wait for the upshot of those negotiations, but fixed in his own mind on a house he would like to buy, called Shaw Cottage, for which he was asked to pay £4,250. It appears to have been a reasonably good cottage, but it was only worth £4,250, or anything like it, under the artificial conditions of the last few years. He induced his solicitors to put down £425 on his behalf in payment of the deposit. For that they had a charge, no doubt, on the larger property which they were selling for him. In August, 1948, the trustees of the settlement of 1944 came to the conclusion that they would exercise the power they had to buy a house, but that £3,500 was all that they were prepared to pay. They communicated that to the bankrupt's solicitors, who, on Aug. 31, write in these terms:

B "We thank you for your letter. Mr. Macadam [the bankrupt] agrees to pay to the trustees the sum of £750 in cash, plus legal and survey expenses and stamp duty, if the trustees will purchase this property for £4,250."

C That is relied on by the trustees as being an offer which they accepted. They did, in fact, raise £3,500 out of the funds of the settlement of 1944 and take a conveyance of the property, Shaw Cottage, from the owner of it for a consideration expressed to be £4,250, of which £750 was supplied by the bankrupt through his solicitors.

D After the whole transaction was complete, the bankrupt executed the supplementary settlement attacked in this case. It is dated Oct. 26, 1948; expressed to be made between the bankrupt, of the one part, and the trustees, of the other part and to be supplementary to the settlement of 1944. It reads:

E "Whereas the settlor is desirous of making a further addition to the funds settled by him under the settlement and is solvent apart from the property hereinafter settled, now this deed witnesseth: 1. The settlor has this day paid to the trustees the sum of £750 and the trustees shall hold the said sum upon similar trusts from the date hereof as those made in the settlement in respect of the investments set out in the schedule hereto. 2. All the trusts powers and provisions of the settlement shall apply to the said sum of £750 as though from the date hereof the cash had been inserted in the schedule of the said settlement."

F That is, of course, a highly unreal document. No sum of £750 ever flowed into the coffers of the trustees. They had got this property, but all they had paid out of the funds of the settlement of 1944 was £3,500. The trustees, as they were in duty bound to do, procured a surveyor's report on the value of the property, and he said that he thought it might fetch £4,000 in the market, but he added a rider to the effect that, in his opinion, it was not worth that sum as an investment. The trustees, therefore, had no right to pay £4,250 for it, and it is very likely (though it is not necessary, I think, for me to decide that in this case) they committed a breach of trust. That will depend on whether the property eventually fetches the full money and on other circumstances which I do not propose to deal with at this point.

H Now, it is said that, although the settlement of 1948 is, on the face of it, a voluntary settlement, yet it is open to the parties dehors the document to prove there was good and valuable consideration for it. That is a principle that nobody disputes. The suggestion put forward is that the trustees are purchasers for valuable consideration in one of two ways. One of them is that they would not have exercised their statutory power of buying a house with the settled funds but for the bringing in of the £750 by the bankrupt. The other is that they would not have committed this breach of trust but for the fact that the bankrupt contributed £750. It is said that in either of those ways the settlement is one in which they are not volunteers but purchasers. That is supported by counsel for the settlement trustees by reference to Re Pope, Ex p. Dicksee (1), of which I will read the headnote:

"In order to constitute a person a 'purchaser' for valuable consideration within the exception mentioned in s. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, it is not necessary that either money or physical property should be given; the release of a right, or the compromise of a claim, may be sufficient to constitute a person a 'purchaser' within the meaning of that section."

There the bankrupt executed a settlement, and the consideration was that his wife should not bring divorce proceedings against him. I can well see that that was a good consideration. It was a detriment to her, because she might have got alimony. It was an advantage to him, because he avoided the publicity and also the costs of divorce proceedings. Hance v. Harding (2) was also relied on. In that case, a post-nuptial settlement was made by a man who went bankrupt within two years. He brought in certain assets of his own, but his father also brought in certain assets, and it was held that there was good consideration because the beneficiaries under the settlement got something from a source which was not the bankrupt, but was his father.

The question here, therefore, is whether there was a quid pro quo, and the case relied on for the trustee in bankruptcy is Re Parry, Ex p. Salaman (3), on which also the learned county court judge relied for his decision. In that case there was a post-nuptial settlement by a settlor on himself with remainders for his widow and children and a power to revoke in the settlor, but with the consent of the trustees, about which they had an absolute discretion. He applied to them for consent to revoke the settlement to a certain extent to pay certain debts which he had incurred. They replied that they would only do so if he would bring into settlement certain other assets of his, namely, first, the life interest under the settlement, and, secondly, a reversion or remainder to which he was entitled. WRIGHT, J. (who was an experienced bankruptcy judge) came to the conclusion that that did not make the trustees "purchasers for value." His judgment is in these terms ([1904] 1 K.B. 133):

"The view I take of this case is based entirely upon the fact that the trusts are revocable at the request of the settlor with the consent of the trustees; and, having regard to that fact, it seems to me that I ought not to hold that this transaction is a purchase for valuable consideration within the meaning of s. 47 . . . What took place in truth was this. The settlor being anxious to obtain a present use of portions of the settled assets, which were capable of being realised at the time, was willing to bring in other assets, which probably were not capable of being realised at the time, on the terms that the trustees, who had a discretionary power of consenting to revocation of the trusts, should exercise their discretionary power and consent to his taking out of the old assets the portion which he required. Now the only question is, whether the consent which they gave was a consent given by them as 'purchasers for valuable consideration' within the meaning of the section. I do not think it was really a transaction of purchase at all in the sense in which the word 'purchaser' is construed in the two cases to which I have referred [Hance v. Harding (1) and Ex p. Hillman, Re Pumfrey (4)]. They did not, as it seems to me, purchase for any price whatever. The proper description of what they did is, that they only exercised a fiduciary power to consent to terms which satisfied them that the trusts would not suffer. In one sense it may be said that the consideration which was given for a sale of assets for £1,600 really came from the debtor himself; but the ground for the view which I take is that it was not a bargain of purchase at all as between vendor and purchaser, but merely a partial substitution of one trust asset for another in the discretion of the trustees. I think, having regard to the decisions in the cases to which I have referred, that that cannot properly be described as a purchase by the trustees for valuable consideration within the meaning of s. 47."

That bears a very strong resemblance to the present case, except that, in the learned judge's view, the trustees there had a perfect right to do what they did. For myself, I doubt whether that is the right view to take of those facts. The trustees, having a discretion to consent to a revocation, cannot, I think, take other things into account, collateral advantages, when exercising their discretion.

It, therefore, is true, I think, to say that the learned judge's judgment, which he says went entirely on the fact that there was a discretion, may be criticised from that point of view. Nevertheless, his view that this was not a transaction of purchase at all is very pertinent to the present case. His description of it as "a partial substitution of one trust asset for another" is exactly what happened here. What the trustees have now got, instead of the £3,500 of investments under the settlement, is a property which is, or must be taken for this purpose to be, worth £3,500. They are no better off, nor are the beneficiaries; nor are they worse off. It seems to me that they have merely, in what may be breach of trust, substituted one asset for another. It would be entirely a travesty to call this a purchase in any sense of the word. They did not buy anything of the bankrupt, and he did not sell anything to them. He wanted to get hold of a part of the trust assets. He did it in this way. In truth and in fact, he and the trustees combined their resources to buy this house. He then settled his contribution to it, and that settlement, in my view, was a voluntary settlement. In my judgment, the trustees cannot properly be described as "purchasers for valuable consideration" and the trustee in bankruptcy can, as he is entitled to do under the circumstances, impeach the settlement which has been made. That will give him, I think, a charge on the settled funds in which this £750 has been intermingled to the extent of £750. I would dismiss the appeal.

DANCKWERTS, J.: I agree. It seems to me that this case is really resolved on its particular facts. There is no doubt that consideration, to make a person a "purchaser" for the purpose of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 42 (1), need not necessarily be a payment in money. No authority is needed for that, but one must look at the particular transaction which was carried out. If a somewhat different transaction had been carried out, it may be that the trustees would have been in the position of purchasers. If, for instance, the £750 which was provided by the bankrupt had been held by the trustees on trust to reimburse themselves for any claim for breach of trust or to reimburse the beneficiaries for any loss on the investment in the purchase of this particular house, it may be that the trustees would then have been in the position of purchasers, but what the parties chose to do was for the bankrupt to make a settlement of £750 on similar trusts to those which were declared by the settlement of 1944. The effect of that was that those moneys could be invested in the purchase of land, but only in a proper purchase of a house on proper conditions, at a proper price and not at an over-value. It seems to me that the rights of the beneficiaries as regards the £750 were exactly the same as the right which they possessed in regard to the original funds. They may, therefore, equally well, if a loss should happen, have a right of action against the trustees as regards the £750 as well as regards the original funds. For that right the beneficiaries have given nothing whatever. Therefore, they are volunteers, and it was a voluntary settlement, and it must be set aside under the provisions of the section. Accordingly, I also am in favour of dismissing the appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Guillaume & Sons (for the trustees of the settlement); Gibson & Weldon, agents for Farrington & Whiting, Brighton, Sussex (for the trustee in bankruptcy).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re A DEBTOR (No. 564 of 1949). Ex parte COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE v. THE DEBTOR.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell, L.J., and Hodson, J.), January 23, 1950.]

Bankruptcy—Receiving order—Infant—Infant trading with adult—Jurisdiction to make receiving order against infant—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 3. A

The debtor, an infant, carried on with her mother a business of wholesale trader in cosmetics, a class of articles subject to purchase tax. The debtor and her mother failed to account for the purchase tax which they collected, and the tax became a debt due to the Crown by virtue of s. 31 (2) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940. The Crown obtained judgment for the amount of tax owing and presented a bankruptcy petition against the infant and her mother. The registrar made a receiving order against the mother, but he refused to make an order against the infant on the ground that, in view of her infancy, he had no jurisdiction to do so. B

HELD: the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 3, applied to an infant if the debt invoked in support of the bankruptcy petition was a debt which was enforceable at law; the purchase tax for which the infant debtor in the present case was accountable constituted such a debt; and, therefore, the court had jurisdiction to make a receiving order against her. C

R. v. Newmarket Income Tax Commissioners, Ex parte Huxley ([1916] 1 K.B. 788), applied.

[FOR THE POSITION OF INFANTS UNDER THE BANKRUPTCY LAW, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 2, pp. 13, 14, para. 15; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 4, pp. 28-30, Nos. 218-237.] D

Cases referred to:

- (1) R. v. Newmarket Income Tax Commissioners, Ex parte Huxley, [1916] 1 K.B. 788; 85 L.J.K.B. 925; 114 L.T. 963; 7 Tax Cas. 49; 28 Digest 96, 575.
- (2) Re A. and M., [1926] Ch.D. 274; sub nom., Re L.A. and B.F.M., Ex parte, Official Receiver v. The Debtors, 95 L.J.Ch. 258; 134 L.T. 539; Digest Supp.
- (3) Re Smedley, (1864), 10 L.T. 432; 4 Digest 29, 224.
- (4) Ex parte Stevenson, Re Purser, (1868), 19 L.T. 23; 4 Digest 29, 225.
- (5) Ex parte Hands, Re Hands, (1867), 15 W.R. 1089; 4 Digest 29, 226.
- (6) Ex parte Jones, Re Jones, (1881), 18 Ch.D. 109; 50 L.J.Ch. 673; 45 L.T. 193; 4 Digest 29, 235.
- (7) Ex parte Lynch, Re Lynch, (1876), 2 Ch.D. 227; 45 L.J. Bey. 48; 34 L.T. 34; 4 Digest 28, 223.
- (8) Lovell and Christmas v. Beauchamp, [1894] A.C. 607; 63 L.J.Q.B. 802; 71 L.T. 587; varying, Re Beauchamp Brothers, Ex parte Beauchamp, [1894] 1 Q.B. 1; 63 L.J.Q.B. 101; 69 L.T. 646; 4 Digest 29, 230. F G

APPEAL by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, the petitioning creditors, from a decision of Mr. Registrar PARTON, dated Dec. 2, 1949, refusing to make a receiving order against the infant debtor on the ground of want of jurisdiction. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal, holding that the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, applied to the case of infants. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R. H

Denys Buckley for the creditors.

Wingate-Saull for the debtor.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This is an appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar PARTON whereby he declined to make a receiving order against Miss Esther Posner on the ground that she was an infant. In the view of the registrar, however desirable it might be to make her a bankrupt, and however slender might be her merits in the case, on the authorities which had been cited to him there was no jurisdiction in the court to apply to an infant the law of bankruptcy.

Miss Posener carried on with her mother a business of wholesale trader or merchant in cosmetics, a class of article which is subject to the provisions as to purchase tax imposed by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940. According to that Act a wholesale seller of articles of the kind referred to as "chargeable goods" must be registered and is liable on the sale of such goods, save in certain immaterial exceptions, to account to the Crown for purchase tax in respect of the goods. The important section of the Act of 1940 for present purposes is s. 31 (2) which provides:

"Tax [i.e., purchase tax] shall be recoverable as a debt due to His Majesty from the person accountable therefor."

The facts show that both Mrs. Posener and her daughter were duly registered as wholesale dealers in this kind of goods and they were accountable to the Crown for purchase tax on their sales. They failed to account for the tax which they had collected from purchasers of the goods from them, and, accordingly, the amount of tax became, within the language of the sub-section, recoverable as a debt due to His Majesty from Mrs. Posener and from Miss Posener.

In R. v. Newmarket Income Tax Commissioners (1) an analogous question arose, namely, whether infancy was a defence to a claim to proceed on an assessment to income tax under the Income Tax Act, 1842. Huxley, the person there concerned, was carrying on business (apparently with considerable profit to himself) as a jockey, but was an infant at the material date. It was said on his behalf that the provisions of the Income Tax Acts (including the section which provides that the amount of the tax is a debt due to the Crown) did not apply to Huxley by reason of his infancy. That contention was rejected by this court. LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., opened his judgment in this way ([1916] 1 K.B. 797):

"The question in this appeal is whether a jockey under the age of twenty-one, who has made large profits or gains from his business or employment, can be assessed to the income tax. The answer to this question depends upon the construction of a few clauses in the Income Tax Acts which undoubtedly admit of considerable argument. The charging section is s. 100 of the Act of 1842. It makes all 'persons' receiving profits chargeable with income tax under sched. D, and the contention on the part of the Crown is that the infant is a 'person' receiving the profits, and that there is nothing in the Act to exempt him from liability . . ."

At the end of the judgment of WARRINGTON, L.J. (ibid., 803), occurs this passage, which will be relevant also at a later stage in connection with another argument with which I shall duly deal ([1916] 1 K.B. 803):

"But it is said that the general scope and purport of the [Income Tax Acts] is such that it is a necessary inference that an infant is personally exempt from its requirements. Huxley contends that the Act requires the exercise of skill and intelligence in preparing returns, and of discretion and judgment in deciding whether to appeal, and so forth; that the law treats all infants, whether babies in arms or men of twenty years of age, as equally incapable, and that accordingly it cannot be supposed that the legislature intended to require from any infant what the smallest baby in arms would be incapable of doing. But I think the legal doctrine of equality of incapacity has reference to the question of status before the law, and for the purpose of construing such an Act as the present it has no applicability. I think it is a sufficient answer to the rest of the argument that an infant who controls and manages his own concern, as Huxley does, may well be treated as capable of doing what is required under the Act."

The court came to the conclusion that Huxley was liable to be assessed.

It seems to follow from the decision in that case that in this matter of purchase tax the sums for which the infant, as a partner with her mother in the firm, is accountable constitute debts in the strict sense—that is, debts duly recoverable at law. The question, therefore, is, assuming the existence of such a debt: Does the fact that the debtor is an infant nevertheless produce the result that the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, by express language or necessary inference, do not apply to her? So far as express language is concerned, I confess the matter seems to me to be tolerably plain. Section 3 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, provides as follows:

"Subject to the conditions hereinafter specified, if a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy the court may, on a bankruptcy petition being presented either by a creditor or by the debtor, make an order, in this Act called a receiving order, for the protection of the estate."

In my judgment, all the conditions indicated in that section are satisfied. There is here a debtor, the infant, who became indebted to His Majesty, in the strict sense of that phrase, for purchase tax. There has also been committed an act of bankruptcy in that the Crown obtained judgment for the amount due and owing. In accordance with the Act, notice was served on the debtor to pay the sum due, and the debtor failed to pay. Beyond question, if there is here a debt, there is a creditor, and the sum in question is not below the limit set in the section nor otherwise disqualified by any of the terms of s. 4. Therefore, prima facie, on the plain language of this section and of the Act generally, there seems to me to be jurisdiction in the court to make a receiving order.

It is, however, said that there is authority, consisting of statements in text books and, possibly, some observations in cases, which indicates that, where the debtor is an infant, bankruptcy jurisdiction is inapplicable. So far as the text books are concerned, it is true to say that there appears to be unanimity, at any rate, in doubting whether the bankruptcy jurisdiction applies to infants. In CHALMERS AND HOUGH, 9th ed., p. 22, the matter is stated quite categorically:

"A petition does not lie against a corporation, nor against an infant."

Certain cases are cited in support of that proposition, but they are the same cases which are cited in support of the statements in other books to which I shall refer. There is nothing contained in the notes or authorities cited in CHALMERS AND HOUGH which seems to justify any stronger view than that expressed in WILLIAMS ON BANKRUPTCY and in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND. In WILLIAMS ON BANKRUPTCY, 16th ed., p. 41, the matter is expressed with less assurance:

"It is doubtful whether an infant under any circumstances can be made a bankrupt. In Re A. and M. (2) a Divisional Court annulled an adjudication of two infants consequent on their own petition, none of the debts being legally enforceable against them. The court will always inquire into the consideration of the judgment, which must be a claim which, having regard to the provisions of the Infants Relief Act, 1874, and to the general law of infancy, is enforceable against the infant. Infancy has never been a defence in tort, and a judgment in tort constitutes a debt. An infant, too, in equity, has always been held liable for fraud."

It will be observed that what follows after the first sentence seems to be limited to showing that, where there are no debts which are enforceable against an infant, there can be no basis for the exercise of the bankruptcy jurisdiction, and I think that undoubtedly must be so. The question here is: If this condition is fulfilled which is absent in the instances given, if there are legally enforceable debts, does the same result follow? The editors of the title BANKRUPTCY in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., who are deserving of the greatest respect, namely, the late LUXMOORE, L.J., and the late Mr. GEORGE KINGHAM, suggest a negative answer to that question. In vol. 2, p. 13, para. 15, it is stated:

"It appears that an infant cannot be made bankrupt, nor can he alter his legal status as an infant by himself presenting a bankruptcy petition. Though he can make a valid contract in respect of necessities supplied to him, it has not been decided whether a debt incurred in respect of such a contract renders him liable to bankruptcy, but it is submitted that it does not, on the ground that this is a matter of status."

Is that correct, and on what authority is the submission founded? Treating it historically, it seems clear that, before the passing of the Infants Relief Act, 1874, infants could, in certain circumstances, be made bankrupt. At least, they have been made bankrupt in fact. I say that because three instances were cited to us in which an infant was made bankrupt on his own petition. They were all cases in which, I think I am right in saying, an infant was suffering a term of imprisonment for non-payment of a debt. To disembarass himself of that debt, and I dare say other debts, he presented his own petition. The first case of the three is Re Smedley (3) and the others are Ex parte Stevenson, Re Purser (4) and Ex parte Hands, Re Hands (5). The basis of Re Smedley (3) appears to be this. By the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, the bankruptcy jurisdiction no longer was exclusively applicable to traders. It was conceded that an infant, properly speaking, could not incur a trading debt, but, it was said, if an infant incurred a debt of some other kind (in this case on a judgment for a tort) there was nothing which prevented the court saying that the bankruptcy legislation applied to him. It is important to bear in mind that all three cases which I have mentioned were before the courts at a time when the Infants Relief Act, 1874, had not been passed. At that time—I am referring to ANSON'S LAW OF CONTRACT, 19th ed., p. 121—broadly speaking, contracts made by infants were voidable. As the learned author points out, those voidable contracts were of two kinds—contracts which were valid and binding until disaffirmed as could be done "either during infancy or within a reasonable time after majority," or contracts which were not binding "until he ratified them within a reasonable time after majority." The point to emphasise for present purposes is that the obligations were, not wholly void, but voidable. Without pursuing the matter further, as the infant in the two cases which followed Re Smedley (3) was in gaol for the non-payment of debt, there appears ground for supposing that the debt had not been effectively disaffirmed. Therefore, there was a debt existing, and, there being a debt existing, the bankruptcy jurisdiction was applied.

Then came the Infants Relief Act, 1874, which made debts contracted in the course of trade and debts contracted otherwise than for necessities not voidable but void. It, therefore, followed that, unless the obligations related to the supply of necessities, there could be no debt of any kind arising out of contract, and, there being no debt, on general principles it would seem to follow that the bankruptcy jurisdiction could not be made to apply. It was on that principle, I think, that Ex parte Jones, Re Jones (6), which came before the Court of Appeal in 1881, was decided. A young man, William Jones, an infant, was carrying on a business of trading in coal, coke, and breeze. Having incurred obligations in respect of those business transactions, he had been made a bankrupt. His adjudication having been affirmed by the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy (BACON, C.J.), he appealed to the Court of Appeal and that court concluded that there was no justification for such a decree. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said (18 Ch.D. 120):

"Only debts could then be proved. But there is no decision which says that this kind of liability is a legal debt. I use the words 'legal debt' " advisedly; of course there can be no other debt than a legal debt, but the inaccurate phrase 'equitable debt' has crept into the books. But this liability is not really a debt at all, it is only a liability in equity to pay a sum of money, and whenever a debt is required by law in order to found any proceedings, this equitable liability will not be enough."

Then he says (ibid., 121):

"There is therefore no pretence for saying in the present case that the infant is a debtor, or that any action could be maintained against him by the respondents."

To make those passages clear, it should be stated that there was a decision of Ex parte Lynch, Re Lynch (7) which the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy had followed. The substance of that decision was that if an infant in the course of trading represented that he was of age, and (I think the matter went this far) since he by his conduct in trading led it to be supposed that he was of age, there arose what SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., referred to in the passage I have read as an equitable debt for which the infant became liable, notwithstanding his infancy. The Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that the decision in Ex parte Lynch, Re Lynch (7) was wrong and disapproved of the ruling of the Chief Judge. I will refer to one more passage in his judgment where SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., says (18 Ch.D. 122):

"... the court can only be put in motion under [the Bankruptcy Act, 1869] by a person who is a creditor and who has a right to intervene in the proceedings."

As was pointed out in the circumstances of that case, there was no creditor. BAGGALLAY, L.J., in the last sentence of his judgment, says (18 Ch.D. 124):

"We come back therefore to this, that no debt has been proved to have been due to the petitioning creditors at the time when the application for the adjudication was made, and therefore the adjudication cannot be supported."

I have referred at a little length to that case because the first sentence in the passage from HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, vol. 2, p. 13, para. 15, which I read, namely, "It appears that an infant cannot be made bankrupt," is supported by a reference to Ex parte Jones, Re Jones (6). The note (t), after referring to that case goes on to say:

"Under the old law infants have been held liable to bankruptcy and had been made bankrupt," referring to Re Smedley (3). In Re Smedley (3) the "debt" arose out of a tort. I think it very probable that, had the Infants Relief Act, 1874, been passed when the two later cases following Re Smedley (3) (namely Ex parte Stevenson, Re Purser (4) and Ex parte Hands, Re Hands (5)) came up for decision, the results would have been different. The editors, therefore, may well be justified in supposing that, as a result of the Act of 1874 which made the obligations which Jones had contracted void altogether, a difference had been made in the position as it had been previously, but there is nothing in Ex parte Jones, Re Jones (6) which says that where, in the case of an infant, there is a legally enforceable debt the bankruptcy law cannot apply to him. Indeed, the few passages which I have read from the judgment of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., and the judgment of BAGGALLAY, L.J., show (I should have thought) that the converse would have been the case. In other words, it was the absence of a legally enforceable debt that was the basis of the decision.

To revert again to the statement in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, it will be recollected that it is first said that there is no decision in the books showing that a debt incurred in respect of a contract for necessaries renders an infant liable to bankruptcy proceedings. I think that is accurate. So far as the industry of counsel has enabled them to make researches, no such case has been found. The text goes on (HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, vol. 2, p. 14):

"... it is submitted that it does not, on the ground that this is a matter of status."

A The authority for that proposition, according to the note, is Lovell and Christmas v. Beauchamp (8) in which it had been sought to make a firm bankrupt. The firm consisted of more than one partner, but one partner was an infant. In the Court of Appeal it was decided that the whole proceedings and the receiving order made were invalid. There could not be, it was said, bankruptcy proceedings against an infant partner in respect of trade debts which had been incurred by the firm, because, as in Ex parte Jones, Re Jones (6), B they were not enforceable debts at all, and, therefore, the receiving order made against the firm was regarded as of no validity. The House of Lords varied that by ordering that the receiving order should not be against the firm simply, but against the firm other than the infant partner. We have examined closely the opinions of the noble Lords in that case, and reference has also been made to the decision of the Court of Appeal. In my judgment, there is no warrant in C any of the opinions of the noble Lords or in the judgments of the Court of Appeal for the view that the bankruptcy legislation is inapplicable to infants by reason of the status of infancy as such. In my judgment, the bankruptcy legislation does not apply to an infant if, and only if, the debts which are invoked in support of it are not enforceable debts at all, but are "debts" or obligations which are, in truth, wholly unenforceable and void. LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., in the course of D his opinion, seems to indicate the possibility that an infant might be adjudicated bankrupt because he says ([1894] A.C. 611):

"It is also clear that, even if there are circumstances under which an infant may be adjudicated bankrupt, or a receiving order may lawfully be obtained as a step towards such adjudication, he cannot be made subject to the bankruptcy laws in respect of any debt contracted by the firm of which E he is a partner."

I think it may be true to say, as counsel for the debtor urged, that the language of LORD HERSCHELL shows that in his mind at that time the possibility of an infant being made bankrupt was very remote, but it was quite unnecessary for the decision in that case to determine whether in any circumstances an infant F could be made bankrupt. The possibility of a petition founded on legally recoverable debts (for example, income tax or debts for goods supplied as necessities—purchase tax could not then have been considered because it did not exist) was not mentioned and formed no part of the debate before the House of Lords. Therefore, in my judgment, the case cited does not support the view for which the authors contend in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND G that bankruptcy legislation is inapplicable to infants because of the so-called status of infants. Indeed, the status of infancy as such appears, when one examines the provisions, and the purpose, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, to be quite irrelevant. If a person—and, prima facie, an infant is a person—has incurred debts which are enforceable it may be not only to the advantage of the creditors but also of the person himself that there should be a proper H administration of the estate. It is not to be forgotten that a receiving order is described in s. 3 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, as an order "for the protection of the estate."

That leads me to deal with the next point made by counsel for the debtor. He admits that there is here an enforceable debt and that in the terms of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, there is no apparent reason why a receiving order should not be made, but he argues that it is against public policy that infants should be made bankrupt. He says with truth, that there is no certain line which can be drawn when an infant attains a particular age above which it is reasonable to suppose that he may be made bankrupt, but below which it would have to be said that it was unreasonable. It cannot be supposed, he says, that the legislature intended that a boy or girl of seven or eight years of age should be brought under the bankruptcy legislation. For my part, I see no difficulty in that. Although bankruptcy legislation is not confined to the results of trading operations the common case, no doubt, is where a person has incurred debts by way of trade and has been unable to pay them. A boy or girl of seven or eight will not engage in trade. If a person is of age to engage in trade, there seems to me to be no ground of public policy why the obligations which fall on the rest of humanity who engage in trade should not also fall on him. There is, after all, a discretion in the court. It is not bound to make a receiving order. If in respect of income tax, for example, it was suggested that a very young child should be made bankrupt—if one can imagine such a case, though I find it difficult to do so—the discretion of the court would amply protect the infant and prevent any use of the Bankruptcy Acts in circumstances which everybody would agree to be inappropriate.

Counsel for the debtor also drew attention to the circumstance that there is in the Bankruptcy Rules themselves nothing to cover the case where the infant would have to be represented, for example, by its next friend or its guardian ad litem. It is true that in that regard there may be a lacuna in the Bankruptcy Rules. If there is, it can easily be filled. Reference, however, to the Practice Direction of 1931 seems to show that those who are responsible for the administration of bankruptcy procedure had not been unmindful of the need to make provision where an infant is interested in bankruptcy proceedings, as clearly he may be, whether or not an infant is liable to be made bankrupt. I, therefore, reject the arguments based on public policy, or inconvenience, or on the absence of any precedent.

It seems to me that s. 3 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, is in terms apt to cover every case where the conditions required by the section and the other provisions of the Act as to the existence of an enforceable debt, a creditor, and so on are satisfied. There is nothing, to my mind, in the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, which requires or permits the inference that the Act is not intended to apply to infants. I have dealt a little fully with the matter because of the statements in the text books, but it seems to me, for the reasons I have stated, that the assertion in CHALMERS AND HOUGH is illfounded and that the same may be said of the opening statement in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND. I think the doubts in WILLIAMS may now be taken to be resolved, though in a way contrary to that intimated in the text. Where such views have been expressed by persons of experience it is necessary to consider the matter very carefully before making any pronouncement which may be thought to disturb long established practice. It must not be forgotten that, at any rate prior to 1874, there were instances of infants being made bankrupt. One can well understand that the circumstances in which the application of bankruptcy legislation to infants would be possible at all are relatively rare, and one would not expect to find a great number of instances. I am quite clear, having examined the authorities and having looked at the Act, that there is nothing which makes the Act inapplicable to the case of an infant, provided always that the conditions stated in the Act are fulfilled. For these reasons, I have formed a different view from that entertained by the registrar. I think this is a case where, there being every reason why a receiving order should be made, one ought to be made against the daughter as it has been made already against the mother.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree that the words of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, given their ordinary meaning, confer on the registrar a jurisdiction to make the order sought for in this case against the debtor. I also agree, for the reasons which have been given, that there is nothing in any decided case, nor is there any general principle of law, which would lead one to give them any other than their ordinary meaning. I only want to add one or two observations on a matter which may now really be academic, and that is on the principle which seems to me to have been applied in Re Smedley (3). That decision, though the argument is not set out, seems to me quite unaffected by the passage of the Infants Relief Act, 1874. It is to be noted that in that case the petitioner was in prison under execution for damages and costs arising in an action of tort. Under the common law an infant over seven years of age, broadly speaking, was, and is, liable for torts, and the Act of 1874 deals solely with liability for contracts. It is to be noted that the county court judge in Re Smedley (3), when dealing with the position of an infant as a trader, used these words (10 L.T. 433):

“Moreover, why was it that the courts held that an infant could not be made bankrupt?—because he could not be a trader. Trading, however, is no longer necessary.”

That refers to the time when bankruptcy procedure only applied to insolvency which arose from the result of trading. It is plain that when the judge says that infants could not trade, he means that any trading contracts to which the infant was a party were unenforceable against him. Therefore, as it seems to me, the decision in that case must have depended on the fact that the obligations in respect of which the petitioner was in prison, and presumably the basis of his petition for adjudication, was a liability, not void or voidable, but a liability in tort for which, at any rate, prima facie, the infant would be liable. If that is right, then the judgment in Re Smedley (3) is exactly in accordance with the principles which have been laid down today by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. As to the two cases which followed Re Smedley (3) the reports are so short that it is difficult to discover exactly the facts on which the court proceeded. It may be that there was something in them which would have been affected by the passage of the Infants Relief Act, 1874. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

HODSON, J.: It is not surprising that the registrar should have been impressed by the statement in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND which has been referred to and which is against the contention for the creditors here. I think that statement is not supported by authority. I would add, if I may, a few words to what SOMERVELL, L.J., has just said about the old authorities. The three cases, Re Smedley (3), Ex parte Stevenson, Re Purser (4) and Ex parte Hands, Re Hands (5) are all precedents for invocation by infants in connection with the law of bankruptcy. It is true that they were all decided before the passing of the Infants Relief Act, 1874, but that Act had only to do with infants' contracts other than contracts for necessities. Nothing which has appeared in any of the judgments since the passing of the Infants Relief Act, which have been read to us, seems to throw any doubt on the soundness of the reasoning of Re Smedley (3) which was followed in the other two cases. Re Smedley (3) was a case concerning an infant's liability in respect of a judgment in an action of tort. Ex parte Stevenson, Re Purser (4) was a case relating to an infant's liability in respect of trading, where his contract would be voidable, and Ex parte Hands, Re Hands (5) was a case in which it is not clear whether the liability was for necessities or not.

It might be convenient to refer to one case which was referred to in argument, namely, Re A. and M. (2), a decision of ASTBURY, J., and P. O. LAWRENCE, J. ASTBURY, J., stated the position very clearly, although the judgment is a very short one. I think it is accurately summarised in the headnote as follows ([1926] Ch. 274):

“In the absence of debts actually enforceable against them infants cannot be made bankrupt, even on their own petition.”

In his judgment he used this language, which justified that statement (ibid. 275):

"There is no question as to any necessities having been supplied to [the infants] or that there were any other enforceable debts."

It seems to me quite clear that the learned judge had in view cases where there might be, as in the case now before the court, enforceable debts payable by infants. Therefore, not only, in my judgment, is the law quite clear upon the subject, but it is supported by ancient precedents the validity of which is not affected by decisions given since the passing of the Infants Relief Act, 1874. I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed. Receiving order made to date from Dec. 2, 1949. Costs of the appeal added to the costs of the receiving order.

Solicitors: Sir Nazeby Harrington, Solicitor for Customs and Excise (for the creditors); Franks, Charlesly and Leighton (for the debtor).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re BIRKETT (deceased). HOLLAND v. DUNCAN AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), January 27, 1950.]

Will—Division of fund—Per stirpes or per capita—Prima facie rule—Rejection—

"Equally between the children of my deceased sister T. and the said F.H."—Children of different generation from that of testatrix, T., and F.H.

By her will, dated June 5, 1945, a testatrix, who died on May 28, 1949, appointed F.H. (a stranger in blood) her sole executrix and trustee and gave, devised and bequeathed all her estate "unto and equally between the children of my deceased sister T. and the said F.H. absolutely Provided always that if any child or children of my said deceased sister shall die in my lifetime leaving issue who shall survive me then such issue shall take and if more than one in equal shares the share or shares which his her or their parent or parents would have taken had he she or they survived me." It appeared that F.H. was a friend both of the testatrix and another sister of the testatrix, and that the testatrix lived with F.H. as a "paying guest" for some years up to the date of her death.

HELD: (i) on the true construction of the will, there was a gift to F.H. herself and not to the children of F.H.

Re Dale ([1931] Ch. 357) and Re Cossentine ([1933] Ch. 119), applied.

(ii) having regard to the facts that the testatrix, T. and F.H. were of the same generation, and that the testatrix would have wished to reward her friend F.H. to whom she was under some obligation, the prima facie rule that the gift should be regarded as one per capita was displaced, and it was to be inferred that the testatrix intended that the estate should be divided as to one moiety equally to the children of T. and as to the other moiety to F.H. absolutely.

[AS TO DISTRIBUTION PER CAPITA AND PER STIRPES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 356-359, paras. 402-405; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 991-1003, Nos. 8490-8605.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Dale, [1931] 1 Ch. 357; 100 L.J.Ch. 237; 145 L.T. 632; Digest Supp.
- (2) Re Cossentine, [1933] Ch. 119; 102 L.J.Ch. 78; 148 L.T. 261; Digest Supp.
- (3) Re Alcock, [1945] 1 All E.R. 613; [1945] Ch. 264; 114 L.J.Ch. 161; 173 L.T. 4; 2nd Digest Supp.

- (4) Re Hall, [1948] Ch. 437; [1948] L.J.R. 1430; 2nd Digest Supp.
 (5) Re Jeeves, [1948] 2 All E.R. 961; [1949] Ch. 49; [1949] L.J.R. 317; 2nd Digest Supp.
 (6) Re Jeffrey, [1948] 2 All E.R. 131; 2nd Digest Supp.
 (7) Re Harper, [1914] 1 Ch. 70; 83 L.J.Ch. 157; 109 L.T. 925; 44 Digest 991, 8495.

A ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of the testatrix and in the events which had happened, the executrix of the will ought to hold the residuary estate of the testatrix (a) as to one moiety in trust for the children of the testatrix's sister in equal shares and as to the other moiety in trust for herself, or (b) in trust for the said children and herself in equal third shares, or (c) as to one moiety in trust for the said children in equal shares and as to the other moiety in trust for the only child of the executrix, or (d) in trust for the said children of the testatrix's sister and the said child of the executrix in equal third shares. DANCKWERTS, J., held that the residuary estate ought to be held as set out under heading (a) above. The facts appear in the judgment.

C H. A. Rose for the plaintiff, F.H., the executrix of the testatrix's will.
 Michael Browne for the first and second defendants, the children of the deceased sister of the testatrix, T.

C. A. Settle for the third defendant, the only child of the executrix.

D DANCKWERTS, J.: The will, dated June 5, 1945, of Adeline Birkett, who died on May 28, 1949, was drawn by a solicitor, but it raises a difficulty of construction with which these courts are not unfamiliar. After appointing the plaintiff, Frances Holland, to be the sole executrix and trustee, the testatrix gave, devised, and bequeathed all her estate, both real and personal, and of whatsoever kind or nature,

E "unto and equally between the children of my deceased sister Mrs. Toyne and the said Frances Holland absolutely Provided always that if any child or children of my said deceased sister shall die in my lifetime leaving issue who shall survive me then such issue shall take and if more than one in equal shares the share or shares which his her or their parent or parents would have taken had he she or they survived me."

F The first two defendants are the two surviving children of the testatrix's sister, Henriette Cecilia Toyne, who died in 1944. The remaining defendant, Roland Holland, is the only child of Mrs. Frances Holland.

G The first question is whether the reference to "Frances Holland" in her individual capacity was linked up with the earlier reference to "children" so that the bequest is of a share, not to Frances Holland herself, but to her child. On the authorities to which counsel for Mrs. Holland called my attention (Re Dale (1) and Re Cossentine (2)) it is plain that the prima facie rule with regard to a gift of this kind is that it is the parent who is referred to rather than the child. A gift to the children of A. and B. in equal shares or to be equally divided between the children of A. and B., should be construed as a gift in equal shares to the individual B. and the children of A. In this case it seems to me, the context and circumstances also support the application of the prima facie rule. Mrs. Holland was a stranger in blood to the testatrix as opposed to the sister, Mrs. Toyne whose children are referred to, and the substitutional clause plainly points to the fact that it is not the children of Mrs. Holland who are referred to because it would be difficult to apply the clause to her children in the circumstances. She has only one child. The testatrix must have known that she had only that one child as he was born some forty or fifty years before the death of the testatrix, and also she must have known that Mrs. Holland was unlikely to have another child. Therefore, I have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the last defendant, the child of Mrs. Holland, cannot take any interest under this bequest.

The next question, which is whether distribution is to be per capita between the three persons, Mrs. Toyne's two children and Mrs. Holland, or stirpittally so that Mrs. Holland takes one half and Mrs. Toyne's children take the other half equally between them, is not so clear and there are a good number of authorities which, if reconcilable, must, I think, have proceeded on some rather fine distinctions. I have been referred to Re Alcock (3), Re Hall (4), Re Jeeves (5), Re Jeffrey (6), Re Harper (7) and Re Cossentine (2). It is quite plain from those cases that there is some prima facie rule in favour of a per capita construction, but HARMAN, J., in Re Hall (4) said that the context might easily displace that. On the other hand, VAISEY, J., in Re Jeeves (5) found great difficulty in reconciling the authorities and suggested that it was, perhaps, a matter of guesswork what was the proper conclusion to reach in any particular case.

Counsel for Mrs. Holland has argued that the context and circumstances in this case displace the prima facie rule. He points out that Mrs. Holland and the children of the sister, Mrs. Toyne, belong to different generations. That was questioned by counsel for the children of Mrs. Toyne, but I think it was a correct argument. Surely the testatrix, her friend, Mrs. Holland, and Mrs. Toyne, her sister, must be regarded as being of one generation in popular language, and the children of Mrs. Toyne must be regarded as belonging to another generation. That does seem to me to be an argument in favour of applying a stirpital construction in a case of this kind. In Re Hall (4) HARMAN, J., said that cases of stirpital distribution were cases of what he called family distribution, and counsel for Mrs. Holland argued that the present case was of that kind because Mrs. Toyne's children represented the family. I do not think very much help can be drawn by counsel from that argument, because it appears from Re Harper (7) and Re Cossentine (2), which were cited by counsel for the children of Mrs. Toyne, that, where there was, so to speak, a family only on one side, that rule, as enunciated by HARMAN, J.—if he meant to enunciate a rule at all—does not apply. The third argument put forward by counsel for Mrs. Holland appears to me, however, to have some force. Counsel points out that after 1939 Mrs. Holland looked after the testatrix and another sister until the sister's death in April, 1945, when the testatrix went to live with Mrs. Holland as a paying guest, and the testatrix would have wished to reward Mrs. Holland. I agree that the testatrix would have wished to reward such a friend, to whom she was under some obligation, not on an equal footing merely with the two children of her sister, Mrs. Toyne, but on a better footing, so as to give her a half share. Therefore, in spite of the prima facie rule, I think there are sufficient circumstances in the present case to lead me to hold, not merely by guesswork but as a matter of inference, that the testatrix intended a stirpital distribution under which Mrs. Frances Holland takes one half and the children of the deceased sister, Mrs. Toyne, take the remaining half equally between them.

Declaration accordingly. Costs as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the estate.

Solicitors: Tarry, Sherlock & King, agents for A. V. Clappen & Weaver, Winton, Bournemouth (for the plaintiff and the third defendant); Gibson & Weldon, agents for R. J. Fletcher, Sheffield (for the first and second defendants).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

TAYLOR v. CIECIERSKI.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Morris, JJ.), January 25, 1950.]

Motor Spirit—Commercial petrol in tank of private car—Prima facie evidence—Analysis—Result possibly produced by derivatives of diphenylamine—Motor Spirit (Regulation) Act, 1948 (c. 34), s. 2 (1).

A When examined by a public analyst a sample of petrol taken from the tank of a private car yielded a positive reaction for diphenylamine, the prescribed ingredient of commercial petrol as defined in the Motor Spirit Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1127), art. 3. The owner of the car having been charged before justices with an offence under the Motor Spirit (Regulation) Act, 1948, s. 2 (1), there being commercial petrol present in the tank of his car, the analyst stated in cross-examination that
B “theoretically the same result could be produced by derivatives of diphenylamine, being substances of the same group and of very similar composition to diphenylamine; that there would be no purpose in putting such substances into petrol; and that, while it was not unlawful for such substances to be supplied to the public, they were uncommon and not
C easily obtained.”

HELD: these facts constituted prima facie evidence that commercial petrol was present in the tank, contrary to s. 2 (1), and, therefore, there was a case for the owner of the car to answer.

[FOR THE MOTOR SPIRIT (REGULATION) ACT, 1948, s. 2 (1), see HALSBURY'S
D STATUTES, Second Edn., 1948, p. 804.]

CASE STATED by Kent justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Bromley on Oct. 21, 1949, an information was preferred by the prosecutor, a metropolitan police officer, charging the respondent, the owner of a private motor car, with having had present in the tank of his car a quantity of commercial petrol contrary to the E Motor Spirit (Regulation) Act, 1948, s. 2 (1). For the respondent it was contended that the presence of the prescribed ingredient of commercial petrol, diphenylamine, in the petrol taken from the tank of the car had not been proved beyond any doubt. The justices dismissed the information. The prosecutor
F appealed by way of Case Stated and the Divisional Court now held that a prima facie case had been established which the respondent ought to answer, and they remitted the case to the justices with an intimation to that effect. The facts appear in the judgment.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Frank Soskice, K.C.), and H. L. Parker for the appellant.

Hector Hughes, K.C., and I. F. Reuben for the respondent.

G LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by the justices of Kent sitting at Bromley, before whom the respondent was charged with having commercial petrol in the tank of his motor car, contrary to the Motor Spirit (Regulation) Act, 1948, s. 2 (1). The facts given in evidence before the justices were that a police officer stopped the car and tested the petrol in the tank with a reagent paper. Having tested it twice, it appeared to him that the tank
H contained commercial petrol and he did what the Act prescribes, viz., took a sample, divided it into three parts, and sent one part to the public analyst. The analyst certified that:

“I have analysed this sample and find that it consists of motor spirit within the meaning of the Motor Spirit Regulations, 1948, and that, when examined by the test laid down in memorandum R.P. 1/8/7/3 of the Ministry of Fuel and Power, it yields a positive reaction for diphenylamine, the prescribed ingredient of commercial petrol as defined in the Motor Spirit Regulations, 1948, art. 3. I am, therefore, of the opinion that this sample consists of, or contains, commercial petrol."

In evidence before the justices the analyst said that the test he had applied yielded a positive result for diphenylamine, and that he was of opinion that the sample consisted of or contained commercial petrol. Obviously that was prima facie evidence that the offence had been committed. In cross-examination he said

"that theoretically the same result could be produced by derivatives of diphenylamine, being substances of the same group and of very similar composition to diphenylamine; that there would be no purpose in putting such substances into petrol; that while it was not unlawful for such substances to be supplied to the public, they are uncommon and not easily obtained."

In the opinion of the court, there was prima facie evidence which called for an answer. If this was not commercial petrol, the respondent was given an opportunity of proving it was not. He still has that opportunity, because, when the case was before the justices, they did not call on him for an answer. The case, therefore, will go back to the justices with the opinion of this court that there was a prima facie case calling for an answer.

BYRNE, J: I agree.

MORRIS, J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors: The Treasury Solicitor (for the appellant); Bryan O'Connor & Co. (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

PACEY v. ATKINSON.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Lynskey and Sellers, JJ.), January 16, 17, 23, 1950.]

Solicitor—Unqualified person drawing instruments—"Expectation of . . . gain or reward"—Rent collector—Particulars of claim in county court actions for arrears of rent—Commission received in respect of all moneys recovered—No specific fee for drawing instrument—Solicitors Act, 1932 (c. 37), s. 47 (1) (as amended by Solicitors Act, 1941 (c. 46), s. 23 (1)).

By the Solicitors Act, 1932, s. 47 (1), as amended by the Solicitors Act, 1941, s. 23 (1): "Any person, not being a barrister, or a duly certificated solicitor" or other qualified person, as specified in the section, "who, unless he proves that the act was not done for or in expectation of any fee, gain or reward, either directly or indirectly, draws or prepares any instrument relating to . . . any legal proceeding, shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £50."

A rent collector was authorised by his principals to take legal proceedings on their behalf in the county court for recovery of possession of premises and arrears of rent. He received no special fee or remuneration for taking the proceedings, but he received a fixed commission on all sums recovered by him, whether as a result of legal proceedings or otherwise. He was charged with preparing an instrument relating to legal proceedings, viz., particulars of claim in proceedings in the county court, contrary to the Solicitors Act, 1932, s. 47 (1), as amended by the Solicitors Act, 1941, s. 23 (1). It was contended on his behalf that no offence against the section had been committed, as he received no specific fee for preparing the particulars, nor did he expect to receive any such fee.

HELD: as the rent collector was entitled to a commission on any moneys recovered as a result of the legal proceedings, he had drawn the instrument in question "in expectation of . . . gain or reward," within the meaning of s. 47 (1) of the Act of 1932; the fact that he had no contractual right to recover a fee for drawing the instrument was immaterial; and, therefore, he was guilty of an offence against the section.

[AS TO UNQUALIFIED PERSONS PREPARING LEGAL INSTRUMENTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 31, p. 316, para. 349, and 1949 Supplement.

FOR THE SOLICITORS ACT, 1932, s. 47 (1), AND THE SOLICITORS ACT, 1941, s. 23, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 25, p. 816, and Vol. 34, p. 333.]

CASE STATED by Darlington justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Darlington on July 15, 1949, informations were preferred by the appellant, on behalf of the Incorporated Law Society, under the Solicitors Act, 1932, s. 47 (1), as amended by the Solicitors Act, 1941, s. 23 (1), charging the respondent, a collector of rents and debts, not being a barrister, duly certificated solicitor, or other person specified in the section, with having drawn, or, alternatively, with having prepared, instruments relating to legal proceedings, viz., particulars of claim in county court actions. The respondent, who was authorised by his principals to bring the actions on their behalf for recovery of possession of premises and arrears of rent due, was entitled to a commission on any sums recovered, but he obtained no specific fee for taking the proceedings or preparing the particulars. The appellant contended, inter alia, that the respondent, in preparing the particulars of claim, was acting "in expectation of . . . gain or reward," within the meaning of s. 47 (1), as he was acting in expectation of receiving the commission payable on any sums recovered. The respondent contended that the commission was payable, not for preparing the particulars of claim, but for collecting the sums of money due to his principals, and, therefore, no offence had been committed. The justices dismissed the informations. The appellant appealed and the Divisional Court now allowed his appeal.

Cumming-Bruce for the appellant.

Quintin Hogg for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 23. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. The respondent was charged before the justices for the county borough of Darlington on six informations, preferred at the instance of the Incorporated Law Society, charging him with drawing instruments relating to legal proceedings, viz., particulars of claim in certain actions in the Darlington County Court which were specified in the informations. Alternative informations were also laid in respect of the same instruments charging that the respondent had prepared them. The respondent at all material times carried on business as a debt and rent collector, and the particulars of claim, which he was alleged to have drawn and prepared, all claimed possession of premises and arrears of rent due to the principals for whom he was acting, and in one case there was a claim for a debt also due to his principal.

The Solicitors Act, 1932, s. 47 (1), as amended by the Solicitors Act, 1941, s. 23 (1), provides:

"Any person, not being a barrister, or a duly certificated solicitor . . . writer to the signet, notary public, conveyancer, special pleader, or draftsman in equity, who, unless he proves that the act was not done for or in expectation of any fee, gain or reward, either directly or indirectly, draws or prepares any instrument relating to real or personal estate, or any legal proceeding, shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £50."

The respondent carries on business in Darlington as a rent and debt collector, and was remunerated, as is usual in such cases, by a commission on the money which he recovered, whether such sums were paid as a result of legal proceedings or not. The amount of his commission was  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. of the amount recovered if he was acting directly for a landlord or creditor, but, if he acted on the instructions of an estate agent, he shared the commission with the latter. He had authority from his principals to take proceedings in their name in the county court when it was necessary so to do. He received no special fee or remuneration for taking those proceedings, but, if any sum of money was recovered in consequence of any action, he would receive commission on it. A

The justices appear to have received evidence that for many years past it had been a common practice for debt collectors to take proceedings on behalf of their principals in the county court and prepare the necessary documents, which would, of course, include particulars of claim, and that this had been done without any objection by the county court judge or registrars. This evidence was quite irrelevant and ought not to have been admitted. Whatever practice may have existed, the only question is whether this action on the part of the respondent is prohibited by the statute, as it is hardly necessary to say that he holds none of the qualifications mentioned in the section. At the same time, it is well known that this practice has existed in all parts of the country and the question, therefore, is one of considerable importance, not only to rent and debt collectors, but also to the owners of property who employ them and who, if the statute prohibits collectors from taking these proceedings in the county court on behalf of their principals, will have either to do the work themselves or employ solicitors, with the result that costs in many cases will be incurred which the debtors will have to pay. We are not, however, concerned either with the policy or the result of the Act. All we have to say is whether, on the true construction of the section, this action on the part of the respondent is prohibited. B C D

I may say in passing that the only change which was effected in s. 47 (1) of the Act of 1932 by the Act of 1941 was to cast the onus of proving that he did not act for or in expectation of any fee, gain or reward on the respondent, and in this case no point as to onus of proof arose. The respondent gave evidence, and all the facts were, therefore, before the court. In our opinion, it is clear that the respondent must be held to have prepared these county court documents in expectation of reward because, if judgment was recovered and money paid thereunder, he would receive remuneration in the shape of commission on the sum recovered. True, he received no fee, nor did he expect to receive a fee, but that he expected to gain thereby and obtain a reward seems to us to be beyond question. Counsel for the respondent argued—and this was really the whole point of the argument he submitted to us—that there must be some contractual right to receive a fee or other remuneration, and that, unless there was some such contractual right, no offence was committed. We think the short answer to that point is that the section provides that the act must not be “done for or in expectation of any fee, gain or reward,” and the word “expectation” clearly indicates that there need be no legal right to recover, but a mere expectation or hope that some reward will be forthcoming as a result of the action taken. On these short grounds we are of opinion that the offences were proved, and the case must be sent back to the justices with an intimation that convictions must be recorded in all the cases. The appeal, therefore, is allowed with costs. E F G H

Appeal allowed with costs. Case remitted to the justices with an intimation that convictions must be recorded.

Solicitors: Hempsons (for the appellant); Butt & Bowyer, agents for J. F. Latimer & Hinks, Darlington (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

JONES v. HERXHEIMER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Jenkins, L.JJ., and Romer, J.), January 13, 26, 1950.]

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant to repair—Breach—Measure of damages—Diminution to value of reversion—Cost of re-decoration—Repairs necessary to make premises fit for re-letting—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 18 (1).

The premises comprised in a tenancy agreement, dated Mar. 25, 1943, consisted of four rooms on the first floor and one room on the ground floor of a dwelling-house, and by the agreement the tenant covenanted to deliver up the premises in good and tenantable repair at the termination of the tenancy. When the tenant gave up possession on May 19, 1949, the landlord found the premises in a bad state of repair and had to have them re-decorated to put them in a fit state for re-letting. In an action by the landlord claiming damages for breach of covenant the evidence for the landlord did not deal with the actual question of damage to the value of the reversion, but the county court judge held that there was damage of that character by reason of the want of repair and gave judgment for the landlord for £36, the costs of the repairs necessary to make the premises fit for occupation. On an appeal by the tenant to the Court of Appeal it was contended by him that there was no evidence that the value of the reversion had been diminished by the breach of covenant, that the fact that repairs were necessary was not prima facie evidence of damage to the value of the reversion, and that, therefore, under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18 (1), the landlord was not entitled to recover damages.

HELD: as the repairs done by the landlord were repairs within the covenant and were no more than were reasonably necessary to make the five rooms fit, according to ordinary standards, for occupation for residential purposes, there was evidence on which the county court judge could hold that the proper cost of the repairs represented a diminution in the value of the reversion due to the tenant's breach of covenant, and, therefore, the cost of the repairs was recoverable by the landlord under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18 (1).

Hanson v. Newman ([1934] Ch. 298), Salisbury (Marquis) v. Gilmore ([1942] 1 All E.R. 457), and Portman v. Latta ([1942] W.N. 97), distinguished.

Per curiam: We find nothing in the earlier authorities to justify the conclusion as a matter of law that in no case and in no circumstances can the fact that repairs are necessary, and the cost of those repairs, be taken as at least prima facie evidence of damage to the value of the reversion and of the extent of such damage. There must be many cases in which it is, in fact, quite obvious that the value of the reversion has, by reason of a tenant's failure to do some necessary repair, been damaged precisely to the extent of the proper cost of effecting the repair in question.

Dictum of LYNSKEY, J., in Landeau v. Marchbank ([1949] 2 All E.R. 175), disapproved.

[AS TO DAMAGES FOR BREACH OF COVENANT TO LEAVE PREMISES IN REPAIR, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 220, 221, para. 241.

FOR THE LANDLORD AND TENANT ACT, 1927, s. 18 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., p. 902.]

Cases referred to:

(1) Landeau v. Marchbank, [1949] 2 All E.R. 172.

(2) Joyner v. Weeks, [1891] 2 Q.B. 31; 60 L.J.Q.B. 510; 65 L.T. 16; 55 J.P. 725; 31 Digest 341, 4841.

(3) Hanson v. Newman, [1934] Ch. 298; 103 L.J.Ch. 124; 150 L.T. 345; Digest Supp.

(4) Salisbury (Marquis) v. Gilmore, [1942] 1 All E.R. 457; [1942] 2 K.B. 38; 111 L.J.K.B. 593; 166 L.T. 329; 2nd Digest Supp.

(5) Portman v. Latta, [1942] W.N. 97; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE GRANVILLE-SMITH, made at Barnet County Court, and dated Sept. 27, 1949, awarding damages to the landlord for breach of a covenant by the tenant to deliver up premises in good repair. On the determination of the tenancy by the tenant, the five rooms comprised in the tenancy were in a bad state of repair and had to be re-decorated by the landlord to make them fit for re-letting, and the sum awarded by the learned county court judge was the amount found by him to have been the cost of the necessary repairs. On appeal, it was contended by the tenant that there was no evidence that the value of the reversion had been damaged by the want of repair and, therefore, under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18 (1), the landlord was entitled to no damages or to merely nominal damages. The Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by JENKINS, L.J.

John Lawrence for the tenant.

Bibby-Trevor for the landlord.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 26. JENKINS, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE GRANVILLE-SMITH, in the Barnet County Court, dated Sept. 27, 1949, for the recovery by the plaintiff from the defendant of the sum of £36 damages for breach of a covenant by the defendant contained in a tenancy agreement dated Mar. 25, 1943, and made between a Miss Roman (the predecessor in title of the plaintiff) as landlord of the one part and the defendant as tenant of the other part, to deliver up in good and tenantable repair the premises comprised in that agreement at the termination of the tenancy. The question in the appeal is in substance whether, having regard to s. 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, there was any evidence on which the learned county court judge could properly hold the landlord entitled to more than merely nominal damages.

The Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18 (1), is in these terms:

"Damages for a breach of a covenant or agreement to keep or put premises in repair during the currency of a lease, or to leave or put premises in repair at the termination of a lease, whether such covenant or agreement is expressed or implied, and whether general or specific, shall in no case exceed the amount (if any) by which the value of the reversion (whether immediate or not) in the premises is diminished owing to the breach of such covenant or agreement as aforesaid; and in particular no damage shall be recovered for a breach of any such covenant or agreement to leave or put premises in repair at the termination of a lease, if it is shown that the premises, in whatever state of repair they might be, would at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy have been or be pulled down, or such structural alterations made therein as would render valueless the repairs covered by the covenant or agreement."

It is contended for the tenant that in the present case there was no evidence of any damage to the reversion and consequently that the learned county court judge ought as a matter of law either to have dismissed the action or at most to have awarded the landlord a merely nominal sum.

The premises comprised in the tenancy agreement of Mar. 25, 1943, consisted of four rooms on the first floor and one room on the ground floor of No. 9 Elgin Road, Alexandra Park, Wood Green, Middlesex, with certain ancillary rights to which it is unnecessary to refer, and they were thereby let to the tenant for one year from Mar. 25, 1943, at the yearly rent of £109 4s. The relevant covenants on the part of the tenant are those contained in cl. 2 (4) and cl. 2 (10) of the tenancy agreement which are in these terms:

"(4) To keep the interior of the premises and the doors windows and the fittings and fixtures (including those specified in the schedule hereto) in good and tenantable repair and the stairs and staircase leading from the ground floor and the landing and the carpets thereon clean and dusted."

A    "(10) At the determination of the tenancy to deliver up the premises together with the stoves and grates and all landlord's fixtures and the fittings and fixtures specified in the schedule hereto in good and tenantable repair in accordance with the tenant's covenants herein contained and with all locks keys and fastenings complete."

B    The tenant remained in possession of the five rooms in question on the terms of the tenancy agreement after the expiration of the one year's tenancy thereby granted, but ultimately on May 19, 1949, gave up possession to the landlord (i.e., the plaintiff who had in the meantime become the owner of the freehold of No. 9 Elgin Road, subject to the tenant's tenancy of these five rooms). The tenancy having thus determined, the landlord sued the tenant in the Barnet County Court for damages for breach of his covenants to keep and deliver C    up the premises in repair, the terms of which are set out above. The damages claimed by the landlord amounted to £71 15s. 6d., this figure being supported by a schedule of dilapidations prepared by the landlord's brother-in-law, a builder and decorator, named W. J. Reid. The repairs specified in such schedule were all decorative repairs of a usual character such as painting and re-papering. It was held by the learned county court judge and agreed before us that the D    landlord could rely only on the covenant to deliver up in repair, as no notice under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (1), had been given with respect to any breach of the covenant to keep in repair. It was, however, not in dispute that the tenant had broken both covenants, and the extent of the landlord's claim was, so far as we can see, precisely the same, whether it was founded on both covenants or only on the covenant to deliver up in repair.

E    At the trial evidence was given for the landlord by the landlord himself and by Mr. Reid. The landlord gave evidence substantially to the effect that, on the tenant vacating, he inspected the rooms, found them in a bad state of repair, decided to have the whole place re-decorated, and instructed Mr. Reid to prepare a specification and do the work. In cross-examination he said that he had let the top floor (by which, we were told, he meant the first floor referred to in the F    tenancy agreement) furnished at £3 per week, having had it decorated from top to bottom. He also said that he understood that the tenant had to leave the premises "in habitable condition so that anyone could move in." Mr. Reid gave evidence substantially to the effect that, when the tenant vacated, the place was dirty; that the rooms, apparently, had not been re-decorated for at least ten to twelve years; that all the work in his schedule had been carried G    out; and that he had been paid £50 generally on account—as had already been mentioned by the landlord. It was put to him in cross-examination that £42 would be a fair price for all the work in his schedule, but he denied this. Neither of these witnesses dealt with the question of damage to the reversion, nor was the point put to either of them in cross-examination. It was conceded by counsel for the landlord that the top landing and stair well, repairs to which H    amounting to £21 had been included in Mr. Reid's schedule, were not within the covenant, and this had the effect of reducing the landlord's claim to £50 15s. 6d.

In opening his case counsel for the tenant submitted that, as there was no damage to the reversion, the landlord could only recover nominal damages in view of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18 (1). The only witness called for the tenant was Mr. Harcourt Batty, a surveyor. He put the cost of the repairs required to comply with the covenant at £42, or £32 without the top landing and stairway. He placed the following values on the premises: "Value of whole premises with a sitting tenant in one part" (meaning, presumably, the part which had been comprised in the tenancy) "—£2,250. Value of part occupied by tenant—£1,500. Value with complete vacant possession—£3,000." He expressed the view that the repairs in question, which were purely decorative, would not affect the value of the premises. In cross-examination he admitted that "the price would be affected by structural and, if very bad, decorative condition." In re-examination he expressed the view that the "letting value" was not "affected by the state of decorative repair in this case."

In his judgment the learned county court judge, after stating the nature of the claim, continued as follows:

"There was no question but that when the premises were handed over the covenants had not been complied with. There is evidence that apparently nothing was done to them for a period of from ten to twelve years. The only covenant in question is that to deliver up the premises in repair. The landlord cannot pray in aid the covenant to keep in repair. He gave no notice under s. 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. The defendant relied on Landeau v. Marchbank (1). No evidence was given by the landlord of any damage to the reversion. The case referred to is an authority for the proposition put forward by the tenant that the measure of damages must not exceed damage to the reversion, if any. Neither the landlord nor the witness Reid had addressed their minds to it and no expert was called (except by the tenant who called in Batty, who said that in this particular case there was no damage to the reversion, but only small, purely decorative, repair) and to that extent I am in agreement with counsel for the tenant that there was no evidence of damage to the reversion. But I do feel that, though the evidence by the landlord was not given with that in mind, in this particular case there must be some damage to the reversion. If the landlord had taken possession of the premises himself, there would clearly be some damage. He would have to do the work himself or keep the premises in a bad state. If he did not do anything to the premises, they would deteriorate. There is abundant evidence that the reversion was damaged. In Landeau v. Marchbank (1) LYNSEY, J., said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 175: 'It must depend on the circumstances.' I am satisfied there is damage to the reversion and the damage will be the proper cost of repair. In HILL'S COMPLETE LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT, 9th ed., p. 681, (damages for breach of repairing covenants),* Joyner v. Weeks (2) is still relied on. The measure of damages is still as it was in Joyner v. Weeks (2). Mr. Batty is qualified to assess the amount of the cost of repairs. He was under a disadvantage in that he did not see the premises before the work was done. I accept his approach to the assessment . . . His figure for the whole is £42. As to Mr. Reid's evidence, I feel that the whole house was being done up from top to bottom. I give judgment for the landlord for £36, costs on Scale B, and the £10 in court to be paid out."

The statement in the earlier part of the judgment that "no evidence was given by the landlord of any damage to the reversion," read literally and out of its context, seems at first sight inconsistent with a decision in the landlord's favour. But it is plain from what follows that the learned county court judge meant by this, not that there was no evidence on which damage to the reversion could be held to have been proved, but only that the evidence for the landlord did not deal in so many words with the question of damage to the reversion. It was forcibly contended before us by counsel for the tenant that there was no evidence that the reversion had been damaged to the extent of

* See now HILL AND REDMAN'S LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT, 10th ed., p. 739.

£36 or at all by the want of repair; that the evidence on which the learned county court judge held that the proper cost of putting the premises in repair was £36 was not even prima facie evidence of damage to the reversion to that or any amount; and that the only evidence before him directed to the question of damage to the reversion was the evidence of Mr. Batty to the effect that there was no such damage. Counsel for the tenant, accordingly, submitted that in view of s. 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, the learned county court judge's decision was wrong in law as the landlord had wholly failed to prove his right to any recoverable damages.

In support of his contention counsel for the tenant cited a number of authorities to which we should next briefly refer. In Hanson v. Newman (3), an action had been brought in 1932 for possession of the premises comprised in a lease for a term expiring in 1938, for breach of the repairing covenants therein contained. The plaintiff had recovered judgment in default of defence for possession and damages to be assessed by a master. The proceeding before the court was an appeal by the defendant from the master's assessment of the damages and the question in issue was whether the master, who had assessed the damages in accordance with the terms of s. 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, at the sum found by him to represent the amount by which the reversion in possession at the date of the forfeiture of the lease (i.e., the date of the writ) had been diminished by the defendant's breaches of covenant, ought to have allowed a claim by the defendant to set off against the amount so assessed the difference between the value of the reversion in possession at the date of the forfeiture and its value at the same date as a reversion expectant on the expiration of the term in 1938. LUXMOORE, J., and the Court of Appeal held that there could be no such set-off. LUXMOORE, J., in the course of his judgment, said ([1934] Ch. 300):

"Under the law before the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, was passed, a landlord could recover by way of damage at the termination of his term the actual cost of executing the repairs required to fulfil the covenant. The Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, has not changed the law in that respect; all that it has done is to impose a limit on the amount of those damages. The material section to be considered is s. 18 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927."

His Lordship read s. 18 (1) and went on to discuss what was meant in the section by the phrase "reversion (whether immediate or not)," concluding (ibid., 302) that the word "reversion" was used "as referring, in the case where the lease has terminated, to the land which has reverted." He then said this (ibid.) about the effect of the section on the amount of damages recoverable:

"What the section provides for is that the damages for breach of covenant on the termination of a lease are not to exceed the amount by which the value of the reversion, whether immediate or not, in the premises is diminished owing to the breach of such covenant or agreement; that is, you take the value of the reversion as it is with the breach—the value of the property which has reverted as it is subject to the breach—and you take it as it would be if there were no breach, and you provide that the amount of damage shall not exceed the amount by which the value of the property repaired exceeds the value of the property unrepaired."

In the Court of Appeal LAWRENCE, L.J., and ROMER, L.J., both expressed full approval of the judgment of LUXMOORE, J., and LAWRENCE, L.J., in particular, adopted the passage to which we have just referred, quoting it at length and saying ([1934] Ch. 305) that he could not "express it better."

In Salisbury (Marquis) v. Gilmore (4), premises in New Bond Street had been let to the defendant for a term of fourteen years from Sept. 29, 1925. The tenant had asked for a new lease in 1937, but was then informed that the plaintiff landlords intended to pull the premises down (which intention would have been an answer to any claim by the tenant for a new lease under s. 5 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, and prima facie a defence under s. 18 (1) to any claim against the tenant for damages for non-repair at the termination of the lease). In 1939 the tenant vacated the premises and left them out of repair, being still under the impression that they were to be pulled down. Thereafter, the plaintiffs, having, as they said, abandoned their intention to pull down the premises, claimed damages for breach of the covenants to repair. The evidence showed that the plaintiffs had not abandoned their intention to pull down the premises until a date after the termination of the tenancy. The actual question in the case was not concerned with the quantum of damages recoverable under s. 18 (1), but was simply whether, in the circumstances which we have stated, the defendants were not precluded by the latter part of the sub-section from recovering any damages at all, and the Court of Appeal (reversing the decision of HILBERY, J.), held that they were so precluded. But MACKINNON, L.J., in the course of his judgment, did, in fact, deal with the necessity of proof of damage to the reversion under s. 18 (1), and expressed the view that there was no evidence at the trial of any diminution in the value of the reversion by reason of any breach of covenant to repair or yield up in repair. Counsel for the tenant in the case before us relied on the following passage in the judgment of MACKINNON, L.J. ([1942] 1 All E.R. 462):

"The only evidence as to breach was under (b), the covenant to deliver up in repair, upon a survey and schedule of dilapidations made after such delivery up. As to the effect of this breach on the value of the reversion, the first surveyor could only say that the depreciation was 'the cost of doing the repairs,' but on cross-examination, said: 'I am not in a position to answer' (as to the depreciation) 'because it is a question of the value of the premises, and as a surveyor assessing dilapidations, I was only concerned with the cost of making the repairs.' The other surveyor, on being asked what was the depreciation, answered, 'I think the cost of the work is the only possible criterion.' He also said, in cross-examination, that the only real value of the premises was the site value, and 'you would get as much for the site as for the site with the building on it.' On this I am clear that the judge was wrong in that passage of his judgment in which he says ([1941] 2 All E.R. 821): 'I accept the evidence of the plaintiffs' witnesses . . . I am satisfied that the cost of making good the want of repair is, as nearly as it can be assessed, the same as the diminution in the value of the reversion resulting from the breaches of covenant to yield up in repair . . . ' There was no evidence of any diminution of value in the reversion, and the judgment, if given for the plaintiff, should have been for nominal damages only."

Portman v. Latta (5) concerned premises let as a residence in 1921 under a lease which was terminated in 1940, and CROOM-JOHNSON, J., found on the facts that at the latter date they were unlettable as a private residence, but that it would not be in accordance with good estate management to pull them down and that they might be used as premises for institutions, etc. In dealing with the amount of damages recoverable under s. 18 (1) in these circumstances, the learned judge rejected the evidence of certain expert witnesses to the effect that the cost of the repairs was necessarily the amount by which the value of the reversion had been diminished, and assessed the damages by reference to the difference between the value of the property repaired and its value unrepaired.

Lastly, in Landeau v. Marchbank (1), a case in which on the determination of a lease the premises had been sold at an admittedly good price for conversion into two flats and two maisonettes, LYNSKEY, J., rejected a calculation of damages based on the cost of effecting repairs in accordance with the covenants less the cost of those rendered valueless by the contemplated conversion, and held that there was no evidence of any diminution in the value of the reversion, and that the plaintiff was entitled to nominal damages only. Counsel for the tenant in the case before us relied, in particular, on a passage ([1949] 2 All E.R. 175) in which the learned judge expressed the view that "the fact that repairs are necessary is not in itself even prima facie evidence of damage to the value of the reversion." With the passage just quoted, as a general proposition, we are unable to agree. We find nothing in the earlier authorities to justify the conclusion as a matter of law that in no case and in no circumstances can the fact that repairs are necessary, and the cost of those repairs, be taken as at least prima facie evidence of damage to the value of the reversion and of the extent of such damage. There must be many cases in which it is, in fact, quite obvious that the value of the reversion has, by reason of a tenant's failure to do some necessary repair, been damaged precisely to the extent of the proper cost of effecting the repair in question. Nor do we understand the learned lords justices in Hanson v. Newman (3) as purporting to lay down an invariable rule of law to the effect that in all cases and in all circumstances the procedure of placing values on the reversion repaired and the reversion unrepaired, and ascertaining the difference, must necessarily be gone through in order to ascertain the diminution in the value of the reversion attributable to the want of repair. Nor do we regard MACKINNON, L.J., in Salisbury (Marquis) v. Gilmore (4) as intending to do anything more than to hold that, on the evidence tendered by the plaintiffs in that particular case, the cost of effecting the repairs could not be regarded as any index of the diminution (if any) in the value of the reversion which the want of repair had occasioned.

In the present case the "reversion" for the purposes of s. 18 (1) consists simply of the four first floor rooms and one ground floor room formerly comprised in the tenancy, i.e., not a whole house but merely a set of rooms in a house: see Hanson v. Newman (3). The matter is thus uncomplicated by any question of site value, such as materially affected the evidence regarding the New Bond Street premises in Salisbury (Marquis) v. Gilmore (4). Nor is there here any question of change of user (as in Portman v. Latta (5)), or of sale and physical alteration (as in Landeau v. Marchbank (1)). In the present case the landlord, having resumed possession of five rooms in his house which had been let for residential purposes, and intending to use or re-let them for residential purposes, found that through the tenant's breach of covenant it was necessary for him to do certain repairs to the rooms, in order to put them in what he considered a fit state for occupation or re-letting for residential purposes, and, accordingly, he spent money on effecting those repairs, which he would not have had to spend if the covenant had been duly performed. In such a case, if there is evidence that the repairs done, being repairs within the covenant, were no more than were reasonably necessary to make the rooms fit for occupation or re-letting for residential purposes, we fail to see why the proper cost of those repairs should not be regarded, prima facie, as representing a diminution in the value of the reversion due to the tenant's breach of covenant, being money which the landlord, acting as an ordinary prudent owner, had to spend on the property owing to the breach, and would not have had to spend but for the breach.

That the repairs here in question were within the covenant is not in dispute. There was clearly evidence on which the learned county court judge could find, and we think it is plain from his judgment that he intended to find, that the £36 at which he assessed the damages represented the proper cost of repairs, within the covenant, which were reasonably necessary to make the five rooms fit for occupation or re-letting according to ordinary standards. The sum of £36 is certainly on the face of it a moderate estimate of the cost to be expected in these days of reasonably necessary decorative repairs to five rooms which have had nothing done to them for ten to twelve years. Mr. Batty's evidence as to the capital values of the whole house and of the part let to the tenant seems to us to be beside the point. There could be no question as a practical matter of a sale of the five rooms let to the tenant (which, as we have said above, constitute the reversion) separately from the rest of the house. Mr. Batty's intention presumably was to show that there was no diminution in the value of the reversion according to the calculation prescribed in Hanson v. Newman (3). That calculation is, no doubt, the right criterion to apply in many, if not most, cases, and we do not for a moment intend to cast any doubt on its validity as a measure of the damages recoverable under s. 18 (1) in cases to which it is appropriate. But we certainly deprecate its introduction as a sine qua non into all cases, including a small and simple case like the present, concerned with a letting of some of the rooms in a house, where it becomes a purely hypothetical calculation wholly removed from the practical realities of the matter. Nor do we think that the learned county court judge was necessarily bound to accept Mr. Batty's assertion in re-examination to the effect that the want of repair did not affect the letting value of the premises, if he was satisfied on the evidence as a whole, as we think he clearly was, that the repairs of which he assessed the proper cost at £36 were reasonably necessary to make the five rooms fit, according to ordinary standards, for occupation or re-letting for residential purposes.

We think that the judgment is open to criticism where it states that: "... in HILL'S COMPLETE LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT, p. 681 ... Joyner v. Weeks (2) is still relied on," and that: "The measure of damages is still as it was in Joyner v. Weeks (2)." This is only true in the sense that up to the limit imposed by s. 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (i.e., the amount (if any) by which the value of the reversion has been diminished) the measure of damages for breach of a repairing covenant is still the cost of executing the repairs required to fulfil the covenant: see Hanson v. Newman (3); and in HILL'S COMPLETE LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT, 9th ed., p. 681, Joyner v. Weeks (2) is actually only cited in treating of the law as it stood before the Act of 1927. This criticism does not, however, affect the result, as it is clear from the rest of the judgment that the learned county court judge did, in fact, apply the test of damage to the value of the reversion, and held that such damage amounted to £36. For the reasons above stated we are of opinion that in the circumstances of the present case there was evidence on which the learned county court judge could so hold, and that he committed no error of law in doing so. We would, accordingly, dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: E. E. Pugh (for the tenant); Hardman, Phillips & Mann (for the landlord).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

---

MORLEYS (BIRMINGHAM) LTD. v. SLATER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (SIR Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell, L.J., and Hodson, J.), January 24, 1950.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—House rendered uninhabitable by bomb—No loss of identity—Use by tenant for business purposes—Notice to quit served before repair.

A The landlords let premises to a tenant on a monthly tenancy partly for use as a dwelling-house and partly for business purposes. In November, 1940, the premises were damaged by enemy action and became uninhabitable, but the tenant was able, and continued, to use them for the purposes of his business. The landlords gave the tenant a notice in writing to quit the premises expiring on July 1, 1949, and now claimed possession.

B
C HELD: the premises were originally let as a dwelling-house within the Rent Acts; they remained the same identifiable premises; the fact that owing to the damage the tenant was prevented from living in the premises did not change the character of the letting; and, therefore, at the date of the expiration of the notice to quit the premises were still let as a dwelling-house and the tenant was entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts.

Ellis & Sons Amalgamated Properties, Ltd. v. Sisman ([1948] 1 All E.R. 44), applied and dictum therein of TUCKER, L.J., (ibid., 47), explained.

D [AS TO RESTRICTIONS ON THE LANDLORD'S RIGHT TO POSSESSION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 329-335, paras. 392-401; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 31, pp. 576-584, Nos. 7256-7330.]

Case referred to:

(1) Ellis & Sons Amalgamated Properties, Ltd. v. Sisman, [1948] 1 All E.R. 44; [1948] 1 K.B. 653; [1948] L.J.R. 929; 2nd Digest Supp.

E APPEAL by the landlords from an order of His Honour JUDGE FORBES, sitting at Birmingham County Court, dated Sept. 22, 1949, dismissing their action for possession. The county court judge held that the tenant of premises originally let as a dwelling-house within the Rent Acts remained a protected tenant, although, at the date of the expiration of the notice to quit delivered by the landlords, he was able, by reason of war damage to the premises, to use them only for business purposes. The Court of Appeal now affirmed the decision of the county court judge. The relevant facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.

Lincoln, K.C., and Grove for the landlords.

G. Green for the tenant.

G SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This case has raised a point of some novelty and of no little difficulty. I think I have felt more doubt about it during the argument than have my brethren, but on the whole I have come to the conclusion that we ought not to disturb the finding of the county court judge.

H By the particulars of claim the landlords alleged that they were entitled to premises described as 202 and 203 Darwin Street, Birmingham, which were let to the defendant on a monthly tenancy at the monthly rent of £3 9s. 4d., "which said tenancy was duly determined by notice in writing to quit" expiring on July 1, 1949. In his defence the tenant said:

"I dispute the plaintiff's claim because the premises were, until damaged by enemy action in 1941, partly dwelling-house and partly business premises and the tenancies thereof were controlled by the Rent Restrictions Acts. I, therefore, claim protection of the said Acts."

No one reading the particulars of claim would guess that the argument which underlay the landlords' claim was that, as the result of bomb damage, the premises had ceased for the purposes of the Acts to be let as a dwelling-house on July 1, 1949. It appears from the particulars of claim that at one time the defendant was the tenant of the two houses, Nos. 202 and 203, but on this appeal we are only concerned with No. 203. The tenant appears to have granted a sub-tenancy of No. 202, the county court judge made an order for possession of that house, and there is no appeal about it. A

Before I refer to the evidence and the judgment, it will be appropriate to state the point which now emerges. The premises were damaged by enemy action in November, 1940, and, as the result of that damage, now over nine years old, they became and are still uninhabitable. That is, of course, a word of somewhat elastic import, but I think it should be understood here as meaning that they are not capable of being occupied and used in the ordinary sense of the term for living quarters. As a result, says counsel for the landlords (and he founds himself in large measure on the decision of this court in Ellis & Sons Amalgamated Properties, Ltd. v. Sisman (1)) the necessary condition to enable a tenant to invoke the Act has not been fulfilled because the premises have ceased to be let as a dwelling-house. The tenant, however, is still in occupation of the premises, and the evidence is that he uses them now for his business as a rag and bone merchant whereas formerly he used the premises in part as his home and residence and partly for his business. He now occupies a room in the premises for office work and uses the yard and other land for his business. There was indicated by counsel for the landlords as a subsidiary argument that the nature of the user had so changed that at the relevant date, namely, at the date of the expiry of the notice to quit, the premises were let, not as a dwelling-house, but as business premises and as such were excluded from the Rent Acts. B C D

The general question, which is of some interest and as I said of some novelty, may be stated thus. Where premises have been damaged by bombs and rendered uninhabitable in the sense in which I have defined the word, is the result that the tenant, who has had to go and live somewhere else, on the termination of his contractual tenancy deprived of his right to claim the benefit of the Rent Acts by reason only of those facts? The evidence, to which I will now turn, consisted, first, of the testimony of the managing director of the landlords who stated, so far as is relevant, simply: "Want possession for business. Yard, building not habitable. May have been old house. Tenant uses as store." The tenant stated that he lived at these premises until November, 1940: E F

"Bombed. I moved out. After bombing, arranged reduced rent. Wish to go back and live there . . . I repaired inside. No agreement. Landlords did outside [which counsel for the tenant said referred to the original demise of the premises made in 1936]. I made no claim on War Damage Commission. I had asked to go back in 1940. Roof on. I had agreed with builder to repair last July . . . Always wished to go back." G

The note of the judgment is:

"I found that No. 203 Darwin Street was let to the tenant as a dwelling-house, that he lived there with his family until November, 1940, when the building was damaged by bombs, that the tenant then moved out of the house, and that he was waiting to return at such time as the premises should be repaired and to occupy them with his family. I, therefore, held that his tenancy of No. 203 was protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts." H

In my judgment, the proper test in cases of this kind is whether the house as such can be said substantially to have ceased to exist. There was here a contract whereby the premises were let to the tenant. Undoubtedly, on the evidence, when the letting was effected, they were let to him as a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Act. It was argued by counsel for the landlords that because the premises were uninhabitable and in fact were uninhabited when the notice to quit expired it followed that they were not then let as a dwelling-house to the tenant. He founds himself to some extent for that proposition on the Ellis case (1), but, if counsel's proposition be true, then what is the answer to the question posed by SOMERVELL, L.J., during the argument, viz.: For what purpose were they let at that date? One can imagine, if habitability be the test, a case in which a house is rendered temporarily uninhabitable by the flooding of the ground floor by inundation from a river. Until the water has been pumped out and the house dried, it would, in fact, be uninhabitable. Could it be said, if the landlord in such circumstances gave notice to terminate the tenancy, that the tenant was deprived of his right to claim protection because at the date of the termination of the notice the premises were not in fact "let to him as a dwelling-house"? It would seem a very surprising thing if an affirmative answer had to be given to that question, and it would, I think, be very surprising if a tenant, who had to be evacuated because his house was damaged by enemy action and to whom notice to quit was given before repairs were done, was deprived of his right to claim protection under the Acts. As I have already said, for my part I think the test should be (and this I believe to be borne out by the authorities) whether at the relevant date it can be said that the dwelling-house which is the subject-matter of the original contract has as such ceased to exist either because it has been wholly demolished and has disappeared or because it has been converted into something else, for example, into business premises. In this case I think the learned judge's judgment must be taken to have amounted to a finding that the premises had not ceased to exist, and I think there is ample evidence to support that view. The roof was still on, and the tenant was using it for some purpose.

Without going through the cases, I think their effect is correctly summarised in Mr. R. E. Megarry's book on the RENT ACTS, 4th ed., p. 83. He there says:

"... the restrictions of the Acts do not inhere in the land after the demolition of the dwelling-house but remain only so long as it is there."

He also says in his note referring to the Ellis case (ibid.):

"It seems pretty clear that the statutory tenancy perishes with the dwelling-house ..."

That is a matter which we are not called on to decide, but the argument founded on the cases appears to me to be that the test is whether the house which was the subject of the original tenancy has ceased to exist as such.

At this stage I will refer more fully to Ellis & Sons Amalgamated Properties, Ltd. v. Sisman (1), because at first reading it would appear that certain observations of TUCKER, L.J., on which counsel for the landlords relied, lend support to the view for which he was contending, namely, that the question of habitability or habitation was in fact the test. The facts of that case were that the house in question was damaged, though by no means destroyed, by enemy action in 1941. At a later stage the landlord, in collaboration with the war damage authorities, pulled down completely the remains of the original structure, cleared the site, and erected on the site a new house with new material though in all respects similar to the house which had been originally damaged. Throughout all this period the contractual tenancy continued to subsist, but before the new house was completed ready for habitation, by proper notice to quit the landlord terminated the contractual tenancy. The tenant then claimed to be entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts in respect of the new edifice. As I think is made quite plain from an earlier part of the judgment of TUCKER, L.J. ([1948] 1 All E.R. 46), it is vital to his conclusion that the old dwelling-house had passed completely away, not by the explosion of the bomb but as a result of the subsequent demolition, and had been replaced by an entirely new house, and, further, that during his contractual tenancy the tenant had never occupied as his dwelling that new house and so could not say that that new house had ever been let to him as a separate dwelling. It was not, in fact, used by him or let to him as such at the material date. In the light of those facts must be read the following passages in TUCKER, L.J.'s judgment (ibid., 47):

"It is true that in several cases it has been pointed out that a tenant does not lose the benefit of the Acts merely because in the course of his business or occupation he may be absent from the premises for long periods, but the house must be one which is being used by the tenant as a dwelling-house. In the present case it seems to me impossible to say, on the uncontradicted evidence and on the judge's finding, that on June 21, 1947, [the date of the expiration of the notice to quit] this was a house which was let as a separate dwelling. It was not completed or fit for habitation, the windows were not in, and it was, in my view, not only not being used as a dwelling-house, but it was not fit for or capable of user as a dwelling-house at the material date."

At first sight, as I stated earlier, those phrases may appear to support the proposition that habitability at the relevant date was the test, but when they are examined in relation to the earlier reasoning and the facts it is clear that that is not so and that the basis of the decision was the total disappearance of the original subject-matter of the contract and the fact that the new house had never at any material date reached the condition when the tenant could declare: "This house was occupied as my home by me." The phrase which most points in the direction of the argument of counsel for the landlords is, of course, "but the house must be one which is being used by the tenant as a dwelling-house." But, again, I do not think that the learned lord justice meant that, at the date when the Acts applied, it must be shown that there was user or even the possibility of user of the house as a dwelling-house by the tenant. If the language had that meaning, it was obviously, I think, unnecessary for the purposes of the decision, and I venture, with all respect, to think that it was stating the matter somewhat too broadly.

For the reasons which I have given I think it would be wrong to hold that, where there has arisen, whether by enemy action, flood or fire, a state of things in which a house cannot be inhabited in the ordinary sense of the word at the point of time when the contractual tenancy ended and it is not so occupied, that is conclusive against the tenant's invocation of the Rent Acts. COHEN, L.J., in the Ellis case (1) says (ibid., 48):

"I entirely agree with my Lord that in the present case the evidence clearly establishes that at the material date, when the notice to determine the tenancy expired, there was no house fit for occupation on the premises. That being so, I do not think that it was possible for the tenant to establish a claim to remain on as statutory tenant."

But COHEN, L.J., says also (ibid.):

"I think the only possible inference from the evidence is that the house comprised in the original tenancy . . . ceased to exist as a house . . ."

I, therefore, think that Ellis & Sons Amalgamated Properties, Ltd. v. Sisman (1) is not an authority for the view which counsel for the landlords contended for in his argument.

There remains the question put somewhat tentatively by him: Can it be said on the facts as found that there was here a change from the original user as a dwelling-house to user for business purposes? I think, again, it would be dangerous to suggest that some temporary arrangement for the use of what remained for purposes such as storing belongings would have so far-reaching an effect. On the other hand, equally it may be possible that a new bargain is made which does not contemplate the restoration of the dwelling-house or its use as a dwelling-house. Those, however, are matters of fact and the only evidence on the matter is the one sentence: "Tenant uses as store." The learned judge has not found the facts in the landlords' favour, and, therefore, I think that there is no sufficient basis for that suggestion. As I said earlier, the case is not wholly satisfactory. A long period has elapsed since the bomb struck these premises, and there is no evidence which indicates what is likely, or, indeed, possible, to be done about them. The landlord may or may not be under an obligation to restore them. The tenant may or may not be entitled to do so if he so desires or is able to do so. There may or may not be some restrictions which may be material on the matter. On none of those questions is there any material before us, but in deciding that the county court judge's judgment be undisturbed I am not pre-judging any subsequent application that the landlord may be entitled to make according as events turn out in the future, and according as these premises become or do not become available for occupation for any particular purpose. Suffice it for the moment to say that I think the learned judge was entitled to find on the evidence that this house remained substantially the same identifiable edifice. It was originally let as a dwelling-house, and I am not prepared to hold that at the material date it ceased to be so let within the meaning of the Acts. That being so, and the tenant being, in fact, in possession of it, I see no ground for disturbing the learned judge's conclusion that he is entitled to claim the aid of the Rent Acts. For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree.

HODSON, J: I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Beckingsales, agents for Joseph Cohen & Cowen, Birmingham (for the landlords); Sweepstones, agents for Parkhouse & Allee, Birmingham (for the tenant).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

R v. REYNOLDS.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Morris, JJ.), January 23, 1950.]

Criminal Law—Evidence—Child—Ability to understand nature of oath—Evidence of school attendance officer—Evidence given in absence of jury—Children and Young Persons Act, 1933 (c. 12), s. 38 (1).

On the trial of the appellant for an indecent assault on a child aged eleven years who was attending a school for mentally retarded children the question arose under the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, s. 38 (1), whether the child understood the nature of an oath or whether she was possessed of sufficient intelligence to justify the reception of her unsworn evidence. The chairman of quarter sessions ordered the jury to retire and evidence about the child was then given by a school attendance officer.

HELD: the evidence should have been given in the presence of the jury, and, as this was not done, the conviction must be quashed.

R. v. Dunne (1929) (143 L.T. 120), applied.

[AS TO THE EVIDENCE OF CHILDREN IN CRIMINAL TRIALS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, pp. 220-222, paras. 307 and 308; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 14, pp. 453-456, Nos. 4806-4825, and Digest Supp.]

Case referred to:

- (1) R. v. Dunne, (1929), 99 L.J.K.B. 117; 143 L.T. 120; 21 Cr. App. Rep. 176; Digest Supp.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant was convicted at Hertfordshire Quarter Sessions of indecent assault on a child. Evidence was given, in the absence of the jury, as to the child's fitness to give evidence on oath. The court held this to be such an irregularity that the conviction could not stand. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Rees-Davies for the appellant.

Pensotti for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant was convicted at the Hertfordshire Quarter Sessions of indecent assault on a child, and he appeals against conviction.

During the trial the question arose whether the child should be sworn as a witness or whether her unsworn evidence should be received in accordance with the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, s. 38 (1). The further question was then raised by the clerk of the peace whether or not the investigation of this matter should be conducted in the presence of the jury. After some discussion the chairman said:

"The question whether the child is capable of taking the oath or not is entirely a question for me. If counsel says he wishes to make submissions to me, I am pleased to hear what they are. What I shall do about them is another matter. The only question at the moment is whether these submissions should be made in the absence of the jury. I think perhaps that would be the better course. Members of the jury, I do not know what is coming. It may be that it is something you should not hear until after the case. Therefore, I must ask you to retire."

Evidently the clerk of the peace, in putting the question: "Do wish the jury to be here?", was thinking of the practice which always obtains in the courts where there is a discussion whether a confession is admissible or whether it has been obtained by methods which would render it inadmissible. In such circumstances the jury are always told to retire because in the course of adducing evidence to prove the circumstances in which the confession has been obtained, it is almost impossible to prevent the terms of the confession being disclosed, and the whole question at that stage is whether or not the confession can go before the jury. Therefore, the jury is out of court while that is argued so that they cannot hear the terms of the confession which may afterwards be held not to be admissible. In the present case the state of affairs was entirely different. After the jury had retired the school attendance officer, who knew the school to which the child had been sent, was called. It is a school, not for mentally deficient children, but for mentally retarded children. This child came from a somewhat squalid home and her degree of education was below the average for a child of her age, which was twelve at the time of the trial. She was eleven at the time of the assault. The school officer was called, and he gave evidence and was cross-examined. The evidence takes some three or four pages of the shorthand note. All that was done in the absence of the jury, and, in our view, that was such an irregularity that this conviction cannot be allowed to stand.

What did the chairman have to decide? By the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, s. 38 (1):

"Where, in any proceedings against any person for any offence, any child of tender years called as a witness does not in the opinion of the court understand the nature of an oath, his evidence may be received, though not given upon oath, if, in the opinion of the court, he is possessed of sufficient intelligence to justify the reception of the evidence, and understands the duty of speaking the truth . . . ”

So, when a child is put into the witness-box, the chairman or presiding judge has to decide, first, whether, in his opinion, the child understands the nature of the oath, and, then, if that question is decided in the negative, whether he is possessed of sufficient intelligence to justify his unsworn evidence being received on the ground that he understands the duty of speaking the truth.

In R. v. Dunne (1), a child of seven was put into the box to be examined on a charge of incest, and the judge had her taken to his room so that he could talk to her and examine her to see whether she understood the nature of an oath. She afterwards gave evidence, but this court quashed the conviction and LORD HEWART, C.J., said (143 L.T. 121):

“ It goes without saying that what the judge did in that matter was suggested purely by feelings of kindness and consideration for the youthful witness. The question for this court is, can a conviction stand after an incident of that kind has occurred? It is admittedly an incident without parallel. Admittedly, nobody in this court, either from his own experience or from researches into the authorities, can adduce any parallel case. In the result, something was said to or by this witness which was not in the hearing or presence of the jury or of the accused. The court is clearly of opinion that, in these circumstances, the appeal must be allowed and the conviction quashed.”

No member of this court has ever known of a case in which a witness has been called to inform the court whether or not a child is fit to give evidence. I am not saying that there may not be cases—perhaps this is one—in which the judge or chairman may want some such assistance, especially if he hears that the child is at a particular sort of school. It is not on that ground that the court thinks that there has been a fatal mistake here. The reason why the court decided in R. v. Dunne (1) that the evidence of the child must be given in the presence of the jury was because, although the duty of deciding whether the child may be sworn or not lies on the judge and is not a matter for the jury, it is most important that the jury should hear the answers which the child gives and see her demeanour when she is questioned by the court, for that enables them to come to a conclusion as to what weight they should attach to her evidence. If that be the reason why the court in R. v. Dunne (1) held that it was essential that the evidence should be given in the presence of the jury, it is a fortiori so, it seems to me, when some witness is called to assist the court by relating his experience of the child and the impression he may have formed of her. The jury then would have all the facts before them with regard to the child's truthfulness or reputation for truthfulness and all the information showing whether the child was a witness on whose evidence they could rely. It should be regarded as most exceptional that any evidence should be given in a criminal trial not in the presence of the jury. As I have said, there is one well known exception, an exception which has been laid down in mercy and fairness to prisoners, viz., that evidence on the question whether a confession was properly made ought to be given in the absence of the jury. The class of evidence referred to in this case ought to be given in the presence of the jury in open court. For these reasons we have come to the conclusion that this conviction must be quashed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Cartwright, Cunningham & Co. (for the appellant); Hartley & Hine, Hitchin, Herts (for the Crown).

[Reported by H. McL. MORRISON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re PRICE (deceased). WASLEY v. PRICE AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), January 26, 1950.]

Will—Gift of “all my belongings”—Exclusion of real property.

By a home-made will, dated Aug. 9, 1946, a testator who died on Oct. 21, 1948, provided: “I . . . leave all my belongings to my daughter I.M.P. to my wife furniture to do as she like all my belongings to bee [sic] sold within eight weeks of my death and the money to bee [sic] invested and to draw the interested [sic] up to my daughter I.M.P. is twenty-five years of age then to do as she please. If she die before that age twenty-five years I leave to my too [sic] sisters . . . all my belongings.” The testator was survived by his wife and I.M.P., who was an infant at the date of the testator's death, and his estate consisted of cash at a bank, a funeral benefit, live and dead farming stock, income tax post war credits, and a freehold cottage.

HELD: the word “belongings” was not, in common usage, an apt expression in relation to real property, and, as there was nothing in the will or in the circumstances to indicate the contrary, in this case it did not include the freehold cottage.

[AS TO DESCRIPTIONS OF PROPERTY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 261-265, paras. 312, 313; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 742-746, Nos. 5990-6036.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Bradfield, [1914] W.N. 423; 44 Digest 722, 5722.
- (2) Re Mills' Will Trusts, [1937] 1 All E.R. 142; 106 L.J.Ch. 159; 156 L.T. 190; Digest Supp.
- (3) Re Edwards, [1906] 1 Ch. 570; 75 L.J.Ch. 321; 94 L.T. 593; 44 Digest 578, 3979.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the testator's will, the expression “all my belongings” therein included the testator's freehold cottage. ROMER, J., held that the cottage was not included. The facts appear in the judgment.

R. S. Lazarus for the plaintiff, one of the administrators of the testator's estate, and for defendants other than the testator's widow.

Beswick for the widow.

ROMER, J.: This case raises a question of some little difficulty under the home-made will of Henry William Price, who died on Oct. 21, 1948, having made his will on Aug. 9, 1946. The will is written on a printed form, but the testator took no notice of the printed parts. The printed matter is as follows:

“This is the last will and testament of me———of———in the county of———made this———day of———one thousand nine hundred and———and I hereby revoke all former wills and testamentary dispositions of any kind at any time heretofore made by me and I appoint——— of——— and——— of——— (hereinafter called ‘my trustees’) to be the executors and trustees of this my will I give and bequeath.”

At that point the testator launches out into making his own testamentary disposition which, being a man apparently of small education, he did in very ill-written and ill-chosen language. He provides:

“I Henry William Price of Church View Bishop's Cleeve near Cheltenham in the county of Gloustershire [sic] leave all my belongings to my daughter Iris May Price to my wife furniture to do as she like all my belongings to bee [sic] sold within eight weeks of my death and the money to bee [sic] invested and to draw the interested [sic] up to my daughter Iris May Price is twenty-five years of age then to do as she please. If she die before that age twenty-five years I leave to my too [sic] sisters Annie Marie Dobbins and Margaret Price all my belongings."

A The testator left the following estate at his death:—cash at Lloyds Bank Ltd., Cheltenham, £550 odd; funeral benefit, £17 odd; live and dead farming stock, £238 odd; income tax post war credits, £32 odd; and the freehold cottage known as "Church View" and valued at £1,500 in which he himself lived. These details appear in the affidavit of the plaintiff who goes on to say that the furniture in the cottage at the testator's death all belonged to the widow. I should, perhaps, add that, according to the affidavit, the will was proved on May 3, 1949, but I gather that a grant of administration was made on that date to the plaintiff and the widow.

B The question at issue is whether the freehold cottage passes under the gift of "all my belongings" or as on an intestacy? Counsel for the widow contends that the effect of the bequest is to pass the personal estate but nothing else. He puts the matter partly as one of construction to be determined in the light of surrounding circumstances, and partly as a matter of dictionary definition and judicial interpretation. C He says that the word "belongings" is not a word usually applied to real estate, and he has referred me to the definition of "belongings" in the SHORTER OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY. The definition there, for the present purposes, is "goods, effects." Counsel says that, if that be the proper meaning, then, as "effects" is confined to personalty, and "goods" also is confined to personalty, "belongings" should be similarly D so confined.

E Counsel for the plaintiff drew my attention to two cases which, he said, show that a wider interpretation has been given to the word "belongings" than the definition of "goods, effects" to which I have referred. The first case he cited was Re Bradfield (1), where gifts of specific chattels were followed by gifts of other chattels and "all other belongings," and that gift, in its turn, was followed by other specific bequests. The judgment of EVE, J., is very shortly reported as follows ([1914] W.N. 423):

"EVE, J., held that 'belongings' must be given its primary meaning of 'property' and 'all other belongings' covered all that the testatrix did not specifically dispose of."

F At first sight that would seem to show that EVE, J., gave a fully extended meaning to the word "belongings," but the report does not show what property the testatrix died possessed of. In particular, it does not show whether she died possessed of any real estate, but, inasmuch as the phrase which had to be construed, "all other belongings," followed a gift of personal chattels, it seems to me reasonably clear that there was not any real estate included among the G testatrix's assets because it would have been difficult to hold, having regard to the ejusdem generis rule, that "belongings" in that context should pass real estate. What, in my judgment, EVE, J., there held was that "belongings" must be given its primary meaning of "property" in the sense that "all other belongings" would cover all the testatrix's personal property that she did not H specifically dispose of. I do not, therefore, think that I can get any real assistance from that case.

In Re Mills' Will Trusts (2) the testatrix, by her will, gave to her daughter

"all my home and personal belongings except the piano and that is for my grandson . . . All insurances to go to my daughter . . ."

It was held that the words "all my home and personal belongings" were sufficient to pass the whole of the residuary estate of the testatrix. In his judgment BENNETT, J., said ([1937] 1 All E.R. 144):

"Now the word 'belongings' is wide enough to cover a testatrix's personal estate, and has been held by EVE, J., in Re Bradfield (1) to have the primary meaning of property. So, unless there is sufficient in this will to afford a context restricting the meaning of the term 'belongings,' it should be interpreted as meaning property."

That, again, is not authority for the proposition that a gift of "belongings" would pass real estate. On the other hand, counsel for the plaintiff points out that both those cases are authorities for the proposition that "belongings" means property in a wide sense, and that, therefore, in the courts the word "belongings" has received a less narrow interpretation than that which is to be found in the SHORTER OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY. Counsel from there argues that, once you go beyond the narrow meaning in the dictionary, why not go the whole way and say that it covers and includes all the property of which a person died possessed?

So much for the arguments relating to the dictionary and legal meanings of the word "belongings" in general, and the cases which have some bearing on it. We come to the contentions of counsel for the widow on the construction of the will, which, he says, shows that there is no reason to suppose that the testator was intending to deal with his house. There are, indeed, he argues, reasons to suppose the contrary. His wife survived him as also did his daughter, who was at the date of the testator's death, and is, an infant. She was thirteen or fourteen years old at the time that the will was made. Counsel for the widow says that it is apparent that the main idea in the testator's mind was to benefit his daughter, and it would be an odd way of benefiting her to deprive her of her home. I do not myself think there is a great deal of force in that contention—although it certainly has some force—because she would, instead of the house, have the proceeds of sale, and, as everybody knows, the present time or, at all events, last year, was a very favourable time for selling property. Apart from that aspect of the matter, counsel relies very much on the emphatic direction that the testator's belongings, whatever he intended those to have been, were to be sold within eight weeks of his death. He says that, although that direction might be perfectly sensible and capable of being carried out in relation to the farming stock, it would have been quite impossible to carry it out in relation to real property, more especially as the testator did not appoint anybody to be an executor of his will.

Counsel for the plaintiff says, and rightly, that EVE, J., and BENNETT, J., went further in interpreting the word "belongings" than the meaning which is to be found in the SHORTER OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY, and he says, as I have already indicated, that, that being so, we should go the whole way? He says: "Take the word 'belongings' and see what it means. All that it means is something that belongs to a person, and in common conversation it is certainly apt to say: 'Who does that house belong to?'" It is true that it is accurate to say: "Who does that house belong to?", but my view of the matter is that "belongings" has a secondary or special meaning of its own now which has removed it from the meaning which it originally had, and that, while in ordinary parlance it means property, it cannot be applied to property other than personal property. In that view I am supported by the dictionary definition, and it is a view which, I think, is not in the least at variance with the decisions of EVE, J., or BENNETT, J., to which I have referred, because in neither of those cases was the mind of the learned judge applied to real estate at all. When they said that "belongings" meant or included property, they meant—having regard to the particular matters which were falling for decision—personal property.

I, therefore, approach this will on the footing that "belongings" in its natural sense and according to the ordinary, common usage of the word, is not an apt expression to relate to real estate. Certainly there is nothing on the face of this will to lead to a contrary conclusion, because it seems to me that the direction to sell within eight weeks shows that the testator had not in mind his house at all, which was the home, not only of his daughter, but also of his wife, who was living with him at the time of his death. Apart altogether from the administration difficulties, of getting a legal personal representative appointed and selling the house within eight weeks, this direction, if carried out, would mean that his wife and daughter would have hurriedly to leave the family home and find somewhere else to live, which was at the date of the testator's death, and still is, by no means an easy thing to do. That direction for sale, however, is perfectly apt and intelligible in regard to the rest of the testator's assets, but it seems to me to be wholly inappropriate to this cottage—the family home—and it is a strong pointer, in my view, in the direction that the testator was not contemplating the inclusion of his house in the expression “all my belongings.”

I arrive at the conclusion, partly on the ordinary meaning of the word “belongings” in the English language and partly on the construction of this particular will in the light of the surrounding circumstances, that “belongings” is to be given the same meaning as it received in Re Mills' Will Trusts (2), that is to say, the residuary personal estate, but that its meaning does not extend further. The argument was advanced that the court leans against an intestacy, but, if the court finds language which it can fairly interpret and which, taking it as it stands, has only one effect, the court is not entitled, and has never been entitled, to depart from that meaning simply to avoid intestacy, which, as ROMER, L.J., once pointed out in Re Edwards (3), is something which testators may deliberately have in contemplation. For these reasons I hold that, on the true construction of the testator's will, the gift therein contained of “all my belongings” did not comprise the freehold property known as Church View, Bishops Cleeve, but that the testator died intestate so far as that freehold property was concerned. The costs as between solicitor and client of all parties will come out of the estate in due course of administration.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Waterhouse & Co., agents for Winterbotham, Gurney & Co., Cheltenham (for all parties).

[Reported by H. McL. MORRISON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

JAMES LAMONT & CO., LTD. v. HYLAND, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker and Asquith, L.JJ., and Roxburgh, J.), January 30, 1950.]

Court of Appeal—Appeal—Consent to dismissal—Consent initialled by president of court—No order drawn up or entered—Discretion of court to allow or refuse appeal to be proceeded with.

On Nov. 11, 1949, LYNSEY, J., made an order giving the plaintiffs leave to sign final judgment for the sum claimed by them from the defendants in an action on a bill of exchange. On Nov. 14 the defendants gave notice of appeal against that order. On the same day the defendants paid to the plaintiffs the sum claimed and signed a form of consent to the dismissal of their appeal. This consent was initialled by the president of the Court of Appeal, but no order dismissing the appeal was drawn up or entered. On Nov. 23 the defendants gave a fresh notice of appeal.

HELD: until an order had been drawn up and entered the appeal was not dismissed; the Court of Appeal had a discretion to allow or to refuse the appeal to be proceeded with on either a fresh or the original notice of appeal; and in the circumstances of the present case the court, in the exercise of its discretion, would allow the appeal to proceed.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Samuel, Trustee v. Kerman (No. 2), [1945] 2 All E.R. 319; [1945] Ch. 364; 114 L.J.Ch. 337; 173 L.T. 278; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Watson v. Cave (No. 2), (1881), 17 Ch.D. 23; 50 L.J.Ch. 561; 44 L.T. 117; Digest Practice 796, 3589.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of LYNSEY, J., in chambers, made on Nov. 11, 1949, giving the plaintiffs leave under R.S.C., Ord. 14, r. 1, to sign final judgment.

Counsel for the plaintiffs took the preliminary point that, a form of consent to the dismissal of the appeal having been signed by the defendants and initialled by the president of the Court of Appeal, as required by the practice direction in the notes in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1948, to R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 8, the defendants were precluded from proceeding on a fresh notice of appeal, although no order dismissing the original appeal had been made. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal to proceed.

MacKenna for the plaintiffs.

Ashe Lincoln, K.C., and Peter Bristow for the defendants.

TUCKER, L.J.: This is an appeal by the defendants from an order of LYNSEY, J., in chambers, dated Nov. 11, 1949, giving the plaintiffs leave under R.S.C., Ord. 14, r. 1, to sign final judgment for £20,575 6s. 10d. Counsel for the plaintiffs takes a preliminary point and submits that this appeal will not lie.

This was an action on a bill of exchange. The defence was that the bill was given in respect of certain shipbuilding work and that the work had been badly done. Notice of appeal from the order of Nov. 11 was given, but on Nov. 14 the defendants' solicitors wrote stating that a bankers' draft for payment of the amount of the judgment would be sent to the plaintiffs shortly, and, by letter of the same day, the defendants' solicitors sent the plaintiffs a cheque for £20,575 6s. 10d. Thereupon, the defendants consented to the dismissal of their appeal, and they signed by their solicitors the following consent: "We consent to the dismissal of the appeal herein, all parties being sui juris." That was initialled by the president of the Court of Appeal, but no order was drawn up or entered. Thereafter, the defendants changed their solicitors and on Nov. 23 they gave a fresh notice of appeal which now comes on.

The practice is stated in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1948, p. 1330, as follows:

"Where an appellant is sui juris and does not desire to prosecute an appeal, he may present a request signed by his solicitor stating that he is sui juris and asking to have the appeal dismissed, in which case (subject to the request being initialled by the president of the court) the appeal will be dismissed and struck out of the list, and an order will, if necessary, be drawn up directing payment of the costs by the appellant, such costs to be taxed in case the parties differ."

The position under this practice was considered by this court in Re Samuel, Trustee v. Kerman (No. 2) (1), the headnote to which is as follows ([1945] Ch. 364):

"Under the practice laid down in 1938 (see note to Ord. 58, r. 8, in ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1944, p. 1301) an appellant who is sui juris may submit an application to have the appeal dismissed and on this application being initialled by the president of the court the appeal will be dismissed with costs. It follows that, notwithstanding the signing by both parties of a form of consent to an appeal being abandoned, the notice of appeal remains on foot; and the court will allow the appeal to be proceeded with on this notice of appeal, unless it considers that by reason of what has happened the respondent has changed his position disadvantageously :—Quære, whether in such a case the court would allow a new notice of appeal to be given. As under the existing practice an appellant can obtain the dismissal of an appeal without securing the respondent's consent, a consent signed by both parties cannot set up any contractual relationship. Watson v. Cave (2) discussed and not followed having regard to the change in the practice."

In Samuel's case (1) a trustee in bankruptcy sought to abandon his appeal, and he obtained the respondent's consent. Subsequently, he desired to proceed with his appeal, and the matter came before the court. The document of consent never came before the president of the court to be initialled, and so the appeal was never dismissed. LORD GREENE, M.R., in his judgment, said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 321, 322):

"No order has been made dismissing the appeal: the notice is still a live notice unless there be some reason which would induce the court to say that in the circumstances the appellant should not be allowed to proceed with that notice . . . I cannot myself see how such an order could have been made. Similarly, under the present practice, once an order has been drawn up and entered, pursuant to an application by the appellant duly initialled by the president of the court to dismiss the appeal, there is an end of the appeal; and I see no means by which the court would have jurisdiction to grant leave to serve a fresh notice of appeal in respect of an appeal which ex hypothesi is dead and buried by the order dismissing it."

It is clear that the appeal is not dismissed until an order has been drawn up and entered. The signing of the consent and the initialling by the president of the court is all preliminary machinery leading up to the drawing up and entry of the order. Frequently no order is drawn up unless the taxation of costs is required, but, if an order is not drawn up and entered, a respondent may find himself in a difficulty. In the present case, the consent having been initialled by the president of this court, the matter is on the same footing as if an application had been made in open court and dealt with. The procedure of initialling these consents is merely to save time and expense, and it affords exactly the same authority to the officials who draw up the formal order as an order made in court. Accordingly, where this court has, under that procedure, in effect made an order which has not been drawn up, the court has power to refuse to allow the matter to be proceeded with by a fresh notice of appeal or by the party seeking to rely on the original notice of appeal. In some cases it would be an abuse of the practice and procedure of the court to allow a party to blow hot and cold in that way, but the matter is one which is within our discretion and unless and until an order has been drawn up and entered we can give leave to allow the matter to proceed.

The present case is an exceptional one in that the plaintiffs are in possession of the money claimed and a very short time elapsed between the consent and the defendants' change of mind. There is no suggestion that the plaintiffs have altered their position in consequence of the consent or would in any way be embarrassed by allowing this appeal to proceed. In all the circumstances and subject to questions of costs I think that we should exercise our discretion in this case by allowing the appeal to proceed.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree.

ROXBURGH, J. : I also agree.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Sydney Morse & Co. (for the plaintiffs); Torr & Co., agents for Morton, Morton & Shaw, Sunderland (for the defendants).

[Reported by C. ST.J. NICHOLSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

DEAN v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker and Asquith, L.JJ., and Roxburgh, J.), January 23, 1950.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Tenancy agreement Compensation for disturbance—Amount of compensation—Covenant by landlord to pay “for any loss or damage through disturbance”—Amount of compensation not confined to statutory limits—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923 (c. 9), s. 12 (6).

Under a written agreement the tenant held an agricultural holding for the term from Mar. 25 to Sept. 29, 1942, and “thereafter from year to year determinable by either party by one year’s previous notice in writing to expire at the end of the second or any subsequent year of tenancy or by the landlord as hereinafter mentioned.” Clause 6 of the agreement provided: “The landlord may at any time determine the tenancy [of the holding] if required for naval, military or Air Force purposes or for the purpose for which the farm was acquired for the landlord or for other purposes by virtue of s. 25 (2) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, by a demand for possession ... and thereupon the said tenancy ... shall forthwith cease and determine ... and thereupon the landlord shall pay or allow to the tenant by way of compensation (in addition to such compensation if any as he may be otherwise entitled to under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923) the fair value of the crops growing in the farm ... and the tenant right thereon and any loss or damage he may sustain through such disturbance ...” The tenant gave up possession of the farm on Dec. 17, 1943, in consequence of a notice to quit served on Nov. 13, 1943, by the landlord who required the land for War Department purposes. On a claim for compensation by the tenant the landlord contended that the effect of cl. 6 was merely to entitle the tenant to the amount of compensation payable under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, s. 12 (6).

HELD: the words in the agreement, “any loss or damage [the tenant] may sustain through such disturbance,” must be construed as intended to give a greater measure of relief to the tenant than that provided by s. 12 (6) of the Act.

[AS TO COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE OF THE TENANCY OF AN AGRICULTURAL HOLDING, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 1, pp. 361-368, paras. 594-601; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST Supp.

FOR THE AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACT, 1923, see HALSBURY’S STATUTES, Vol. 1, pp. 86-91 (s. 12) and pp. 99, 100 (s. 25).]

APPEAL from a decision of MORRIS, J., on an award stated in the form of a Special Case by an arbitrator.

The tenant, Mr. Sydney George Dean, entered into a written agreement with the landlord, the Secretary of State for War, for an agricultural holding consisting of a farm and 182 acres of land at Inber, Wiltshire. By cl. 6 of the agreement the landlord could determine the tenancy in whole or in part at any time if the land were required for naval, military or Air Force purposes, subject to the payment of compensation to the tenant for disturbance under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, and under the terms of the agreement (the relevant clause of which is set out in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.). On Nov. 13, 1943, the landlord served notice to quit the whole of the land and after the tenant had quitted the holding pursuant to such notice he claimed compensation. The matter was referred to an arbitrator and no dispute arose over the terms of the award except on the finding that the tenant was not entitled to compensation for loss of profit. On appeal, MORRIS, J., reversed that finding and awarded the sum of £600 under this head, and the Court of Appeal now affirmed that decision and dismissed the appeal of the landlord,

Diplock, K.C., and Quintin Hogg for the landlord.

Scott Henderson, K.C., and L. A. Blundell for the tenant.

TUCKER, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of MORRIS, J., on an award stated in the form of a Special Case by an arbitrator. We are only concerned with one part of the case which was before the arbitrator and the learned judge. On this part of the case the arbitrator found that there was no compensation payable to the tenant. On the matter being referred back to him by the judge, he found that, if he was wrong in his first view, the amount of compensation should be £600. MORRIS, J., held that the arbitrator was wrong in awarding no compensation, and awarded £600 to the tenant.

The tenant was tenant of an agricultural holding on Salisbury Plain, Wiltshire, consisting of a farm-house, buildings, and 182 acres of land under an agreement dated January 27, 1943, for a term from Mar. 25 to Sept. 29, 1942, and

"thereafter from year to year determinable by either party by one year's previous notice in writing to expire at the end of the second or any subsequent year of the tenancy, or by the landlord as hereinafter mentioned . . ."

Clause 6, on which this case depends, is as follows:

"The landlord may at any time determine the tenancy of the whole or any part of the farm if required for naval, military or Air Force purposes or for the purpose for which the farm was acquired by the landlord or for other purposes by virtue of s. 25 (2) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, by a demand for possession of the same and thereupon the said tenancy of the premises whereof the possession is so demanded as aforesaid shall forthwith cease and determine by virtue of such demand and thereupon the landlord shall pay or allow to the tenant by way of compensation (in addition to such compensation if any as he may be otherwise entitled to under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923) the fair value of the crops growing in the farm or on the part whereof the tenancy shall be so determined and the tenant right thereon and any loss or damage he may sustain through such disturbance."

The result is that the earliest date at which this agreement could be determined under the first part of cl. 1 would be by notice expiring at Michaelmas, 1944, but under cl. 6 the landlord could determine it at any moment by demanding possession provided it was required for naval, military, or Air Force purposes or for the purpose for which the farm was acquired by the landlord. We are not concerned with the other purposes under s. 25 (2) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923.

In those circumstances it is not quite accurate, I think, to say, as MORRIS, J., said, that the tenant had security of tenure until Michaelmas, 1944. His security of tenure depended entirely on the circumstances and the will of the landlord and it might be determined in a very short space of time. The tenancy was, in fact, determined by a notice given on Nov. 13, 1943, to give up possession on Dec. 17, 1943, and possession was given up on that date. Furthermore, the possession was required for the purposes of the War Department, and the land was acquired by the War Department for such purposes. The tenant, having left the holding as a result of that notice, claimed compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, and under cl. 6, and he has been awarded compensation with regard to parts of his case. He has been given £86 10s. for out-of-pocket expenses for sundry items, such as removal of household goods etc., and a sum of £113 odd under a claim for sale commission and expenses, the claim being part of the loss or damage sustained by him within the meaning of cl. 6. There was a dispute only as to amount with regard to that item. Then he has been awarded the sum of £82 for capital loss on the sale of a cross-bred flock of sheep. Those items add up to the sum of £281. In addition he claimed loss of profit, and that is the matter now in dispute. In respect of it MORRIS, J., awarded him £600. The tenant put his claim in this way :

"The claim of the tenant for this item is based on the fact that in November, 1943, when the demand for possession was, in fact, made by the landlord under the special powers in the tenancy agreement, the earliest date at which the tenancy could have been terminated by a notice to quit, apart from such special powers, would have been Sept. 29, 1945. Therefore, apart from the said special powers, the tenant would normally have had nearly two years' further possession of the said farm—from November, 1943, to the end of September, 1945—which period would have covered two complete periods of growth and harvesting of crops, so that in the result the tenant lost two years' beneficial occupation of the farm, which normally he would have had apart from the termination under the special powers of the landlord."

The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, s. 12, provides, so far as material:

"(1) Where the tenancy of a holding terminates by reason of a notice to quit given by the landlord, and in consequence of such notice the tenant quits the holding, then . . . compensation for the disturbance shall be payable by the landlord to the tenant in accordance with the provisions of this section . . ."

Then follow certain sub-sections. Sub-section (6), which deals with the compensation which is to be payable for the disturbance, is as follows:

"The compensation payable under this section shall be a sum representing such loss or expense directly attributable to the quitting of the holding as the tenant may unavoidably incur upon or in connection with the sale or removal of his household goods, implements of husbandry, fixtures, farm produce or farm stock on or used in connection with the holding, and shall include any expenses reasonably incurred by him in the preparation of his claim for compensation (not being costs of an arbitration to determine the amount of the compensation), but for the avoidance of disputes, such sum shall, for the purposes of this Act, be computed at an amount equal to one year's rent of the holding, unless it is proved that the loss and expenses so incurred exceed an amount equal to one year's rent of the holding, in which case the sum recoverable shall be such as represents the whole loss and expenses so incurred up to a maximum amount equal to two years' rent of the holding."

Sub-section (7) provides:

"Compensation shall not be payable under this section . . . (e) Where the holding was let to the tenant by a corporation carrying on a railway, dock, canal, water, or other undertaking, or by a government department or a local authority, and possession of the holding is required by the corporation, department, or authority for the purpose (not being the use of the land for agriculture) for which it was acquired by the corporation, department, or authority, or appropriated under any statutory provision."

Stopping there, but for any provisions in the agreement compensation as defined by sub-s. (6) would not have been payable in this case by the War Department having regard to sub-s. (7) (e). It is also relevant to consider s. 25 which provides:

"(1) Notwithstanding any provision in a contract of tenancy to the contrary, a notice to quit a holding shall be invalid if it purports to terminate the tenancy before the expiration of twelve months from the end of the then current year of tenancy; but nothing in this section shall extend to a case where a receiving order in bankruptcy is made against the tenant. (2) This section shall not apply to (a) any notice given by or on behalf of the Admiralty, War Department, or Air Council under the provisions of any agreement of tenancy where possession of the land is required for naval, military, or Air Force purposes."

So the War Department is not bound to give twelve months' notice where possession of the land is required for military purposes although an ordinary landlord cannot terminate such a tenancy by less than twelve months' notice. That is the justification for the inclusion of cl. 6 in this agreement which could not have been included in an agreement between two ordinary citizens.

In those circumstances, the tenant contends that cl. 6 could quite well have been phrased in such a way as in terms to give him the compensation laid down in s. 12 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, and limited as defined in sub-s. (6) of that section. He says that this clause, in a document proffered by the landlord, instead of so saying, has used language which is much wider than that contained in the Act, that is to say, instead of saying "compensation as defined in s. 12 (6)," it says, "any loss or damage he may sustain through such disturbance." Furthermore, he says the words "such disturbance" refer to something that has been mentioned earlier in the agreement or earlier in that clause. On looking back it is found that the word "disturbance" has not previously been used, but what is clearly referred to is the termination of the agreement at any time by a demand for possession. I think it also pre-supposes the tenant having quitted the holding pursuant to such a demand. The tenant says that that is the meaning of "such disturbance." He does not dispute that the word "disturbance" has the same meaning in the agreement as it has in the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923—that is to say, the termination of a holding by a notice to quit and the quitting of the holding by the tenant consequent thereon, but it is said that the compensation which is receivable in consequence of disturbance is another matter and that the agreement has provided that the scope of the compensation payable for any loss or damage which the tenant may sustain is much wider than that of the compensation prescribed by sub-s. (6) which limits the compensation to "a sum representing such loss or expense directly attributable to the quitting of the holding as the tenant may unavoidably incur." The tenant, therefore, claims that he is entitled to any loss that he has suffered as a result of the premature determination of the tenancy and his quitting as a consequence of the exercise by the landlord of his right in certain circumstances to determine the tenancy on demand rather than by giving twelve months' notice expiring at Michaelmas, 1945.

On the other hand, counsel for the landlord laid much stress on the use of the word "disturbance" in cl. 6 and I agree that "disturbance" in this context must have the meaning which it bears in the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, but, as I have already said, disturbance and the compensation payable in respect of disturbance are two separate things. Counsel for the landlord argues that this clause merely has the effect of giving the tenant that compensation of which he would otherwise be deprived by virtue of para. (e) of sub-s. (7). If so, of course, it would have been quite easy to say so in terms.

I do not think that the problem before us is an altogether easy one, but in the end I have come to the same decision as MORRIS, J. In giving his judgment, he said:

"Very attractively as the argument of counsel for the landlord was developed it seems to me that it does not pay sufficient heed to the actual words used by the parties in this particular contract. The words are: 'any loss or damage he may sustain through such disturbance.' Counsel for the tenant submits that those words ought to be taken as they are and construed in their ordinary and natural way. It seems to me that, if the parties had intended to limit the loss or damage that was recoverable, it would have been quite easy for them to do so. There is, in my judgment, a difference between the conception of disturbance and any provision as to what is payable in respect of the disturbance. When Parliament enacted in the Act of 1923 that there was to be compensation for disturbance, it laid down the basis on which that compensation was payable. The parties here might have chosen to say that there would be payable for disturbance any loss or damage not above the amount that would be payable pursuant to the statutory provisions. They have not chosen to do anything of the kind. The words do not seem to me to be limited. The words, in my judgment, are plain words, and they are 'any loss or damage he may sustain through such disturbance.' I see no reason to limit those words in the way suggested by counsel for the landlord."

Although he argues that compensation is to be limited to the amount of compensation envisaged by sub-s. (6), none the less counsel for the landlord says that all the limits in the amount of compensation prescribed by sub-s. (6) do not apply. The maximum of two years' rent and the minimum of one year's rent, he says, are not applicable. I find it difficult to see why part of sub-s. (6) should apply and not the whole. If he has to pray in aid sub-s. (6) as indicating the compensation payable under this agreement, why should not the maximum and minimum limits also be included. I do not see why we should construe this clause as meaning nothing more nor less than the compensation provided by sub-s. (6) excluding the maximum and minimum limits. I think that tends to support the view that the parties have used, and must be taken purposely to have used, very wide and general language which goes beyond the words of sub-s. (6) and must be construed as intended to give a greater measure of relief to the tenant whose tenancy has been determined in this summary manner. I can see nothing unreasonable in a landlord contracting that in such circumstances the tenant shall be entitled to receive compensation to a greater extent than would otherwise be recoverable under the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. For these reasons I think this appeal fails.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree. My mind has fluctuated much during the hearing, and I still think a powerful argument can be advanced—and, indeed, one has been advanced—in respect of either view. Section 12 (7) (e) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, standing by itself, would, on the facts of this case, entitle the landlord to eject the tenant without paying compensation. The landlord argues that the disputed words in cl. 6 can have no stronger operation than to restore the right to compensation taken away by that provision, minus, perhaps, the provisions for maximum and minimum amounts. I inclined to this view while counsel for the landlord was opening the appeal, but later I was converted. If it had been intended merely to restore the equivalent of the statutory right to compensation, nothing would have been easier than to say so plainly. What the landlord must actually pay under this contract has to be paid by way of compensation. Then follow a number of items ending with "any loss or damage he may sustain through such disturbance." This seems to me to mean that what is to be paid is not the statutory compensation, but a different measure, described under the very wide term, not derived from the statute, "any loss or damage." "Disturbance," no doubt, means the same thing in the contract and in the statute, namely, the involuntary dispossession of the tenant. No doubt, too, the words "such disturbance" mean an involuntary dispossession of the tenant such as occurred in this case, without the normal notice, but because "disturbance" means the same thing in the contract and in the statute, it does not follow that the words "any loss or damage he may sustain" in the contract mean the same as the somewhat narrower and differently phrased statutory measure of compensation. For these reasons and those given by my Lord I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROXBURGH, J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Treasury Solicitor (for the landlord); Ellis and Fairbairn (for the tenant).

[Reported by C. St.J. NICHOLSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re LORY'S WILL TRUSTS. LAMBRICK v. PUBLIC TRUSTEE OF THE COLONY AND PROTECTORATE OF KENYA AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), January 27, 1950.]

Will—"Land"—Inclusion of incorporeal hereditaments—Tithe rentcharge.

A Tithe and Tithe Rentcharge—Extinguishment—Compensation—Right of devisee under will of testator dying in 1902—Tithe rentcharge included in bequest of life interest—Tithe Act, 1936 (c. 43), s. 7 (1), sched. I, pt. I, para. 5.

By his will, dated Oct. 16, 1899, a testator, who died on July 31, 1902, after bequeathing certain legacies and annuities and devising a freehold farm, provided: "And as to all the rest residue and remainder I give it to J.L.R. the son of my sister Alice on his attaining twenty-five years for his life . . . and after his decease I give Tredore to his eldest surviving boy in tail on his attaining twenty-one years. I give Trethewey to his second surviving boy in tail at twenty-one and my St. Keverne land to the third boy in tail on attaining twenty-one years but should either of my freehold farms revert or vest in anyone who can claim two estates under this my will after the death of J.L.R. then in such case I give my St. Keverne farms to the eldest surviving grandson of my brother . . ." Tredore and Trethewey were freehold farms owned by the testator. In the parish of St. Keverne the testator possessed two freehold farms called Polquest and Trevallach, and also, issuing out of land in that parish, he had certain tithe rentcharges and an undivided share in a perpetual rentcharge of £10.

D HELD: there was nothing in the will to cut down the meaning of the word "land" so as to exclude incorporeal hereditaments, and, therefore, the words "my St. Keverne land" extended to and included the tithe rentcharges and the share of the rentcharge of £10.

E By the Tithe Act, 1936, s. 7: "(1) Stock to be issued for compensation in respect of a tithe rentcharge shall be issued to the person specified in that behalf in Part I of sched. III to this Act, and shall be held and disposed of for the like purposes as if the stock had been an investment of consideration money paid for the redemption of the rentcharge under the Tithe Acts . . ." Part I of sched. III to the Act provides: "Stock to be issued for compensation in respect of the extinguishment of a tithe rentcharge shall be issued in the following cases to the following persons, that is to say: . . . 5. In the case of a rentcharge which was then so vested that the legal estate in fee simple therein could then have been sold and conveyed to the purchaser under the powers conferred by the Settled Land Act, 1925, . . . or by trustees for sale . . . or personal representative . . . in such manner as to overreach all equitable interests, and powers, and to extinguish any other legal estate subsisting therein, the stock shall be issued to the person to whom the purchase money arising on such a sale would have been payable."

G HELD: on the true construction of the provisions of s. 7 (1) and para. 5 of Part I of sched. III, the stock ought to be held by the trustee of the will on trust for the third son of J.L.R.

H [AS TO MEANING OF "LAND," see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 250-252, para. 304; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 714-716, Nos. 5626-5649.]

Case referred to:

(1) West v. Lawday, (1865), 11 H.L. Cas. 375; 13 L.T. 171; 44 Digest 906, 7665.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine inter alia whether, on the true construction of the will of the testator, the words "my St. Keverne land" included certain tithe rentcharges and an undivided share of a perpetual rentcharge issuing out of land in the parish of St. Keverne, and also whether, if the tithe rentcharges were so included, the stock issued as compensation for the extinguishment of the tithe rentcharges under the Tithe Act, 1936, ought to be held by the trustee for the benefit of the person entitled to the "St. Keverne land." DANCKWERTS, J., answered both questions in the affirmative. The facts appear in the judgment.

H. A. Rose for the plaintiff, sole trustee of the will.

Swingland for the Public Trustee of Kenya, the administrator of the estate of the testator's heir at law.

I. G. H. Campbell for the second, third, fourth and fifth defendants, annuitants under the will and next of kin.

G. B. Parker for the sixth, seventh and eighth defendants, the executors of certain next of kin.

Bagnall for the tenth defendant, a specific devisee.

R. L. Edwards for the eleventh defendant, the third surviving son of J.L.R. The ninth defendant was not represented.

DANCKWERTS, J.: By his will the testator provided:

"... as to all the rest residue and remainder I give it to James Lory Rapson the son of my sister Alice on his attaining twenty-five years for his life provided that he adopt the surname of Lory and also reside at Tredore and after his decease I give Tredore to his eldest surviving boy in tail on his attaining twenty-one years. I give Trethewey to his second surviving boy in tail at twenty-one and my St. Keverne land to the third boy in tail on attaining twenty-one years but should either of my freehold farms revert or vest in anyone who can claim two estates under this my will after the death of James Lory Rapson then in such case I give my St. Keverne farms to the eldest surviving grandson of my brother James on his attaining twenty-one years who takes no interest out of the Colvennor Farm in Cury."

The difficulty arises in regard to the devise, after the death of James Lory Rapson, who became James Lory Lory, of "my St. Keverne land." It appears that the testator had, in addition to a farm called Trevallach in the parish of St. Keverne and another farm called Polquest in the same parish, the following tithe rentcharges: Halwin tithes, Bargwitha tithes, Lanheverne tithes and Arrowan tithes, all issuing out of land in St. Keverne and amounting in all to £25 15s. 0d. He also had three equal undivided fourth parts of £10 issuing out of a tenement known as Clenhall in the parish of St. Keverne. They were incorporeal hereditaments connected with the corporeal hereditament in St. Keverne. The question is whether those incorporeal hereditaments pass on the devise of "my St. Keverne land." It is said that they do not pass because they are incorporeal hereditaments, and, therefore, different and separate from the actual corporeal ownership of the land at St. Keverne.

Reliance was placed on a passage in JARMAN ON WILLS, 7th ed., vol. 2, p. 1254, which is in the following terms:

"Words descriptive of Land, Houses, etc. Mr. Jarman lays it down that 'The most comprehensive words of description applicable to real estate are tenements and hereditaments; as they include every species of realty, as well corporeal as incorporeal. The word "lands" is not equally extensive; for though, generally, it includes as well the surface of the ground as everything that is on and under it, as houses and other buildings, mines, etc., yet it seems that the term will not, proprio vigore, comprehend incorporeal hereditaments, as advowsons, tithes, etc., unless there is no other real estate to satisfy the words of the devise: a circumstance, however, which in regard to wills made or re-published since 1837, would be immaterial. Thus it seems that if a man devise all his lands in A, and he has no other real estate there than tithes, they will pass. So, if he devise a certain manor, and has only a fee farm rent issuing out of it, such rent will pass '."

A In the note to that passage West v. Lawday (1) is referred to as supporting the statement by Mr. JARMAN. That case is subsequent in time to the edition in which these words originally appeared, and, therefore, is not necessarily anything to do with his observations, but, so far as it supports those observations, it seems very weak authority because the reference in the case to the meaning of "lands" as including incorporeal hereditaments is merely a passing reference and cannot be called even a dictum. The decision in that case proceeded on quite other grounds. However that may be and whether the statement by Mr. JARMAN be B justified as a statement of law or not, the word which he is construing is not "land" in the singular, but "lands." The expression which I have to construe today is "my St. Keverne land."

The testator, though he made his own will, also had some legal knowledge, because he uses the words "in tail" in quite an expert manner. On the other hand, he uses some expressions rather haphazardly, such as "my interest C in Colvennor Farm," "I give this estate," "my St. Keverne land," "either of my freehold farms," "two estates," and "I give my St. Keverne farms." So, perhaps, he is not as consistent as he might be when he is using expressions which refer to the subject-matter of his various dispositions, but, apart from those questions, as a matter of ordinary legal language, it is clear that corporeal hereditaments, such as farms, are land. D It is equally well established that incorporeal hereditaments, such as rentcharges, are also land and real property, and I see no reason why in this case I should cut down the meaning of "land"—"my St. Keverne land"—so as to exclude any land of any nature which the testator had in that particular parish. It seems to me very improbable that the testator would have wanted to make a present of his farm to the third son of James Lory Rapson and to render him E liable to the heir at law—because otherwise there is no disposition of the incorporeal hereditaments—in respect of the rentcharges which issue out of the corporeal land in question. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that the devise of "my St. Keverne land" carries not only the corporeal hereditament represented by the farms but also the tithe rentcharges and the three-quarters' share of the other rentcharge which issue out of that corporeal hereditament. F

I now come to another rather odd question arising by reason of the change in the law which was made by the Tithe Act, 1936. The scheme of that Act was to abolish all tithes and to compensate the owners with stock which was to be issued to various persons under the provisions of the Act. Section 37 of that Act provides:

G " (2) In the case of a testamentary instrument executed before the commencement of this Act, a disposition referring to tithe rentcharge shall be construed and have effect in relation to a rentcharge extinguished by this Act as if the reference had included a reference to the stock issued in respect thereof."

H That sub-section has nothing to do with the present case because it was designed to deal with cases of people who had made their wills before the passing of the Act but died after the Act came into force, so that questions of ademption might possibly arise. This is not that case. This is a case where, as I have held, the tithe rentcharges were given to a particular beneficiary, and the question is whether he has lost what he was entitled to after the testator's death and has not become entitled to the stock which was given to former owners of tithe. Section 7 provides:

"(1) Stock to be issued for compensation in respect of a tithe rentcharge shall be issued to the person specified in that behalf in Part I of sched. III to this Act, and shall be held and disposed of for the like purposes as if the stock had been an investment of consideration money paid for the redemption of the rentcharge under the Tithe Acts, and, in the case of stock issued to the proper officer of the court, according to the orders of the court."

Under the Tithe Act, 1846, s. 9, there is a provision about consideration money paid for the redemption of a tithe rentcharge, but it is not expressed in language very apt to deal with the present case. I am not sure, however, that it is necessary to rely on that provision.

The material provision to which I think it is necessary to turn is Part I of sched. III to the Act of 1936:

"Persons to whom stock is to be issued. Stock to be issued for compensation in respect of the extinguishment of a tithe rentcharge shall be issued in the following cases to the following persons, that is to say . . ."

The first case is that of a person who is beneficially entitled to a tithe rent charge in his own right, and the present case, where the rentcharge was held by the trustees, is not that case. Cases 2, 3 and 4 are special cases, such as Queen Anne's Bounty, and have nothing to do with the present case. Case 5 is:

"In the case of a rentcharge which was then so vested that the legal estate in fee simple therein could then have been sold and conveyed to the purchaser under the powers conferred by the Settled Land Act, 1925, or any additional powers conferred by a settlement, or by trustees for sale, or by a mortgagee or personal representative in the exercise of his paramount powers, in such manner as to overreach all equitable interests, and powers, and to extinguish any other legal estate subsisting therein, the stock shall be issued to the person to whom the purchase money arising on such a sale would have been payable."

That does seem to be a case which might apply to the present circumstances. The rentcharge could have been sold, and the purchase money would have been payable to trustees. Therefore, it seems to me plain that the stock in the present case would be issuable to the trustees, and the trustee now in fact holds the stock. It is quite clear that he intended to hold that stock on trust for the beneficiary who would be entitled to the previously existing tithe rentcharges. Therefore, I have no difficulty, in spite of the possible doubts caused by a strict interpretation of the language of the statute, in coming to the conclusion that it was the duty of the trustee to hold the stock he had acquired on trust for the defendant, Paul Lory.

Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be paid rateably out of the residuary real and personal estate undisposed of by the will.

Solicitors: Adams & Adams (for the sixth, seventh and eighth defendants); Hyde, Mahon & Pascall, agents for Randle, Thomas & Thomas, Helston, Cornwall (for all other parties except the ninth defendant).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

WEINBAUM v. KLEIN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell, L.J., and Hodson, J.), January 24, 25, 1950.]

County Court—Appeal—New trial—Further evidence—Power of Court of Appeal to order new trial—County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), s. 105—County Courts Rules, 1936, Ord. 37, r. 1 (1).

A By Ord. 37, r. 1 (1), of the County Courts Rules, 1936: "The judge shall in every case have the power to order a new trial to be had upon such terms as he thinks reasonable . . ." Among the grounds on which such an order may be made is that fresh evidence is available. By s. 105 of the County Courts Act, 1934: "If any party to any proceedings in a county court is dissatisfied with the determination . . . of the judge in point of law or equity or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, the party aggrieved . . . may appeal therefrom to the Court of Appeal . . ."

B The appellant against an order for possession made against him in the county court asked in his notice of appeal, inter alia, for a new trial on the ground that he desired to call further evidence. No application for a new trial had been made to the county court under Ord. 37, r. 1.

C HELD: the appeal was not brought within the terms of s. 105 of the Act of 1934, and, therefore, the Court of Appeal had no power to order a new trial; nor had the court jurisdiction to hear an application by an unsuccessful litigant in the county court for a new trial on the ground that further evidence should be admitted unless by way of an appeal from a decision of a county court judge under Ord. 37, r. 1 (1), refusing a new trial.

D [FOR THE COUNTY COURTS ACT, 1934, s. 105, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 5, p. 82.]

APPEAL of the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE ENGELBACH, made at Shoreditch County Court, dated Oct. 18, 1949, granting possession of certain premises to the plaintiff. The defendant asked inter alia for a new trial on the ground that fresh evidence was available. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.

F. E. Sugden for the defendant.

Quintin Hogg for the plaintiff.

F SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: When reference is made to the decision and the facts of this case it is plain that the first question which the learned judge had to decide was whether the premises in suit (the subject of a lease dated 1941 which came to an end in 1946) were at the date of the issue of the summons (the tenant being a statutory tenant) occupied by him otherwise than for business purposes thereby entitling him to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. On that point a number of witnesses were called, and the learned judge, having formed an unfavourable view of all the tenant's witnesses save one, came to the conclusion that the premises were only used for business purposes at the material date and so were outside the protection and ambit of the Rent Acts. If he had decided differently on that point other matters, including the question of alternative accommodation, would have arisen, and, if the judge had accepted the suggested alternative accommodation, he would have had to decide whether it was reasonable to make an order. The bulk of the grounds of appeal were related to the second point. They cannot, therefore, be considered unless some ground can be suggested whereby the finding on the first point can be disturbed. Counsel for the defendant admits that unless he can adduce new evidence, he cannot successfully contend that on this matter, which was one of fact, he can challenge the finding, but he says that further evidence is available. He admits, however, that that evidence was available at the date of the trial, that it was not called by the then representative of the tenant, although its availability was known, and although, indeed, the tenant himself requested that it should be called. It is plain that counsel cannot say that this is a case in which the new evidence sought to be called was not called because reasonable diligence had not disclosed its existence. On well-known principles it is obviously impossible for this court to give leave to re-open the matter by calling fresh evidence of that character. It is plain, therefore, to my mind, that this appeal cannot succeed.

There has arisen a further preliminary question on which it is, perhaps, desirable that something should be said. The notice of appeal is in the usual form and asks that the judgment be set aside, and, alternatively, that a new trial may be had. From what I have said it is clear that it is essential for the tenant that the question of user as business premises should first be disposed of, and that can only be done by means of a new hearing. Therefore, the substance of this appeal is really a request to this court direct to grant a new hearing on the ground that fresh evidence is now available which should be called. By the County Courts Rules, 1936, Ord. 37, r. 1 (1), provision is made for application to the county court judge for a new trial, and among the grounds on which such an application will be granted is that of the availability of fresh evidence. No application to the county court judge was made under Ord. 37 in the present case. It is now very much out of time, and it is impossible to suppose that, if application was made, any extension of time would be given.

So far as appeals to this court are concerned, the right so to appeal and the jurisdiction of this court to hear appeals from county courts is contained in s. 105 of the County Courts Act, 1934. The jurisdiction is statutory and is confined to what is said in that section, namely:

"If any party to any proceedings in a county court is dissatisfied with the determination . . . of the judge in point of law or equity or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, the party aggrieved . . . may appeal therefrom to the Court of Appeal . . ."

It follows that the only cases in which an appeal lies to this court are where the party dissatisfied has a point of law, or equity, on the judgment, or complains in regard to the admission or rejection of evidence. If the appeal is, within the terms of that section, brought properly to this court, then by s. 109 this court can make orders of the kind there stated, which include directions for a new trial. Unless the appeal is properly brought in accordance with the terms of s. 105, it appears to me that this court would have no power to order a new trial. If an application for a new trial is made to the county court judge pursuant to Ord. 37, r. 1 (1), and the county court judge refuses so to order, an appeal can be brought to this court from that refusal, provided, of course, that the grounds of the appeal are within the language of s. 105. Where, however, the ground on which a new trial is sought is, as in this case, that further evidence should be admitted, that is not a matter within the language of s. 105, so that, as I construe the statute, there is no jurisdiction in this court to hear an application on those grounds direct to this court, there having been no application to the county court judge under Ord. 37, r. 1 (1). That, we are informed, is well established practice, and it seems to me to be completely in accordance with the terms of the statute. In my judgment, it is impossible to sustain this appeal, and it must be dismissed with the usual consequences.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree.

HODSON, J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Pothecary & Barratt (for the defendant); Aukin, Courts & Co. (for the plaintiff).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

INTERNATIONAL CORPORATION, LTD. v. BESSER MANUFACTURING CO.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker and Asquith, L.JJ., and Roxburgh, J.), January 27, 1950.]

A Practice—Service—Service out of jurisdiction—Action for account and payment of commission—Breach of contract committed within the jurisdiction—English company acting as American company's agents in Europe—Commission payable in England—Duty to render account in England—Prima facie case—R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

B An English company applied under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), to serve a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction on an American company in an action claiming inter alia (a) an account of all sales made by the American company to purchasers in Europe between November, 1941, and May, 1948, and (b) payment of commission on such sales. Affidavits, sworn on behalf of the English company by one of its directors, alleged that in November, 1941, a contract was made in the United States of America between the two companies, whereby the English company was to be the sole agent of the American company in England and the other countries of Europe and the American company agreed to pay to the English company a commission of fifteen per cent. on all products of the American company (with certain exceptions) sold in Europe; that the English company had from time to time claimed commission on the products sold by the American company in Europe; and that the American company had failed to make the payments and to submit any accounts. None of these allegations had been denied by the American company, who resisted the application for service out of the jurisdiction. It was contended by the English company that the commission was payable in England, and, therefore, there had been a breach of the contract within the jurisdiction of the court. In the statement of claim the contract to pay commission was limited to commission on products of the American company sold in Europe in consequence of introductions affected, or work done, by the English company on behalf of the American company.

F Held: (i) if the affidavits on behalf of the English company showed a prima facie case, it was immaterial and showed no lack of good faith that the contract alleged in the statement of claim was more restricted than the contract alleged in the affidavits and was limited to payment of commission on products sold in consequence of work done by the English company.

G (ii) the inference on the material before the court was that the alleged contract was one under which (a) it was the duty of the American company to account to the English company in England, and (b) commission became payable in England, as by English law—and for this purpose, it was to be assumed that American law was the same in such circumstances—it was the duty of the debtor to seek out his creditor and pay him at his place of business or where he would be found; and, therefore, the English company had made out a prima facie case, within R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

H (iii) the fact that one of the remedies sought was an account did not preclude the English company from obtaining an order for service out of the jurisdiction.

Hoerler v. Hanover Caoutchouc, Gutta Percha and Telegraph Works, (1893) (10 T.L.R. 103), applied.

[As to SERVICE OUT OF THE JURISDICTION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 26, pp. 31-35, paras. 44-50; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Practice, pp. 344-351, Nos. 610-666.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Schintz, [1926] Ch. 710; 95 L.J.Ch. 393; 135 L.T. 350; Digest, Practice, 358, 716.
- (2) The Hagen, [1908] P. 189; 77 L.J.P. 124; 98 L.T. 891; Digest, Practice, 340, 579.
- (3) Société Générale de Paris v. Dreyfus Bros., (1887), 37 Ch.D. 215; 57 L.J.Ch. 276; 58 L.T. 573; Digest, Practice, 339, 574; revsg. (1885) 29 Ch.D. 239; 54 L.J.Ch. 893; 53 L.T. 463.
- (4) Hoerler v. Hanover Caoutchouc, Gutta Percha and Telegraph Works, (1893), 10 T.L.R. 103; Digest, Practice, 349, 647.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of LYNSEY, J., made in chambers, and dated Nov. 16, 1949, allowing an appeal from an order of the master dismissing an application by the defendants to set aside an order, made under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), giving leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction. The plaintiffs, an English company, alleged that they were the exclusive agents of the defendants, an American company, in England and the other countries of Europe; that the defendants had committed a breach of a term of the contract between the parties by refusing to pay to the plaintiffs commission on all sales made by the defendants in Europe; and that under the terms of the contract the commission was payable in England. The writ claimed (inter alia) an account and payment of the commission. The Court of Appeal now held that a prima facie case had been shown by the plaintiffs and allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Benev, K.C., and Bernard Finlay for the plaintiffs.

Sandlands, K.C., and Leonard Lewis for the defendants.

TUCKER, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of LYNSEY, J., in chambers, whereby he set aside an order which had been made giving leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction. The action was one by International Corporation, Ltd., whose registered office is at 19, Ebury Street, London, and the proposed writ is against Besser Manufacturing Co. of Alpena, Michigan, U.S.A. The writ claims:

"(1) An account of all sales by the defendants of Besser concrete products plant sold by the defendants to purchasers in England and the continent of Europe between November, 1941 and May, 1948. (2) Further or alternatively an account of all sales by the defendants of the said Besser concrete products plant sold by the defendants during the like period to . . ."

There follows a certain number of named firms, one of which was in Johannesburg, another in Palestine, others in France, Holland, Switzerland and Sweden, and one in the United Kingdom. The writ further claims:

"(3) Payment of commission at the rate of fifteen per centum on the value of all sales under (1) or alternatively (2) or both (1) and (2). (4) Alternatively the sum of 40,000 dollars as commission on the sales under (2) or alternatively the like sum or such other sum as may be deemed just as a reasonable remuneration for services rendered by the plaintiffs to the defendants in and about the procuring of the said sales. (5) Alternatively damages for breach of contract. (6) Further or other relief."

In support of the application for leave to serve the writ out of the jurisdiction, on Feb. 9, 1949, the proposed plaintiffs swore an affidavit by Mr. Ryner, one of their directors. The material parts of the affidavit, omitting for the moment a statement in para. 3 with which I shall deal later, state:

"4. In or about 1941 I visited the United States of America for the purpose of investigating methods and processes in connection with the building industry and under the sponsorship of the Ministry of Works, and

A in the course of such investigation I visited the intended defendant company's premises and had a number of discussions with its president, Mr. Jesse H. Besser, its vice-president, Mr. P. M. Park, and other officers of the intended defendant company. 5. In or about November, 1941, it was agreed between the intended defendant company and myself, acting on behalf of the intended plaintiff company, that the intended plaintiff company should thereafter act as the sole agents and representatives of the intended defendants in England and the countries of the continent of Europe, and that the intended defendants would pay to the intended plaintiffs a commission of fifteen per cent. on all products of the intended defendants, other than motors, v-belt drives, pallets and racks, sold in England or in the countries of the continent of Europe. There is now produced and shown to me a letter, dated Nov. 26, 1941, and contained in a bundle of letters exhibited hereto ... which letter confirms the terms of the agreement hereinbefore referred to."

B That letter of Nov. 26, 1941, refers to a shipment of samples, and proceeds:

C "On receipt of your cash order for a Besser super vibrapac unitized concrete products plant, you will be the exclusive representative of Besser Manufacturing Co. in England. Likewise, on the sale of the same in other countries on the continent you will be the exclusive representative in those countries. In the meantime any inquiries we receive from England or on the continent we will be glad to forward them to you to help you in getting started. Reports on inquiries sent you and other prospects will be expected weekly. According to our conversation you will be placing the first vibrapac in England shortly and that will be your greatest advertisement. A notice of sixty days should be given by yourself or Besser Manufacturing Co. in the event either should want to dissolve this agreement. We will pay you a commission on the Marley Holding Tile Co. order in the event you acquire it after your first plant is installed. We offer you a fifteen per cent. commission on everything but motors and v-belt drives, pallets and racks, on which there will be none. Hoping the above meets with your approval and that this will be the start of a very interesting and profitable mutual business relation ..."

D Thereafter it became the practice of the plaintiffs, as I will call them for convenience, to deduct commission from any sums which they were remitting to the defendants. That practice is referred to in a letter from the defendants, dated July 30, 1945, in which they say:

E "Now with regard to your deducting a commission from the payments. We believe this is perfectly logical and is the best way for you to handle it. You may be certain that we will invoice the machine to you at the net amount so that duty will be held to a minimum."

F Mr. Ryner's affidavit proceeds to state:

G "6. The intended plaintiffs, in pursuance of the said agreement thereafter did much work in making known in England and in countries of the continent of Europe the products of the intended defendants and despite the difficulties, which for a number of years were due to the war, the intended plaintiffs succeeded in promoting the sales of the intended defendants' products in England and in France, Sweden, Switzerland, Eire, Belgium, Czechoslovakia and Holland, and in consequence the intended defendants obtained orders for and sold their products in all such countries down to May, 1948."

H In para. 14 Mr. Ryner went on to say:

"The intended plaintiffs have from time to time made claims for commission, and the intended defendants have allowed the intended plaintiffs to retain commission as aforesaid, but the intended defendants have failed or refused to make any payment of commission in regard to the transactions hereinbefore referred to. The intended plaintiffs have requested the intended defendants to render an account of commission due in respect of orders relating to all the said matters and further to make payment of the amounts due under such accounts."

In para. 16, Mr. Ryner said:

"The intended plaintiffs have in their possession a very large number of letters passing between the intended plaintiffs and the intended defendants in relation to all the foregoing matters from 1941 until 1948, from which it is clear that a great amount of work and time were expended by the intended plaintiffs on the intended defendants' business and such letters are available for exhibition."

That affidavit did not in terms, or sufficiently, show a breach of contract within the jurisdiction, and, accordingly, a further affidavit was sworn on Apr. 4, 1949, in para. 4 of which Mr. Ryner again referred to the contract which was made at Alpena between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and said:

"... it was agreed that the plaintiff company should thereafter act as the exclusive agents and representatives of the defendant company in England and in other countries in Europe and that the defendants would pay to the plaintiffs a commission of fifteen per cent. on all products of the defendant company, other than motors and belt drives, pallets and racks, sold in England or in other countries of the continent of Europe. This contract was confirmed by letters passing between the parties in or about November, 1941, exhibited hereto ..."

By para. 5 Mr. Ryner said:

"It was a term of the said contract that the performance of the said contract should be in England and in other countries in Europe and that any commission due to the plaintiffs under the contract should be payable in England."

In para. 7 Mr. Ryner alleged a number of breaches which, he said, occurred within the jurisdiction, but the only breach relied on in this appeal, and the only one with which we are concerned, is the allegation that commission due to the plaintiffs under the contract was payable in England. According to the affidavit clearly, it had not been paid, and no accounts had been rendered in respect thereof. That is the breach which, it is said, occurred within the jurisdiction. I certainly do not read para. 5 of that affidavit as purporting to swear that it was expressly agreed between the parties that payment should be made in England. The actual terms of the contract have already been referred to. Perhaps it would have been better if para. 5 had said that by the law of England—and for this purpose we have to assume that the law of America is the same in circumstances such as this—it is the duty of the debtor to seek out his creditor and pay him at his place of business or where he would be found, but I do not think that any proper criticism can be directed to that paragraph by saying, as the defendants have done, that it does not sufficiently disclose the true position and is lacking in sincerity.

The first question is whether prima facie, on the facts sworn to in these affidavits, under a contract of this kind commission is payable in England. I think it clearly is. That is the prima facie inference to draw by the English law. It was contended on behalf of the defendants that the difficulties, or restrictions, which exist with regard to currency and the difficulty of trading between one country and another should compel us to infer from this contract that payment was to be made somewhere else, and counsel for the defendants submitted that the proper inference was that the payment of commission was to be made in the various countries in Europe where the orders were obtained or executed, or, alternatively, that for some reason it should be paid in America. I can find nothing in the facts which would justify such an inference. It seems to me that the only inference on the material before us at present is that the contract—and for this purpose we must assume that there was a contract as alleged in the affidavit—was one under which, not only did commission become payable in England, but it was the duty of the defendants to account in England to the plaintiffs, who, as the defendants' agents, were entitled to an account showing what the position was with regard to commission. On the affidavits, there has been both a failure to render an account and a failure to pay commission which, it is sworn, was due, but the precise amount of which is not known or ascertainable until after an account has been rendered by the defendants or, if necessary, taken under the process of the court.

Counsel for the defendants argued that the affidavits have not sufficiently disclosed the full position to the court, that they are in some respects contradictory, and that there are discrepancies between the form of relief which is sought in the affidavits and that which appears in the statement of claim. For instance, the contract sworn to in the affidavits is a contract that the plaintiff company should act as the exclusive agents and representatives of the defendants in England and other countries in Europe, and that the defendants should pay to the plaintiffs a commission of fifteen per cent. on all products of the defendants, with certain exceptions, sold in England or in other countries of the continent of Europe, whereas under para. 3 of the statement of claim the contract is put as one whereby:

“... the defendants would pay to the plaintiffs a commission ... on all products of the defendants [with certain exceptions] sold in England and other countries in Europe by the plaintiffs or in consequence of introductions effected by the plaintiffs, on the defendants' behalf, or in consequence of work done by the plaintiffs on the defendants' behalf.”

I do not think that the statement by LORD HANWORTH, M.R., in Re Schintz (1), that there must be the fullest disclosure, was intended to cover an inconsistency or discrepancy of this kind. If the proposed plaintiff on his affidavit shows a prima facie case that there was a contract to pay commission, that the commission was payable in this country, and that it has not been paid, it is, in my view, immaterial and it does not show lack of good faith that, when he comes to formulate his claim, he restricts it in that way. In Re Schintz (1), referring to the three rules which were enunciated by FARWELL, L.J. ([1908] P. 201), in The Hagen (2), as binding on the court—the first of which was adopted from a statement of PEARSON, J. (29 Ch.D. 243) in Société Générale de Paris v. Dreyfus Brothers (3)—LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said ([1926] Ch. 717):

“... I think this court ought to be exceedingly careful before it allows a writ to be served out of the jurisdiction.’ That is the first rule. The second is that ‘if on the construction of any of the sub-heads of Ord. 11 there was any doubt, it ought to be resolved in favour of the foreigner’; and the third rule is that, ‘in as much as the application is made ex parte, full and fair disclosure is necessary, as in all ex parte applications’.”

The rule with which we are concerned in the present case, and under which this application is made, is R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1, which is:

“Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the court or a judge whenever ... (e) the action ... is one brought against a defendant not domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland, in respect of a breach committed within the jurisdiction of a contract wherever made, even though such breach was preceded or accompanied by a breach out of the jurisdiction which rendered impossible the performance of the part of the contract which ought to have been performed within the jurisdiction."

In that connection one should also bear in mind R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 4, which, after dealing with how the application is to be made, says:

"... and no such leave shall be granted unless it shall be made sufficiently to appear to the court or judge that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction under this Order."

It thus underlines the fact that this is a discretionary matter for the judge in chambers.

I have carefully considered all the criticisms of counsel for the defendants with regard to the affidavits and the conduct of the plaintiffs generally, and I cannot find anything which shows that they have not made the proper kind of disclosure which has to be made on an application under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1. When an application of this kind is made, it is the duty of the plaintiffs to make out a prima facie case, but the court does not try out an issue, and it is not necessary to go into all the details of the case which will eventually have to be thrashed out. I think that on these affidavits the plaintiffs have made out a prima facie case, and that it cannot be said that they have not put the proper material before the court. It is to be borne in mind that the plaintiffs are not relieved from the obligations of disclosing everything which is proper and in support of their case by the fact that the defendants have sworn no affidavit. None the less, the defendants have had every opportunity of swearing an affidavit and have not attempted to deny a single allegation in either of the affidavits sworn on behalf of the plaintiffs, and, therefore, we must accept them for present purposes as being true.

That brings me to the part of the case which I think is the most difficult, i.e., whether the fact that the plaintiffs are claiming an account precludes them from obtaining an order for service out of the jurisdiction because this would not be a convenient forum for the granting of such relief. It is said that the disclosure of books and documents which may be required could be more conveniently dealt with in America. There appears to be no authority for the proposition that, where one of the remedies sought is an account, or where an account is a necessary step in ascertaining the amount due to a plaintiff, this court will never grant leave to serve out of the jurisdiction. Service out of the jurisdiction in such a case was allowed in Hoerler v. Hanover Caoutchouc, Gutta Percha and Telegraph Works (4), in which the facts were as follows. The plaintiffs, who carried on business in London, brought the action for commission on a sale of goods, as agents for the defendants, who were a foreign company carrying on business at Linden, near Hanover, and for an account. The contract contained the provision that in case of disputes the plaintiffs' firm was to submit to the laws and jurisdiction in force in Hanover. One of the questions was whether that term in the contract prevented service out of the jurisdiction, and it was held that it did not and was not to be construed as excluding the jurisdiction of the courts of this country. In the course of his argument, counsel for the defendants in that case, who sought to set aside the service of the writ, contended as follows:

"The plaintiffs, in their affidavit, stated that the greater part of the goods were sold by them in England, but that they did not know the amount of the commission due until the accounts were taken. Therefore, this was an action for an account which would have to be taken in Germany, and no commission would be due under the contract until the account was taken in Germany. Accordingly, the plaintiffs were not suing for a breach of contract within the jurisdiction. Further, if there was a breach within the jurisdiction, the court in its discretion would not in this case, where the account must be taken in Germany and where all the books and documents were, give leave to bring the action in this country."

That argument did not commend itself to the court, and in giving judgment LORD ESHER, M.R., does not seem to have thought it necessary to refer in terms to that part of the argument of counsel for the defendants. The matter was clearly brought to the notice of the court and the court, having rejected the contention that the jurisdiction was ousted, upheld the order made for service out of the jurisdiction.

The way in which the discretion must be exercised in one case is very little guidance as to how it is to be exercised in another. Hoerler's case (4) was a case of an account and one in which the amount due could not be ascertained until there had been an account taken or rendered, and the court do not seem to have thought that that was an insurmountable obstacle in the way of granting leave to serve out of the jurisdiction. I cannot say that it is any such obstacle in the present case. Nothing I am saying, of course, should be interpreted as meaning that a plaintiff can, as of right, obtain leave to serve out of the jurisdiction in all cases where an account is claimed. In some cases the defendants by their affidavit may be able to show that some hardship or difficulty would result from an action of this kind being tried in the courts of this country. In this case, however, it may be quite a simple matter for the defendants to write to the plaintiffs giving them the particulars that they require in regard to the orders placed in the various countries, and then the amount of commission payable thereon would be merely a matter of calculation. One does not know yet what issues there may be in this case, whether its result will turn on a denial of the contract or whether it will turn on some question of quantum. Having given the matter due consideration, I think, on the whole, that leave to serve out of the jurisdiction should be granted. The learned judge in chambers did not, I understand, give any reasons for setting aside the order for service out of the jurisdiction, but, as counsel for the plaintiffs told us, he appeared to be much influenced by the question of forum conveniens in regard to taking the account. I do not know whether that was the sole ground on which the learned judge acted.

There is one other matter to which I must refer and which is relied on by counsel for the defendants. In para. 3 of his affidavit of Feb. 9, 1949, on behalf of the plaintiffs, Mr. Ryner states:

"The intended defendant company carry on business as manufacturers of machinery at Alpena, county of Alpena, in the state of Michigan, in the United States of America, and in particular are manufacturers of machinery designed for equipment for concrete products plants and plain pallet tampers and vibrators, known generally as Besser Products. I verily believe that the intended defendant company is a corporation under the laws of the State of Michigan and is not authorised to do business in any country other than the United States of America."

The deponent does not state the source of his information or belief of what appears to be, on the face of it, a remarkable statement, but counsel for the defendants contends that it must be taken against the plaintiffs, who cannot be heard to rely on the fact that the deponent has not stated the source of his information and belief. Counsel for the defendants did not, as I understand him, suggest that the statement really seriously meant that all the transactions of the defendants which, according to the affidavits, were carried out throughout Europe and in other countries were ultra vires and void from first to last. I should hesitate for some time before I interpreted this somewhat curious sentence as having that result. But counsel for the defendants contended that it would be sufficient to negative the inference, which would otherwise follow, that payment had to be made in this country, and that, as the defendants, according to this statement, were restricted to business in America, it would be sufficient for the court to draw the inference that payment must necessarily be made in America. I confess that that passage in the affidavit is very curious, and precisely what it means I do not know, but I cannot construe it as having the effect for which counsel for the defendants contends. By saying that there is something in this paragraph which indicates that it would be illegal for the defendants to make any payment outside America with respect to contracts which have not been made in America and which have been carried out elsewhere, and which include payment of commission to an agent who has brought about business, I am negating the well-known position that the debtor has to seek out his creditor and pay him. In my view, however, this statement in the affidavit is not sufficient to vitiate the whole of the rest of the affidavit, which is really what it would do if we were to give it the meaning for which counsel for the defendants contends. On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that this is a proper case for allowing the service of a writ out of the jurisdiction, and that this appeal should be allowed. A B

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree.

ROXBURGH, J.: I also agree. C

Appeal allowed. Costs to be plaintiffs' costs in the cause.

Solicitors: Mendes da Costa, Greenwood & Co. (for the plaintiffs); Hall Clark & Goldhawk (for the defendants).

[Reported by C. ST. J. NICHOLSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.] D

Affirmed. C.A. post p. 798.

BORTHWICK-NORTON AND OTHERS v. ROMNEY WARWICK ESTATES, LTD. E

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Hilbery, J.), January 20, 23, 1950.]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Forfeiture—Breach of covenant—Suffering premises to be used as a brothel—User by sub-tenant—Knowledge of tenant—Imputation of knowledge—Relief—Exercise of discretion of court—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 146 (2). F

The lease of certain premises contained a covenant by the tenants not to do, or suffer to be done, on the premises any act which might be an annoyance, damage or disturbance to the landlords or their tenants, and to use them as a private dwelling-house only, and there was a proviso for re-entry in the event of a breach of covenant. The premises had been divided into a number of flats, and in 1947 the tenants sub-let the top flat to Mrs. Y. Complaints regarding Mrs. Y.'s conduct and the manner in which she was using her flat were made to the tenants by their sub-tenants in other flats on the premises, but the tenants took no steps to ascertain whether or not the allegations were true. On Aug. 30, 1948, Mrs. Y. was convicted of keeping the flat as a brothel. On Sept. 14 the tenants gave her notice to quit, and she thereupon vacated the flat. Pursuant to the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (1), the landlords served a notice on the tenants complaining that they had committed a breach of covenant by suffering the premises to be used as a brothel. In an action by the landlords for forfeiture and possession, the tenants contended that they had not suffered the premises to be used as a brothel because they had no knowledge that it was being used in that manner. G H

Held: (i) the tenants had received sufficient warning of what was going on on the premises; as they had taken no steps to verify or dispel the allegations made by their sub-tenants, they had wilfully shut their eyes to the true state of affairs; and, therefore, the law would impute knowledge to them and they were guilty of a breach of covenant.

Observations of LORD SUMNER in The Zamora (No. 2) ([1921] 1 A.C. 812), applied.

(ii) in view of the damage resulting to premises by reason of a breach of this kind, and having regard to the general conduct of the tenants, they were not entitled to relief under s. 146 (2) of the Act of 1925.

Per curiam: "I have had it pressed on me that the penalty is great if I refuse to exercise the discretion [under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (2)] ... I think the penalty for allowing or suffering premises to be used in this way ought to be high, and it ought to be known that the courts will be strict and will enforce, by forfeiture of leases, breaches of covenant of this nature, where people are put to all the abominable unpleasantnesses that occur where one in a set of flats is suffered to be used day and night as a brothel. I think it is a very grave type of breach, and it is not the kind of breach for which it was intended that the court should grant relief."

[AS TO LESSEE'S RIGHT TO RELIEF FROM FORFEITURE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 260, 261, para. 293; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 31, pp. 487, 488, Nos. 6354-6356.]

Cases referred to:

(1) The Zamora (No. 2), [1921] 1 A.C. 801; 90 L.J.P. 259; 125 L.T. 204; 37 Digest 640, 926.

(2) Egerton v. Esplanade Hotels, London, Ltd., [1947] 2 All E.R. 88; 2nd Digest Supp.

ACTION for possession of premises on the ground of breach of covenant by the tenants, the defendant company.

The plaintiffs were the present trustees of the Paddington Estate. In 1869 the premises, 81 Warwick Avenue, Paddington, were demised by the then trustees of the estate to John Kellond for a term of ninety-seven and a quarter years from June 24, 1869, and the lease contained a covenant by John Kellond for himself, his executors, administrators and assigns that he would not do, or suffer to be done, on the premises any act which might be, or grow to be, an annoyance, damage or disturbance to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners (who were parties to the deed) or the trustees for the time being or their tenants, and would keep and use the premises as and for a private dwelling-house only. The lease contained a proviso for re-entry by the trustees in the event of any breach of covenant. In 1938 the lease became vested in Mrs. Ada Purnell, and on June 21, 1947, the defendant company became the assignees of the residue of the term created by the lease. The defendant company was a family concern, and was managed by John Edward Purnell, the chief shareholder, and his mother, Mrs. Ada Purnell, and the rents of the properties owned by the defendant company were collected weekly by Mr. or Mrs. Purnell. The premises, 81 Warwick Avenue, had been divided up into a number of flats or tenements, and the top flat was let by Mrs. Purnell, on behalf of the company, to a Mrs. Young. The only inquiry Mrs. Purnell made in regard to Mrs. Young's suitability as a tenant, before letting the flat to her, was from a woman who seemed to be in charge of a restaurant in the neighbourhood and stated that Mrs. Young worked there. When collecting the rent from Mrs. Young, Mrs. Purnell used to go into the living room of the flat, but, according to her evidence, she "saw nothing to make her feel uncomfortable." On Aug. 30, 1948, as a result of observations kept on the premises by police officers on Aug. 18 and 19, Mrs. Young was charged with keeping the top flat as a brothel. She admitted the offence and was convicted. On Sept. 14, the defendant company served on her a notice to quit the premises, and she quitted them on Sept. 25, 1948. On Oct. 19, 1948, the solicitors for the plaintiffs wrote to Mrs. Purnell stating that they had been instructed by the plaintiffs to take the necessary steps for the forfeiture of the lease, on account of Mrs. Young's conviction, and, pursuant to the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (1), they served a notice on the defendant company complaining that the defendants had "done or suffered to be done on the ... premises an act which is an annoyance, damage or disturbance to the ... trustees and that you have not used the said messuage or tenement as and for a private dwelling-house only, in that you have used or suffered to be used the same or part thereof during 1948 as a brothel contrary to the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 13 (2)." On Oct. 25, the defendant company's solicitors wrote stating that Mrs. Purnell had no knowledge of the use to which the top floor of the premises was being put until Sept. 13, 1948, when she learnt of Mrs. Young's conviction, and that she had thereupon served Mrs. Young with a notice to quit, and they suggested that, in the circumstances, the notice under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146, should be withdrawn. The plaintiffs, however, refused to withdraw the notice, and brought the action for possession. HILBERY, J., now found that the defendant company had received ample warning of what was going on on the premises, and he held that it was guilty of a breach of covenant and was not entitled to relief under s. 146 (2) of the Act of 1925.

Melford Stevenson, K.C., and Sir Shirley Worthington-Evans for the plaintiffs.
C. G. A. Cowan for the defendant company.

HILBERY, J., stated the facts and continued: The first contention of the defendant company is that it has committed no breach of the covenant because it did not know of the breach or suffer it. It is submitted on its behalf that it cannot be held guilty of a breach unless it is shown that it knew of it. Alternatively, if it should be found that there was a breach because it is shown that the defendant company did know or suffer this conduct on the premises, the company applies to the court under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (2), to grant it relief from the forfeiture. In my view, it is plain that two responsible tenants, occupying two of the other flats at No. 81, Warwick Avenue, had made complaints which indicated fairly and squarely to the defendant company's representatives, Mrs. Purnell and her son, John Edward Purnell, that these premises were being used for irregular and immoral purposes. [HIS LORDSHIP dealt with the evidence of Mr. Daltrey, the tenant of the basement flat, who had complained to Mr. Purnell, between Whitsun and August, 1947, about the conduct of Mrs. Young and the occurrences on the premises, and continued:] I do not overlook the fact that it is extremely dangerous for a landlord to make accusations which are only founded on something which he has heard from one of the tenants in the premises. I do not underrate the difficulties of a landlord in deciding whether what one tenant is saying about another is something which he ought to take seriously or not, but this was a serious complaint, obviously seriously made, by a respectable man who had a wife and child occupying the basement flat. Mr. Purnell admits that he interpreted Mr. Daltrey's complaint as indicating that the irregular behaviour in the top flat involved sexual immorality. He says that he did not remember such a word as "bawdy-house" being used to him, but he did remember that Mr. Daltrey told him that, in his opinion, there was "funny business" going on there, and he interpreted that expression as indicating that the flat was being used for sexual immorality. That could only mean that he understood that the charge was that it was being used as a brothel. He took no steps, however, to verify or to refute the charge. He chose, in my view, to do nothing about it. He could have made inquiries of the tenants occupying the other flats to see what they had to say, but he did not do so. Mrs. Purnell then received a complaint from Miss Tucker, a respectable, well educated and reliable young woman, who had occupied the second floor flat of the premises since October, 1943. Miss Tucker said, in evidence, that she had seen men being taken into the flat, and:

“About the early part of 1948 ... I complained to Mrs. Purnell of drunkenness and noises on this woman’s part and in her flat.”

A Mrs. Purnell said she was very upset and displeased and would look into it, but she did nothing in the matter, apart from complaining to Mrs. Young about the noisy parties. Miss Tucker then made the complaint to the police which led to the watching of the premises and the discovery by police officers that the top flat was being used by Young as a brothel.

B The sub-divisional inspector of police told me that prostitutes use this area openly in the afternoons and at other times, walking the streets and plying their trade. Mr. Purnell tells me that, although he has been in those streets regularly, at different times, collecting the rents and so on, he has never observed these street-walking women, and, although he is a comparatively young man, he says that he has never even been accosted by one of them. I find that
C extremely difficult to credit. It is hardly to be believed that any man could go frequently up and down the streets where that sort of thing is going on without observing it, even if he did not suffer the annoyance of being solicited. I have formed the view that, in all the circumstances, neither Mrs. Purnell nor her son wanted to know any more about what was going on. Each of them preferred not to face the facts, and turned away from the obvious facts in order that
D they should not see them. I think some support for this view is to be found in a further fact which emerged in the course of this case. At 66 Warwick Avenue, which was also owned by the defendant company, and the rents of which were collected by Mr. or Mrs. Purnell, Mrs. Purnell retained one room, which she used as an office and in which she spent a good deal of time at all hours of the day. By September, 1948, a flat in that house was being used as a brothel, and, after the police had kept it under observation for four nights, they reported
E that two women were seen to take twenty-six different men to the premises. In that case, also, Mrs. Purnell said that she had observed nothing irregular happening at the house.

It was admitted by counsel for the defendant company that, if it knew, or ought to have known, what was going on, then it was in breach of the covenant and suffering that to go on which was, in fact, going on. If I come to the
F conclusion that sufficient warning had been given to Mrs. Purnell and to her son, both of whom were directors actively engaged for the defendant company in the management of the properties which were held by the defendant company, and they took no sufficient steps to verify or to dispel the allegations, but wilfully shut their eyes to the state of affairs that was existent, as I think they were doing, then I think that the law will impute knowledge to them, since the law
G will not allow a person to escape his obligations by saying, “I did not know,” when he has wilfully blinded himself to facts and refused to know that which, if he had chosen, he might have known quite well. As LORD SUMNER said ([1921] 1 A.C. 812) in The Zamora (No. 2) (1):

H “... there are two senses in which a man is said not to know something because he does not want to know it. A thing may be troublesome to learn, and the knowledge of it, when acquired, may be uninteresting or distasteful. To refuse to know any more about the subject or anything at all is then a wilful but a real ignorance. On the other hand, a man is said not to know because he does not want to know, where the substance of the thing is borne in upon his mind with a conviction that full details or precise proofs may be dangerous, because they may embarrass his denials or compromise his protests. In such a case he flatters himself that where ignorance is safe, 'tis folly to be wise, but there he is wrong, for he has been put upon notice and his further ignorance, even though actual and complete, is a mere affectation and disguise."

As I have said, I have come to the conclusion that the defendant company had been put on notice, but chose to take no steps, because to do so might have been to discover the unpleasantness which the police had no difficulty in discovering, and I have no doubt that the company preferred to avoid the troubles in which it might be involved if it made the discovery.

As I am satisfied that there was a breach, in that the defendant company suffered this misuser of the premises, the only question that remains is: Ought the court in these circumstances to exercise its discretion under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (2), and grant relief against the forfeiture? This particular breach of covenant, i.e., this type of misuse of the premises in breach of a covenant not to use them otherwise than as a private dwelling-house and not to use them in such a way as to become a nuisance or annoyance to the trustees or the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, is one which it is most difficult to remedy, and it certainly cannot be remedied by payment. It does, necessarily, a harm to the reputation and value of the premises, as it attaches to them the stigma of having been known as a house of ill fame. For those reasons it has been decided that the notice of the breach which is given in order to found the claim for forfeiture need not require the breach to be remedied: [see Egerton v. Esplanade Hotels, London, Ltd. (2)]. It has also been held that stopping a wrongful user of this kind is not a way of remedying the breach, and that a breach of this kind cannot be remedied: [see Egerton v. Esplanade Hotels, London, Ltd. (2)].

When I regard, as I must, all the circumstances of this case, the nature of this particular breach, and the damage which it does to premises, when I reflect also on the curious fact that in no less than two of the houses which were in the hands of the defendant company, the top flats were being misused in this way, when I think of the failure to take any steps—and the way in which the defendant company, through its directors, John Edward Purnell and Mrs. Purnell, seemed to have refused to take reasonable steps—to see whether such a misuse of the premises was going on, I come to the conclusion that, having regard to the nature of the misuse and to all these circumstances, it is not a case in which the court should exercise its discretion.

I have had it pressed on me that the penalty is great if I refuse to exercise the discretion. I am told that there are about nineteen years of the lease to run, and it is submitted that the fact that, if the lease is forfeited, there may occur an immediate and present claim for dilapidations, and so on, results in too high a penalty being imposed on the defendant company. I am unable to take that view. I think the penalty for allowing or suffering premises to be used in this way ought to be high, and it ought to be known that the courts will be strict and will enforce, by forfeiture of leases, breaches of covenant of this nature, where people are put to all the abominable unpleasantness that occur where one in a set of flats is suffered to be used day and night as a brothel. I think it is a very grave type of breach, and it is not the kind of breach for which it was intended that the court should grant relief. Where a breach can be remedied by doing repairs or restoring premises to their original layout, where it is a mere expenditure of money, it is another matter, but where there is a breach of the kind that I have been considering, and in the circumstances of this case, I think it would be wrong for me to exercise the discretion under s. 146 (2) of the Act of 1925 and to grant relief against the forfeiture, and, accordingly, there will be judgment for the plaintiffs.

Judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

Solicitors: Trower, Still & Keeling (for the plaintiffs); Ingledeu, Brown, Bennison & Garrett (for the defendant company).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

PARKINSON v. LIVERPOOL CORPORATION.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Cohen and Asquith, L.J.J.), January 12, 1950.]

Negligence—Driving of motor vehicle—Sudden stopping of omnibus to avoid running over dog—Injury to passenger—Driver's duty to take reasonable care.

A To avoid running over a dog an omnibus driver applied his brakes suddenly and brought the vehicle to an abrupt standstill. The plaintiff, a passenger, at that moment was walking down the gangway with the intention of alighting at the next stopping-place. He was thrown to the floor of the vehicle and sustained personal injuries for which he claimed damages on the ground that the driver had been negligent.

B HELD: that the driver, faced with a sudden emergency caused by the dog's appearance in front of the omnibus, acted as an ordinary and careful driver ought to act in such circumstances, and, therefore, he was not guilty of negligence or failure to take due care of his passengers, and the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

Sutherland v. Glasgow Corpn. ([1949] Sc.L.T. 388), distinguished.

C [AS TO THE GENERAL DUTY OF DRIVERS OF VEHICLES ON HIGHWAYS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, pp. 637-644, paras. 894-904; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 59-62, Nos. 366-400, and Digest Supp.]

Case referred to:

(1) Sutherland v. Glasgow Corpn., [1949] Sc.L.T. 388.

D APPEAL by plaintiff from a decision of PRITCHARD, J., at Liverpool Assizes on June 10, 1949.

E The plaintiff, a passenger in an omnibus belonging to the defendants and driven by one of their servants, was thrown to the floor of the vehicle owing to the sudden application of the brakes by the driver and sustained injuries for which he claimed damages on the ground that the driver had driven negligently. At the time of the accident he had left his seat and was passing down the gangway to alight at a stopping place. The driver, in evidence, said that he stopped to avoid running over a dog which suddenly ran in front of the omnibus. PRITCHARD, J., found that the driver had acted as any reasonable person would have done in a like emergency, that he was not negligent, and, therefore, the action failed. The Court of Appeal now affirmed that decision and dismissed the plaintiff's appeal with costs.

F Sir Noel Goldie, K.C., and G. N. England for the plaintiff.
Nelson, K.C., and Baucher for the defendants.

TUCKER, L.J.: The plaintiff, Mr. Parkinson, a man of some sixty-five years of age, who was a passenger on a Liverpool Corporation omnibus, suffered injuries as a result of a sudden stopping of the omnibus, whereby he was thrown to the floor and broke two of his ribs. He boarded the omnibus at about 6.40 p.m. on Nov. 2, 1948, and obtained a seat towards the front of the vehicle. Before the omnibus came to the place at which he usually alighted there were traffic lights, and, according to his custom, he rose from his seat near the lights. The omnibus stopped at the lights and then went forward, but, after it had proceeded some little distance up the road, there was an application of the brakes of some suddenness. I say "of some suddenness" because the suddenness of stoppages of this kind is always a matter of degree. The nature of this stopping was such as to throw the plaintiff off his balance while he was walking along the gangway. It also threw the conductor of the omnibus to the floor. The sudden stop was not sufficient seriously to inconvenience the seated passengers. It was not one of those stoppages where the seated passengers are thrown all over the omnibus. In that state of affairs, if there had been no explanation of what had caused the driver to pull up with that degree of suddenness, the court would certainly have been entitled to draw the inference that prima facie there had been negligence on the part of the driver. The circumstances would be such as to call for an explanation.

The driver was called and he gave an explanation, of the truth of which PRITCHARD, J., was satisfied. He said that after he had gone over the traffic lights a dog appeared from his near side. He saw it some twenty yards away. It appeared to be minded to cross the front of him, and he, accordingly, took his foot off the accelerator and passed behind the dog. The dog, having cleared the vehicle, apparently, changed its mind and suddenly came back across the front of the omnibus. When the driver realised what the dog was going to do it was some five or six yards away from him, and he applied his brakes and brought the omnibus to a standstill. While he was doing that he lost sight of the dog, and it was not until afterwards that anyone could discover whether or not the dog had been injured. Apparently, it had not been. The dog escaped, and the plaintiff suffered the injuries described. On that PRITCHARD, J., said:

"This is not a case which can be argued, or, indeed, thought of, I think, on the lines which have been suggested, whether the driver owed a duty to the dog or a greater duty to his passenger. The simple test to be applied in the circumstances of this case which took place is: Did the driver act reasonably or unreasonably by doing something which a reasonable person would not do and leaving undone something a reasonable person would do? In this case I accept the driver's evidence, and I am satisfied the dog did what he says it did. In those circumstances, and accepting those circumstances as I do as the facts in this case, I have to ask myself: Has it been established that this driver did something which a reasonable person would not do, and I do not think he did. I think he acted as any reasonable person would in the emergency which took place, and I find there was no negligence on his part."

I do not think PRITCHARD, J., in any way misdirected himself with regard to any onus that there may have been. What his judgment amounted to was that the driver's evidence established that an emergency arose, and the learned judge was satisfied that the driver did that which an ordinary, reasonable, careful, driver would do in the circumstances of that particular emergency. Having come to that conclusion he decided in favour of the defendants. I think the decision of PRITCHARD, J., was clearly right on the facts which he found, and that he approached the problem from the proper angle.

Counsel for the plaintiff has drawn our attention to Sutherland v. Glasgow Corpn. (1) because it is a case which tends to support the view which he urged before us, namely, that a driver owes some paramount duty to his passengers, and, if he injures a passenger, he cannot discharge the onus that lies on him by saying: "I did what I did to avoid running over a dog." With regard to Sutherland v. Glasgow Corpn. (1), I would only observe that each of the learned judges who heard it said that each case of this kind must depend on its own facts. The Lord Justice-Clerk (LORD THOMSON) said ([1949] Sc.L.T. 391):

"In the course of an interesting debate we ranged over a number of topics connected with the difficulties the drivers of vehicles may be placed in by the presence of animals on roadways. As the problems which may arise are infinitely various, I am averse to attempting any general statement of the law. This is one of the occasions when one is well justified in saying that each case must depend on its own facts."

Similar statements were made by LORD MACKAY and LORD JAMIESON. In that case the driver of a Glasgow tramway car had pulled up suddenly to avoid running over a dog and there was evidence that passengers who had got on to the car shortly before the sudden stop could not reasonably have been expected to reach their seats by the time the driver pulled up. In addition, it was a case

A of the application of a magnetic brake on a tramway car, and I think we are entitled to know that the application of such a brake to such a vehicle has extremely sudden consequences. Those are two factors which differentiate the facts of the present case from those of Sutherland v. Glasgow Corpn. (1). In the present case the evidence was the other way. It all tended to show that the blind was down so that the driver of the omnibus would not know whether there was any passenger, not only standing, but moving along the gangway. Furthermore, the brake applied was the ordinary normal brake used in the course of driving an omnibus.

B In such circumstances I do not think it is necessary to deal in detail with the facts or reasoning in Sutherland v. Glasgow Corpn. (1). I am not prepared to accept as the law which we should apply in this country in the circumstances of a case of this kind all the statements with regard to the duties said to be owed by the driver of a tramcar to the passengers in the circumstances which occurred in that case. I am by no means prepared to accept that the duty can be put in quite the language used by the Lord Justice-Clerk or by LORD JAMIESON, and certainly there is nothing in that case which compels me to the view (which I should be very reluctant to reach) that PRITCHARD, J., arrived at an erroneous conclusion in the present case. The duty owed by the driver is a duty to take reasonable care, having regard to the passengers he is carrying and having regard to the other users of the road. I should add that the decision in Sutherland v. Glasgow Corpn. (1) proceeded on the basis that the sheriff substitute had not properly directed his mind to the degree of proof which was required to be adduced by the defendant to justify his conduct, and the court came to the conclusion, on the evidence given, that the driver really had not applied his mind to the question of the safety of his passengers or possible injury which they might suffer. Although I think that in such circumstances as these drivers act instinctively, they are required to go through some process of reasoning. In the present case the driver was asked this question: "What do you usually do when driving your omnibus when a dog is in imminent peril of being run over?", and the answer was: "I try to save the animal's life, if possible, without endangering anybody else, of course." So that it appears that he did apply, or that it was his custom to apply, his mind to the question of his conduct endangering anyone else when faced with an emergency of this kind. I think that this appeal fails.

F COHEN, L.J.: I agree.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I also agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Helder, Roberts, Giles & Co., agents for John A. Behn, Twyford & Reece, Liverpool (for the plaintiff); Cree, Godfrey & Wood, agents for Thomas Akner, town clerk, Liverpool (for the defendants).

[Reported by C. ST. J. NICHOLSON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

---

BORDER RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. ROBERTS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell, L.J., and Hodson, J.), January 25, 26, 27, 1950.]

Water Supply—Rates and charges—Special expense charged on ratepayers in contributory place—Cost of supply to that place thereafter small—Right of ratepayers in that place to have rate reduced to reflect cost—Public Health Act, 1936 (c. 49), s. 126 (1).

The Public Health Act, 1936, s. 126, provides: “(1) . . . a local authority who supply water under this Act to any premises for domestic purposes may charge in respect thereof a water rate, which shall be assessed on the net annual value of the premises as appearing in the valuation list for the time being in force . . . Provided that the authority may fix a minimum charge applicable in all cases to premises supplied with water.” In 1898, under the Carlisle Corporation Act, 1898, s. 28, the Carlisle Corporation became bound to supply to the B. council a quantity of water daily for the use of the B. council in its seventeen parishes. Soon afterwards, the B. council took a lease of a plot of land for use as a reservoir and contracted with the lessor that the free supply under the Act of 1898 should be allocated to four of the parishes, including the B. parish. The Local Government Board made an Order (S.R. & O., 1908, No. 1202) charging the cost of leading the free supply to the four parishes on those parishes as a special expense pursuant to the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 229. The B.R.D. Council, the successors of the B. council, charged a water-rate on premises in the B. parish and the other three parishes receiving the free supply at 2s. in the pound and on premises in the remaining parishes in their area at 2s. 6d. in the pound. A ratepayer having premises in B. parish refused to pay the rate at 2s. in the pound on the ground that the cost of supplying water to B. parish was much less than 2s. in the pound and was merely that of maintaining the pipes and apparatus, and that the parishioners of B., having borne the special expense of leading the supply which they received, had now an enforceable equity to be charged only the actual cost of the present supply to their parish.

HELD: the circumstances did not give rise to any such enforceable equity; the B.R.D. Council had a discretionary power under s. 126 to charge uniformly throughout their area; and, therefore, they were not bound to differentiate according to the actual cost of the supply to any one parish or contributory place.

[AS TO WATER RATES AND CHARGES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 33, pp. 400-403, paras. 662-667; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 43, pp. 1087-1091, Nos. 204-228.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Northampton Corpn. v. Ellen, [1904] 1 K.B. 299; 73 L.J.K.B. 329; 90 L.T. 71; 68 J.P. 197; 43 Digest 1091, 227.
- (2) Julius v. Oxford (Bp.), (1880), 5 App. Cas. 214; 49 L.J.Q.B. 577; 42 L.T. 546; 44 J.P. 600; 42 Digest 716, 1351.
- (3) R. v. Barlow, (1693), 2 Salk. 609; Carth. 293; 42 Digest 717, 1363.

APPEAL by the Border Rural District Council from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE ALLSEBROOK, sitting at Carlisle County Court, dated Oct. 26, 1949. JUDGE ALLSEBROOK held that the council could charge by way of water rate only the cost of supplying water to the contributory place. The Court of Appeal now reversed the county court judge's decision. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.

Blain for the Border Rural District Council.
C. E. Scholefield for the ratepayer.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The plaintiffs in this action are the Border Rural District Council (hereinafter called "the council"), and they claim from the defendant, Charles Henry Roberts (hereinafter called "the ratepayer"), a total sum of £18 13s. 0d. in respect of water-rate for the period ending Mar. 31, 1949, alleged to be due in respect of five premises in the ratepayer's occupation. The five premises are all situated in the parish of Brampton, which is a "contributory place" within the meaning of the Public Health Acts within the area of the council. The council are the suppliers of water to this area, and, there being for this purpose no special Act, their obligations and powers are governed by the general Acts, particularly by the Public Health Act, 1936.

To make clear certain of the points which arise it is necessary to state that the council came into being in 1934 as the result of what is known as the Cumberland Review Order of that year (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 259). Previously the parish of Brampton had been within the area of what had been called the Brampton Rural District Council. That area comprehended seventeen parishes, all in the neighbourhood of Carlisle in the county of Cumberland. The effect of the Cumberland Review Order was to enlarge the area which had hitherto been the province of the Brampton Rural District Council. It added twenty parishes, so that the total number of contributory places or parishes subject to the jurisdiction of the council as regards water is now thirty-seven. It is conceded that quoad the original seventeen parishes of the Brampton Council area all the statutory and other powers, duties and obligations of the Brampton Council became vested in the council which, therefore, are the successors of the Brampton Council. For the purpose of supplying water there have at all times been, so far as is relevant, two available sources, to one of which I shall refer as the Glazier Spring source, and the other as the Geltsdale source. So far as the parish of Brampton is concerned, it, together with three other parishes, derives the bulk, but not the whole, of its supply from the Geltsdale source. For reasons which I shall hope to make clear, the supply of Geltsdale water is much less costly than the supply of the Glazier Spring water.

The real point in this appeal may, I think, fairly be stated thus. Having regard to all the circumstances, is the council bound so to exercise its powers to charge water rates as to reflect fairly in the rates charged to the Brampton parish (and the other three parishes which are in a like case) the fact that the supply of water, as it is mainly from Geltsdale, is far less costly than is the supply of water to the remaining thirty-three parishes which comes from the Glazier Spring and other sources? What the council have done is to charge a water-rate based, as it must be, on the net annual value of the relevant premises at a rate of 2s. 6d. in the pound in all parishes other than Brampton and its three colleagues, but in the latter case to charge only at the rate of 2s. 0d. in the pound, thus by a difference of only sixpence in the rate reflecting the difference in the cost. It is said by counsel for the ratepayer that that sixpence is an altogether negligible appreciation of the claim of the four parishes, when regard is had to all the facts.

The matter came before the learned county court judge at Carlisle, who heard argument and evidence in March. At some stage it appeared that of the five premises which I have mentioned as being in the occupation of the ratepayer the last two named in the particulars of claim—Craw Hall and Cotehill Terrace—although in the parish of Brampton, derived their water, not from the Geltsdale supply, but from Glazier Spring. He conceded that, having regard to that fact, he could not contend that his claim to a greatly reduced water rate could properly be entertained as regards the last two premises. We are not concerned with the logic or correctness of the admission, but as a result those two premises pass from the picture. The learned judge gave judgment for a sum of £9 10s. 10d. Of that sum, £5 8s. 0d. was the amount claimed in respect of Craw Hall and Cotehill Terrace. As to the balance, the learned judge concluded that, having regard to the facts, the only proper amount which the council could charge by way of water rate was one which only brought into account the cost of maintaining the pipes and other apparatus requisite for carrying the Geltsdale water to the parish of Brampton. Arithmetically that worked out at  $7\frac{1}{2}d.$  in the pound. The balance, therefore, of £4 2s. 10d. was the result of scaling down the charge in respect of the three first mentioned premises from 2s. in the pound to  $7\frac{1}{2}d.$  in the pound. The amount involved is small, but a question of principle has been raised, and we have, indeed, been told that there are many other cases which depend on the result of this case. The claim of the council is that they have power under the Act to charge a water rate in the way they have done, and that they are not bound to limit their charge in respect of Brampton and the other three parishes so as only to reflect the cost of maintenance. That is the issue we have to try.

To complete the history of the matter, in the county court the learned judge gave an interim judgment in which he intimated his conclusion on the lines I have suggested. He did not give any specific reasons for his conclusion that the maintenance cost was all that could be taken into account, but we understand that he regarded that limitation as one which must be imposed on the council as a result of the various matters which I shall presently mention. As he has stated no reasons, there is no point in my taking up time by reading from his interim judgment. After a passage of time intended to enable the parties to agree their arithmetic (or, at any rate, a method of assessment) which did not have the result for which the learned judge hoped, in October of last year he gave a final judgment in which he worked out his arithmetic on the basis which he had suggested. In order that I may dispose of the matter, it is not in dispute that the council are properly entitled, by virtue of their statutory powers, to sue as they did in the county court for these water-rates, and the real question turns, and, as I think, turns only, on the proper effect, having regard to the circumstances of this case, of the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 126.

It appears that before 1898 the Brampton Council, the plaintiffs' predecessors in title, had cast their eyes on the Geltsdale Springs as a source from which they could get further water to supply the area. They were forestalled by the Carlisle City Corporation which promoted a Bill, the effect of which was to give to the Carlisle Corporation a prior right to the supply. We are told that the Bill was opposed by the Brampton Council, and in accordance with what, according to those more familiar with the procedure than I am, frequently is alleged to happen in such cases, some kind of a bargain was struck, so that there was included in the Bill when it became law a special section, s. 28, of the private Act known as the Carlisle Corporation (Water) Act, 1898, the effect of which was that the Carlisle Corporation became bound to supply to the Brampton Council a quantity of water from Geltsdale equivalent to 220,000 gallons as a maximum per day. It was provided in the Act that the Carlisle Corporation would in specified proportions comply with its obligation by delivering the water to two reservoirs, one known as the Garth Head, and the other as the Faugh. It was stated that the water so supplied should be for the use of the Brampton Council in respect of its seventeen parishes. There was nothing in the Act which stated that it was to be allocated to any one or other of the seventeen. Following that statute there was made a lease of a small plot of land some thirty feet square, the parties being, as lessor, the then Earl of Carlisle, and, as lessees, the Brampton Council. The purpose of the demise was to give to the Brampton Council a site for a subsidiary reservoir which is known as Blaebery Bent Tank. The terms were in many respects plainly very favourable to the Brampton Council, and the transaction undoubtedly followed on, and was, indeed, a part of, the scheme which had originated in the statute of 1898 and the arrangement for the taking from the Carlisle Corporation of these quantities of water. The important matter for present purposes which emerges from the lease is that by it the Brampton Council contracted with the earl that the Carlisle supply, the Geltsdale free supply, should, via this tank or otherwise, be allocated exclusively to the four parishes which were named in the lease, Brampton being, as I have indicated, one, and the others being Castle Garrock, Irthington and Hayton. The covenant by the Brampton Council is not in law one on which the ratepayer or any parishioner of Brampton could rely since it is res inter alios acta. So much counsel for the ratepayer concedes, as plainly he must, but, as a result of it, pursuant to what was, no doubt, the scheme in the minds of all parties concerned, the cost of leading this free Geltsdale water to the beneficiary parishes, if I may use that word, was cast on those parishes, and I assume the whole of it was so discharged. At any rate, by an Order to which counsel has referred, made in December, 1908, by the then Local Government Board, total sums of money amounting to £8,000 or £9,000, which, I will assume, represented the cost of leading the Geltsdale water to the four parishes, was charged on those parishes as a special expense pursuant to the powers of the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 229.

The result is, says counsel, that those four parishes themselves paid all the cost that the Brampton Council was put to in regard to this water supply. Other parishes were wholly relieved of all those expenses, and that was, says he, plainly part of a scheme which had its origin in 1898, and the administrative steps later taken establish the facts as I have stated them and show as a result that the only cost which the council now has in regard to this supply to Brampton is the relatively small cost of maintaining the pipes and apparatus. When regard is had to the fact that the four parishes were intended, as he says, from the first to have this water and to have it free, and to the fact that they provided the cost of laying the pipes and having the apparatus installed for doing so, then there comes into existence so strong a claim as to amount to an enforceable equity, making it the duty of the council in the exercise of its statutory powers only to charge by way of water-rate against the consumers in the parishes that maintenance figure, which has been quantified by the judge at 7½d. in the pound of the net annual value. It is conceded by counsel that, apart from the creation of such an equity, there is power in the relevant statutes for the authority to spread the total cost of water supply as it thinks fit, and, in particular, uniformly over all the consumers throughout the total area, and that it is not bound to treat each parish as a unit and to calculate as regards each parish what the cost of the supply of water to that parish is, and levy water rates on the consumers in the parishes so as to balance the costs relevant to those parishes. That concession has made it unnecessary to go into some matters which were adumbrated during the argument, and I shall only find it necessary to refer in any detail to s. 126 of the Act of 1936. That section, it may be stated, took the place of s. 56 of the Act of 1875, which after some investigation we were able to discover was repealed by Part I of the schedule to the Act of 1936. Section 126 provides:

“(1) Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, a local authority who supply water under this Act to any premises for domestic purposes may charge in respect thereof a water rate, which shall be assessed on the net annual value of the premises as appearing in the valuation list for the time being in force . . . Provided that the authority may fix a minimum charge applicable in all cases to premises supplied with water.”

Such a minimum charge would, prima facie, I conceive, be a sum of money, say 10s. in respect of all the relevant premises. Obviously, therefore, the proviso is important as indicating that it is within the powers of the council, and within the contemplation of the Act, that there may be a uniform charge or scale of charge over the whole area of supply. As counsel for the ratepayer has raised a subsidiary argument on the word “supply,” I should mention that the duty as regards supply of the local authority is contained in s. 111. It is its duty, by virtue of para. (ii) of that section, to secure that every house has rendered available to it within a reasonable distance "a sufficient supply of wholesome water for domestic purposes." A later section of the Act, s. 308, gives power to an authority to make contributions in relief, so to speak, of water-rate from its general sources of revenue, and to do so by treating any specific cost incurred as special expenses to be paid out of ordinary rates and charged specifically, save as therein expressly provided, on the parish for the benefit of which the expenses were incurred. It was in pursuance of such a provision in the predecessor of that Act that the special expenses of the construction of the pipes, and so on, were charged specifically to the four parishes.

The effect of the presence of that section, it was suggested, might be to show that it was the intention of Parliament to make a parish the unit for all purposes when a local authority had to consider how it should recover from the persons entitled to the benefits the cost incurred of supplying water. If that were right, it might have, or have had, an influence on the proper construction of s. 126, but it is important to note that by a later Act, namely, the Rural Water Supplies and Sewerage Act, 1944, s. 6, the effect of s. 308 of the Act of 1936 which I have tried to state was revised, for s. 6 provided:

"Notwithstanding anything in s. 308 of the Public Health Act, 1936, all expenses incurred (whether before or after the passing of this Act) by a rural district council in connection with . . . a supply of water shall, in so far as they fall to be defrayed out of rates [i.e., general rates] made in respect of periods beginning after the end of March, 1945, be general expenses."

In other words, it is indicated that, so far as charging out of general rates is concerned, the intention of Parliament thenceforth was that there should be a spread of the whole cost over the whole area, instead of treating prima facie as the proper unit for levying these charges the contributory places or parishes. In so far, therefore, as the construction of s. 126 might thitherto have been affected by what I will call the parochial emphasis in s. 308, that emphasis has now gone. Counsel for the ratepayer, however, has never made it part of his argument, as I have said, that s. 126 on its true construction points to parochial assessment, but he has sought to get some help from s. 6 of the Act of 1944 by saying that, since now you must spread all the expenses, which are to be charged on rates generally, uniformly over the whole area, your only means of doing justice, when the costs incurred differ between one parish and another, is to make use of the power you have in s. 126 to charge differential water rates, reflecting the actual costs to the several parishes.

I only wish to refer to one other statutory provision, and that is s. 126 (4), which provides that any ten persons rated to the general rate in a borough or urban district, or any five persons rated to the general rate in a contributory place in a rural district, if aggrieved, putting it briefly, by the way in which the local authority has assessed its water-rate, may appeal to the Minister of Health, and the Minister can make an order, as he thinks fit, varying the water rate as charged. That sub-section is now replaced by the general s. 40 of the Water Act, 1945, which provides that

"(1) . . . on an application made to him by any statutory water undertakers supplying water under a local enactment, or by a local authority within whose county or district any such undertakers supply water, or by twenty or more persons supplied with water . . ."

